

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES,

*FOURTH SESSION OF THE TWENTY-FOURTH PARLIAMENT OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND
APPOINTED TO MEET 5 AUGUST, 1886, IN THE FIFTIETH YEAR OF THE REIGN OF

No. 1.] FIRST VOLUME OF SESSION 1889. [MARCH 1.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, 21st February, 1889.

THE PARLIAMENT, which had been prorogued successively from the 24th day of December, 1888, to the 31st day of January, 1889; thence to the 21st day of February, 1889, met this day for the despatch of Public Business.

The Session was opened by Commission.

THE HOUSE OF PEERS being met;

THE LORD CHANCELLOR acquainted the House,

"That Her Majesty, not thinking it fit to be personally present here this day, has been pleased to cause a Commission to be issued under the Great Seal, in order to the opening and holding of this Parliament."

Then Five of the LORD COMMISSIONERS—namely, The LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord Halsbury); VICE-CHANCELLOR (Lord

VOL. CCCCXII. [THIRD SERIES.]

EARL OF KINTORE, The EARL OF LATHOM, and VISCOUNT CROSS—being in their Robes, and seated on a Form placed between the Throne and the Woolsack, commanded the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod to let the Commons know "The Lords Commissioners desire their immediate Attendance in this House, to hear the Commission read."

Who being at the Bar, with their Speaker:—The Commission was read by the Clerk:—Then

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR delivered HER MAJESTY'S SPEECH to both Houses of Parliament, as follows:—

"My Lords, and Gentlemen,

"During the brief period that has elapsed since the close of the last Session, nothing has taken place to affect the cordial relations which exist between Myself and other Powers.

"The operations which had been successfully completed in Egypt a few days before the last Prorogation have effected the object for which they were undertaken, and I see no ground for apprehending the renewal of disturbance in the neighbourhood of Suakim. The negotiations which I had directed to be opened with the Rulers of Thibet for the purpose of preventing encroachment on my rights over the territory of Sikkim have not as yet been brought to a favourable conclusion; but I hope that further Military operations will not be necessary.

"I have consented to take part in a Conference with Germany and the United States at Berlin upon the affairs of Samoa, in continuation of that which was recently assembled at Washington.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"The Estimates for the Public Service of the year will be laid before you. The unceasing expenditure upon warlike preparation which has been incurred by other European nations has rendered necessary an increase in the precautions which have hitherto been taken for the safety of our shores and our commerce. The counsels by which other Powers are guided, and which dispose of their vast Forces, are at present uniformly friendly to this Country; but I have no right to assume that this condition is necessarily secure from the possibility of change.

"My Lords, and Gentlemen,

"Some portions of the Bill which was presented to you last year for amending the Local Government of England and Wales were laid aside in consequence of the pressure upon the time of Parliament; and from the same cause it was found to be impossible to enter upon the question of Local Government for Scotland. Bills dealing with these matters will be laid before you.

"Your early attention will be asked to measures for developing the material resources of Ireland and for amending the constitution of the various tribunals which have special jurisdiction over real property in that country. The Statutes which you have recently passed for the restoration of order and confidence in Ireland have already been attended with salutary results.

"Legislative provision will be necessary for executing the Convention into which I have entered for the suppression of bounties on the exportation of sugar; and also for completing the conversion of the Three per Cent. Annuities. The state of the gold coinage has for some years past been the subject of legitimate complaint. A measure for restoring it to a satisfactory condition will be laid before you.

"Though the Commission which I appointed to inquire into the Civil Establishments of the United Kingdom has not yet completed its labours, it has already made a Report of much value, and proposals for legislation arising out of that Report will be submitted to you.

"Several subjects which I have commended to your care in previous years, but which the increasing burden of your duties has shut out from consideration, will be submitted to you again. In this number will be included measures relating to tithes, for the regulation of the Universities of Scotland, for determining the liability of employers in the case of accidents, for establishing a Department of Agriculture, for cheapening the transfer of land, and for remedying abuses attaching to Joint Stock Companies formed under limited liability.

"I pray that the blessing of Almighty God may be with you in the discharge of your arduous duties."

Then the Commons withdrew.

House adjourned during pleasure.

House resumed.

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HER MAJESTY'S MOST GRACIOUS SPEECH

The QUEEN'S SPEECH reported by the LORD CHANCELLOR.

The EARL OF LONDESBOROUGH (who wore the uniform of Honorary Colonel of the 1st York Rifles): My Lords, I rise to move an Address thanking Her Majesty for Her gracious Speech. I do so with diffidence, relying upon the indulgence always extended by your Lordships to those who address your Lordships' House for the first time.

The subject with which I will first deal is one that engrosses all our minds, and that is, the state of Ireland. I think it will be a great comfort to the whole of this country to read that the measures that have been passed in this Parliament have already been of such salutary effect in Ireland, and that Her Majesty's Government intend to produce further measures which will conduce to the comfort of that country. It is not for me to waste your time by entering upon the subject of Home Rule; but I do think that the most eloquent Unionist could not possibly bring forward a more forcible argument against Home Rule than the horrible and atrocious murder of Inspector Martin. I think Home Rulers themselves must feel this, because, although in different parts of the country they endeavour to stir up indignation (not with very great success, I must say) on account of the imprisonment of Mr. O'Brien, yet they pass over this dreadful murder. And I think one may mention the very last speech on this subject of the noble Lord opposite (Lord Rosebery), who alluded to it as a "death." I should call it a most horrible and atrocious murder, and a disgrace to the whole country. It reflects disgrace upon those who brought it about in that sort of way, and also on the whole country, and will continue to do so on the whole country until the state of things is put an end to. The noble Lord appears to think that one of the principals in that dreadful affair was what he called a "peaceable priest." I do not know how the noble Lord found out that he was a peaceable priest, because certainly his public form does not show it. Some time ago he was sentenced to three months' imprisonment for vindicating the Plan of Campaign; and, altogether, I think he can hardly be described as a peaceable priest. At any rate, the noble Lord appears to think that the most disgraceful thing was that this man should be arrested on his return from a service at church. This priest did not act upon the example that was set him by his Master some 1900 years ago. I would ask you how it is possible that we should wish to entrust the lives and liberties of our fellow subjects to men like these. We Englishmen do not wish to send men where we would not go ourselves; and who would like to be at the mercy of these atrocious ruffians? I think even the liberty of these men themselves would not be safe. There is Mr. O'Brien. He gave the advice which tended to this murder; he advised them to bring their sticks with them—that with their sticks they would be a match for the constables. They did bring their sticks, and the deplorable result we have seen. But this is not all. A letter written by Mr. Russell has appeared in the Times. We have seen no contradiction of it; and it appears that in the month of August Mr. O'Brien wrote saying that it was most necessary to show Mr. Balfour that his troubles in Ireland were only beginning. This was in the month of August; in the month of September, directly after that, the outrages commenced; in October there were six, in November four, and in December six, showing the great effect of these meetings. Is it to be wondered at that Her Majesty's Government afterwards directed that he should be prosecuted? Considering all that he had said with respect to the treatment of land grabbers, and considering how all these people have been murdered, I think Her Majesty's Government would have acted in the most disgraceful way if they had not taken notice of these speeches of Mr. O'Brien. But some advocates of Home Rule appear to think that because a man is well brought up he ought to be treated in a different way from one who has not had his advantages. I think it is just the reverse. Because a man is well brought up he ought to know how to behave, and he ought not to encourage acts of this kind. When the meetings were proclaimed the outrages diminished.

The Earl of Lonsborough

I feel certain that if Her Majesty's Government pursue the course they have taken, of administering justice with firmness, in course of time these outrages will cease. As a proof of that I may point to the improvement in the deposits in Savings Banks. I say that the outrages have diminished, and at the present moment the only great cause of complaint that Home Rulers can bring is this imprisonment of Mr. O'Brien, and that instead of being taken to prison in a first-class carriage, he was removed in a second. I hope Her Majesty's Government will continue to administer justice in the same firm way that they have done hitherto.

The next most important subject is the announcement that Her Majesty's Government intend to do something towards the National Defences. Nothing would produce more fearful results to this country than a general war happening and this country being unprepared; and I feel sure that Her Majesty's Government will not appeal in vain to the patriotism of the country for its defence. We must remember that this country is peculiarly situated, and that we are dependent, not only for our comforts and the luxuries of life, but also for the mere necessities of life, upon foreign countries; and it is therefore necessary, not only that our coasts should be defended, but that also the ocean highways should be made safe for our vessels. Our coasts are inhabited by the finest sea-going population in the world, men who hold their lives in their hands when they go out, and who are at all times ready to risk their lives in defending the State and the safety of their wives and families. When they do this I think it is necessary that they should be able to trust the ships they have to man, and the guns they have to fire. It is only fair that the whole of the country which enjoys this safety should provide these things for its defence. There is another thing that we must remember, and that is that the money will not altogether be spent in vain, but it will be spent in this country for the benefit of the whole of the population.

I think the country may be congratulated upon having at the head of the Government the noble Marquis, by whom our foreign relations are so satisfactorily controlled, and if the meaasures that are promised by the Government are only considered on their merits, and not opposed merely because they are brought in by a Conservative Government, I think they will certainly be passed, with very great advantage to the country, and for the public benefit. My Lords, I will conclude by moving that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, thanking Her Majesty for Her Majesty's most Gracious Speech from the Throne, as follows :—

“ MOST GRACIOUS SOVEREIGN,

“ We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal Subjects, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to your Majesty for the Most Gracious Speech which your Majesty has addressed to both Houses of Parliament :

“ We humbly thank Your Majesty for the information that during the brief period that has elapsed since the close of the last Session nothing has taken place to affect the cordial relations which exist between Your Majesty and other Powers.

“ We learn with satisfaction that the operations which had been successfully completed in Egypt a few days before the last Prorogation, have effected the object for which they were undertaken, and that Your Majesty sees no ground for apprehending the renewal of disturbance in the neighbourhood of Suakin.

“ We thank Your Majesty for informing us that the negotiations which Your Majesty had directed to be opened with the Rulers of Thibe for the purpose of preventing encroachment on Your Majesty's rights over the territory of Sikkim have not as yet been brought to a favourable conclusion, but that Your Majesty hopes that further military operations will not be necessary.

“ We humbly thank your Majesty for informing us that your Majesty has consented to take part in a Conference with Germany and the United States at Berlin upon the affairs of Samoa, in continuation of that which was recently assembled at Washington.

“ We thank Your Majesty for informing us that some portions of the Bill which was presented to us last year for amending the Local Government of England and Wales were laid aside in consequence of the pressure upon the time of Parliament, and that from the same cause it was found to be impossible to enter upon the question of Local Government for Scotland: and that Bills dealing with these matters will be laid before us.

“ We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us that our attention will be asked to measures for developing the material resources of Ireland, and for amending the constitution of the various tribunals which have special jurisdiction over real property in that country. We learn with satisfaction that the Statutes which we have recently passed for the restoration of order and confidence in Ireland have already been attended with salutary results.

“ We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us that legislative provision will be necessary for executing the Convention into which Your Majesty has entered for the suppression of bounties on the exportation of sugar, and also for completing the conversion of the Three per Cent. Annuities; that the state of the gold coinage has for some years past been the subject of legitimate complaint, and that a measure for restoring it to a satisfactory condition will be laid before us.

“ We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us that though the Commission which Your Majesty appointed to inquire into the Civil Establishments of the United Kingdom has not yet completed its labours, it has already made a Report of much value, and that proposals for legislation arising out of that Report will be submitted to us.

“ We thank Your Majesty for informing us that several subjects which Your Majesty commended to our care in previous years, but which the increasing burden of our duties has shut out from consideration, will be submitted to us again, that in this number will be included Measures relating to tithes, for the regulation of the Universities of Scotland, for determining the liability of employers in the case of accidents, for establishing a Department of Agriculture, for cheapening the Transfer of Land, and for remedying abuses attaching to Joint Stock Companies formed under limited liability.

“ We humbly assure your Majesty that our careful consideration shall be given to the subjects which Your Majesty has recommended to our attention, and to the Measures which may be submitted to us; and we earnestly trust that with regard to these and all other matters pertaining to our functions the keeping and guidance of Almighty God may be vouchsafed to us.”

LORD PENRHYN (who was attired in the uniform of a Deputy Lieutenant) : My Lords, I beg to second the adoption of the Address to Her Majesty. I must ask your Lordships' consideration for any shortcomings which there may be in the performance of the duty which I have the honour of being entrusted with. I trust also that I may not infringe any of the Rules of this House in my attempt to deal with some of the topics which have been mentioned.

My Lords, we are informed that the relations existing between this country and Foreign Powers are on terms of cordiality. I think that is a proof of the ability and tact with which matters relating to Foreign Affairs continue to be conducted by Her Majesty's Government. It is highly satisfactory to know that the military operations conducted in the neighbourhood of Suakim have been so successful that the enemy have been obliged to withdraw. It is also to be hoped that the diplomatic representations made to the Rulers of Thibet will settle the difficulty about Sikkim, and will obviate the necessity of resorting to arms.

I hope that the Conference which is to take place in Berlin on the Affairs of Samoa will bring about an amicable settlement of that rather triangular difficulty which is shared by this country, Germany, and the United States. I am sure that a solution of that question will be acceptable to your Lordships.

I think that in the consideration of Home Affairs, the subject of National Defence deservedly takes precedence in order of importance. The paragraph in the Speech from the Throne which announces that it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to take additional steps for the defence of our shores and commerce will, I am sure, be read with gratification by all who care about the security of Her Majesty's Dominions. I think I may say also that the prospect of additional strength being given to the Navy is welcome. In my opinion our Navy ought to be conspicuous for its strength, and although the putting of our defences upon a better footing will involve the expenditure of a large sum of money, I sincerely hope that those who are responsible for our Naval Administration will not allow any motive of parsimony to weigh with them. Of course it is possible that an addition to the strength of our war vessels will entail a heavy outlay, and if the Chancellor of the Exchequer asks for the means I hope he will have no difficulty about that.

My Lords, the subject of the Local Government Bill, and the extension of it to Scotland next requires some attention, and with your permission I should like to say a word or two upon how the matter stands. There is no doubt that the Local Government Bill will in many parts of England admirably replace the old form of County Government, but I have misgivings as to its success elsewhere. In Wales, for instance, where what I may call such an advanced school of politicians exists as is seldom to be met with out of Ireland, the light in which the Local Government Bill is regarded is principally that it has been brought into existence for the purpose of being used like a machine in a paper-mill, which breaks up everything. In my humble opinion, the inventor of the machine forgot to provide a strong self-acting brake, for the want of which it may perhaps work at a dangerous rate. It may be that it is intended that the body of Aldermen should act as a check by constituting something like a second and superior Chamber; and if a higher standard of qualification had been required for Aldermen than for elected Councillors perhaps it would have been well. But as it is, there is ground for anxiety at the prospect of the extension of this Act, when already, for instance, we see that in a great part of Wales all magistrates are, practically speaking, entirely excluded from the position of Aldermen; and when there is hardly anything, as far as I can see, to prevent Aldermen being chosen whose status will not inspire confidence, I think there is reason for anxiety on that account. It is a matter of notoriety that a majority of those who are placed in authority by this Act have entered into an alliance with the Parnellite Party, and there is reason to apprehend danger from such a combination.

My Lords, I have expressed my own views to you fully. I hope the House will forgive me, but I take the opportunity of pointing out to Her Majesty's Government what I imagine may possibly be important. In that paragraph of the Speech which relates to Ireland it is refreshing to find that the development of the material resources of the country is the subject to which our attention is almost exclusively directed. I have always thought that in the government of Ireland there should be a tight rein with a light hand—a hand so light as not to interfere in the least with liberty and legitimate action, but a rein so tight as to stop at once the slightest indication of turbulence. In my opinion, this is just the sort of policy which Her Majesty's Government are successfully pursuing.

Then we are told that it is intended to establish an Agricultural Department. I may also perhaps be permitted to say that the Tithe Bill will do away with what has been regarded as a grievance by some minds. I think it will have a beneficial effect, and that it will be welcomed by all except those who will consider that by the passing of such an Act they will lose a part of the stock-in-trade which they use for political agitation. In conclusion, I beg to thank your Lordships for the indulgence which you have shown.

*EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, the fact of my having had the honour of moving the first Address to the Queen in the beginning of Her Majesty's prosperous and beneficent reign, and of my having had the opportunity since then of hearing most of the speeches made on such occasions, has encouraged me, especially lately, from time to time to offer my very sincere compliments to noble Lords who have recently taken their seats in this House and who have moved or seconded the Address. My noble Friend opposite, who moved, and the noble Lord who seconded the Address, although they still seem very young to me, have had very considerable Parliamentary experience, and I should think it highly presumptuous on my part to offer them congratulations which, in other circumstances, I should give. Nothing could be more temperate than the speech of the noble Lord who seconded the Address. With regard to my noble Friend, his manner was a little more aggressive against his old political Friends than is usual on these occasions, but I do not in the least complain of that. During the very short Recess some melancholy events have occurred. The death of the Crown Prince of Austria had all the elements of the concentrated sadness of a Greek tragedy. The light which so fiercely beats upon a throne exposes its occupants to much criticism on minute subjects, but the same circumstances extend the circle of sympathy beyond what can be the case as to the grief of private individuals. I am quite sure that there is no country more than this in which such genuine sympathy has been felt for the illustrious occupants of the dual throne of Austria and Hungary and their widowed Crown Princess. A remarkable figure has disappeared from this House. Lord Eversley attained his great Parliamentary reputation in another place. I do not know any one who more completely earned the respect and esteem of both sides of this House than he did. Recent incidents have convinced me of the truth of the maxim that it is better not to condemn people until you have heard their defence. During the last few weeks I read in a paper of great reputation that I had spent my autumn in training bloodhounds, but I must inform your Lordships that that statement is quite without foundation. Again, I have seen it stated that a Secretary of State had declared that I, as Secretary of State, had invited the Italians to take Massowah, and that, I may also say, was entirely without foundation. It was also reported that Admiral Maxse had revealed a State secret to an astonished world with regard to proposals made by Lord Odo Russell to me respecting a suggested mediation on the part of England between France and Germany at the time of the Franco-German War, a mediation which the German Government was prepared to accept, and that Mr. Gladstone and I are guilty of the prolongation of the war. Lord Odo Russell never left Versailles till after the peace. There is no such despatch. The genuine despatches which were published show that Lord Odo's language was exactly in the opposite direction. I need scarcely say that there is no foundation for this statement either. With regard to foreign affairs, I notice two omissions from the Queen's Speech, one of which is doubtless due to inadvertence. I do not think that the ratification of a very important document with regard to the Suez Canal has ever been communicated to Parliament. No doubt this omission is due to inadvertence. But the other omission is one I am surprised at, as it is a question creating a great deal of sensation in the country—I refer to

Zanzibar. In regard to this there are two questions, one with respect to the delimitation of territory under our influence, and the other relating to the joint operations to put down the slave trade. There was, I believe, a Delimitation Commission, and I do not know why it was abandoned, but I believe the matter was afterwards settled between our Foreign Office and that at Berlin. It would have been impossible for this country, after all that it has done during this century to diminish the slave trade, and having constantly complained of other countries not taking their due share of this work, to withhold its assistance from any country engaged in such an undertaking, even though such country might also have other aims. The greatest care and caution, however, should be exercised in carrying out any such arrangement. The noble Marquess at the end of last Session gave us some satisfactory explanations which I trust he may be able to supplement this evening, or at an early date. We should also be glad to obtain further information with regard to recent incidents with regard to Samoa between Germany and the United States. I have no doubt a conference is a wise thing, and that the duty of this country is to act in the most friendly way towards Germany and the United States with a due regard to our own interests in the matter. But there was a conference under Mr. Gladstone; what became of it? With regard to Suakin, I must congratulate Her Majesty's Government and the House on the brilliant manner in which the recent short military expedition was carried out. I may observe that we were at one time severely censured for not making greater progress with regard to Suakin; but as far as I can see it does not appear that Her Majesty's Government have of late made greater progress in regard to that port. Not long ago we were informed by the Secretary of State for War that the next war would be the bloodiest ever known—that it was certain and imminent. Well, he said it was certain to come sooner or later, and he thought sooner rather than later—and that is very like its being imminent. I hope the noble Marquess will be able to tell us that he does not support the view of the Secretary of State. With regard to the references in Her Majesty's gracious

Speech touching the expenditure on national defences, I am sure that Her Majesty's Government will be heartily supported in both Houses in all that is clearly shown to be necessary. I trust, however, that no proposal will be made or entertained in regard to the Army which could be regarded as in rivalry with the great standing armies of the Continent, whether by conscription or by less heroic means. With regard to the legislative bill of fare, most of the measures referred to are old Bills which we have known before, and with regard to several of them I can promise that they will receive the support of the Opposition. Certain criticisms have been made by the noble seconder of the Address upon the Local Government Act, and reference has been made to desirable amendments of that Act. I hope it may be possible for the noble Marquess, without going into details, to give us some indication of the general character of the alterations which are intended. Parliament, we are told, will be asked to sanction the Convention on the Sugar Bounties. That Convention we regard as retrograde in principle and most inconvenient in practice, and we shall feel bound to oppose it. In regard to Ireland, I notice that Ireland is to be entirely excluded from legislation this year; but I am not sure that we can regard this as satisfactory. It is stated in the gracious Speech, that the condition of Ireland, politically and materially, is greatly improved, and I think the Government are bound to state why, under such circumstances, they still fail to fulfil all those promises of local government for Ireland which were made by Lord Randolph Churchill when, as Leader of the House of Commons, he expressed the opinions of the whole Cabinet. There is still the burning question of arrears to be settled, for the Bill dealing with that subject, which the noble Marquess said never could be passed—but which was passed—contains a great blot upon it so far as it relates to the poorer class of tenants. Any relief a tenant gets by the reduced rent is neutralized by the arrears of an unjust rent. I see there is to be a new measure with regard to the Land Commission in Ireland. I think Her Majesty's Government ought to be very careful in changing a Commission which obtains, more or less, the confidence of the people of Ireland. I am not only talking of other parts of Ireland, but of Ulster as well. I think they will find, unless they are very careful about framing the constitution of that tribunal, the opposition will be much more than they expect. The noble Lord who moved the Address commented on the improved condition of Ireland. Now it will be interesting to know what the state of Ireland is. I have no official sources of information, and I have not been there myself, but I cannot quite accept the declaration of the Government for two reasons—first, because they have always been very chary of detailed information which we have asked for, and secondly because some of their principal members differ so entirely as to what the state of Ireland is. One of the most important statesmen in the Cabinet has said that the National League is almost ubiquitous, while another declares it is almost put an end to. Now the other day I read a pamphlet by Mr. Pease, who is well-known to your Lordships. He is a Liberal and agrees with me, so I put him on one side. I prefer to take the views of a man who has established in the House of Commons a singularly high character, I mean Mr. L. Courtney. The other day he asked a question. He asked if it was true that the state of Ireland was satisfactory; whether it was satisfactory that the Government should be flouted in so many quarters; whether one could observe with comfort that a state bordering on civil war prevailed; whether one could be pleased with seeing this day a peasant and the next day a policeman killed; whether it was agreeable that we should have Members of Parliament and priests incarcerated by the dozen. If this is the true state of things—and no one will deny it—is it not conclusive against the noble Lord? Father M'Fadden, trusted and beloved by his flock, has been arrested when surrounded by that flock at the very moment when the Church service was finished, and that ended in a most deplorable case of manslaughter or murder of an unfortunate officer who was merely doing his duty. It has been stated that the Crimes Act created no new crimes. I quoted a statement of Lord Herschell's, in which he clearly established that it did create new crimes, and I asked the noble Marquess to give me an answer. In the absence of my noble Friend (The Earl of Selborne) he declined to do so, though he had his Irish Chancellor on one side, and his English on the other. We have had a judicial declaration that that Act did create a new crime, under which Mr. Harrington is condemned. There were prosecutions for publishing the doings of the National League, and for 16 months they had ceased, but now, when you tell us that Ireland is so much improved, you put a Member of Parliament in prison for what, no doubt, is an illegal act in Ireland, but which is done in England, Scotland, and Wales by his fellow journalists every day with impunity. He was tried before two magistrates, who did not show that legal knowledge which they might be expected to possess, and who absolutely refused to state a case for the superior Court, as the application was frivolous. By some means it was brought before the superior Court, which declared that it was a matter which required most solemn argument. For the sake of argument, I will admit that the O'Brien incidents are all your Lordships say: I will admit that though he is an able and eloquent man he is childish in his temper; I will admit he may be, as stated in some of the London newspapers, guilty of the charges now being brought against all the members of the Irish party. But what is the upshot of all this? The object of punishment is to deter. Mr. O'Brien has been already imprisoned, and it has not deterred him, and he has created immense excitement in this country. If I were a prisoner and I thought I deserved it, I should try to make myself as comfortable as I could. Considering that going into prison confers great honour upon an Irish Member, who is put upon a pedestal not only in Ireland but in all the great cities of this country, I should have thought he would look upon prison clothes as robes of honour. Mr. Balfour is in a difficult—I think an impossible position—but I think he makes the difficulties even greater than they are. I think it was Mr. Chamberlain who said that measures of repression were painful incidents for the Liberal party and were to be deplored, and I believe that is also the opinion of the Government; but it is a great pity that Her Majesty's Government should give some sanction

Zanzibar. In regard to this there are two questions, one with respect to the delimitation of territory under our influence, and the other relating to the joint operations to put down the slave trade. poses are criminal, and it wants no law to make them so. In England intimidation and those things which were dealt with by the earlier clause are criminal, and it wants no law to make them so; and in England the ordinary means of executing the law are sufficient, and we want, therefore, no special powers to be given for that purpose. No such Act of Parliament exists in England, and therefore no similar proclamation can be issued in England, and no offence against that Act could take place in England. To attempt to argue that because you have not got the same Act of Parliament for England things are made criminal in Ireland which are not so in England is a mere fallacy. The things aimed at by this legislation in Ireland are as much criminal in England. The only difference is that the law of England is sufficient when executed by the ordinary means, and therefore we want no special Proclamations making acts done in contravention of them special offences. And these things are not done in England. My noble Friend who last addressed the House, while he has very ingeniously put together a good many things, has left some things out. He began his speech by correcting several deviations from veracity which affected himself as to Foreign Affairs. My noble Friend has not taken notice of the systematic means which are used to delude and deceive the people of England as to matters of fact affecting the administration of the law and the acts of the Government. He has not taken notice of the fact that for the first time in the history of this country means of opposition are used against those whose duty it is to administer the law, of all grades, Ministers of State, magistrates, even policemen, used by those who speak in the name of a great and important political Party, and even by men who have held high offices, such as I venture to say no Government has had to encounter before. Instead of that general support to law which it has been the pride of this country to see ordinarily given by statesmen in Opposition as well as in Office, for the first time organized opposition is directed, not against the policy of opponents, but against the law and the administration of the law. That is a state of things perfectly new. I do not know that the Government have made the mistakes which are sometimes imputed to them; but if they had, it should be borne in mind that they have had to do their duty in such circumstances as no Government in that respect was ever placed in before; and whatever may happen during these years, whatever success the use of such means may achieve, I am quite sure of the verdict which posterity will pass upon those who have used them.

*THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, I have always had this satisfaction in meeting the noble Earl on these occasions—that until we get to that classic land of struggle that appears in all our discussions I have very little to complain of, or to differ from, in what is said by him. I cordially agree in most of the compliments with which he received the first effort in this House of my two noble Friends the Mover and Seconder of the Address. I earnestly congratulate them upon their eloquent speeches, and if I condole with my noble Friend who moved the Address upon the feelings of anxiety with which he said he was afflicted, I would represent to him that this formality which has been to him so terrible is the means of introducing to the debates of this House, as I hope it will be on this occasion also, many effective debaters who, but for this first plunge, would probably never face the ordeal of speaking in this House. The noble Earl complained, I think rather unreasonably, of things which had been left out of the Speech from the Throne. He spoke, among others, of the great and terrible tragedy which has recently been enacted in a friendly country. I earnestly echo the language in which he spoke of that event, and the expressions of sympathy concerning the sorrows that have befallen that great and illustrious Emperor, who for 40 years has struggled so nobly and with such splendid devotion in the performance of the formidable task which has been placed upon him. The sympathy that he has met with in his own country has hardly exceeded that with which this terrible affliction has been received in this allied country of our own. I believe that the deepest sympathy for the Austrian Emperor and Empress, as well as the Austrian people, will be felt. On such a topic as this, however, it is better not to enlarge, but merely to repeat in the words of deepest sincerity that we feel their griefs as if they had been our own. The noble Earl also rather reproached me because the Queen's Speech contained no reference to the ratification of the Convention with respect to the Suez Canal. The noble Earl's authority as to such measures is high. I confess that I have not been able to verify the matter; but my impression is that ratifications are not usually mentioned in the Queen's Speech, though, of course, the conclusion of the Convention always is; and the conclusion of the Convention was duly mentioned at the time. But what, no doubt, has drawn the attention of the noble Earl to the matter is that the ratification has been somewhat difficult, and there has been some delay before we have been enabled to induce the Porte to consent to it. The noble Earl also notices the fact that the Queen's Speech said nothing about Zanzibar. Zanzibar was mentioned in the Queen's Speech of two months ago. It is usually one of the Constitutional functions of the institution of a Parliamentary Recess to secrete new matter for the Queen's Speech; but this Parliamentary Recess has been so short that that ordinary function has not been performed, and really nothing has happened at Zanzibar which we could recommend Her Majesty to include in her Speech. The blockade, so far as I know, has been exceedingly successful. A few slaves have been seized; but the success of the blockade has been seen in the fact that the slave-traders have not been generally seen. We have greatly supplemented its provisions by obtaining from the Sultan of Zanzibar a delegation to the Admirals of the two fleets to exercise in the territorial waters of Pemba and Zanzibar the powers of the Sultan as territorial Sovereign, to seize all Arab dhows that are guilty of the prohibited trade. Pemba is really the place where the slave trade of Eastern Africa is carried on; and if we are successful in preventing that market from being used, and in arresting those Arab dhows in the territorial waters of the island, no doubt we shall add a very considerable impediment to the progress of the trade. But the contest will be a long and difficult one. I believe that the Arabs of the class who live by this traffic are so thoroughly alarmed that they are doing their utmost to keep it alive, and probably we may not have heard the last of their desperate efforts to retain this unholy means of gain. With respect to Samoa, I hope to lay papers on the Table immediately. I think it will be more convenient to defer any discussion of matters affecting those islands until those papers are before your Lordships. There was, as the noble Earl observed, a Conference on the subject at Washington. The Conference was not broken up, but it was adjourned in consequence of a difference of opinion. It will now be renewed, and the deliberations will be taken up again at the point where they were left. The difficulty is really this. A native Government by itself will not stand. The effort to sustain any Government by a kind of tri-partite device of the three co-equal Powers has broken down by the fact that the three co-equal Powers seldom agreed, and the consequence is that there is more friction in the conduct of such Government than even when the native Government is left alone. An effort was made to reconcile the demands of public order with the various rights possessed by the three Powers. We have not arrived at a solution yet which has given satisfaction to all the Powers; but I hope we shall do so. It is a matter as to which our great object is to restore peace and to enable trade and commerce to be conducted satisfactorily. We have no political claim on the island, and the idea which I saw stated in some of the American newspapers that England is guilty of the thought of seizing, in part or in whole, Samoa, has about as much support as those stories with respect to the noble Earl's sporting tendencies in training bloodhounds, or that other report in a foreign newspaper with respect to the sporting tastes of a noble Lord whom I do not see present—that the Duke of Argyll was on the point of going to the South of France with his well-known pack of beagles to hunt wolves. I daresay the noble Earl has come to the conclusion before this that probably there is very little use in contradicting things that are said of him abroad. I do not know that there is any part of the noble Earl's observations outside the subject of Ireland which call for any statement on my part. I made some reference to Bills, the titles of which we have indicated, and he has suggested that I should give a kind of preliminary rehearsal by telling him what the provisions are to be. I am afraid that the performance would be a very unsatisfactory one. It must necessarily be brief and imperfect, and might end by creating misconception. I must therefore ask the noble Earl to wait until, I hope no distant date, when those Bills will be laid on the table. Before the noble Earl sat down he made that obligatory expedition into Irish subjects which is now a necessity of almost all speeches. According to his fashion, he touched the matter lightly; he went deeply into no argument, but assumed most of the contentions of his adversaries for the sake of argument, and as far as I could observe, he committed himself to no positive statement of opinion or policy. But he contrived in the course of this performance, with his usual skill, to suggest a great number of small objections which, though they might not have a formidable influence, still have a decidedly stimulating effect on debate. He made some references to my colleague in the other House, the Chief Secretary for Ireland. I rather shrink from defending the right hon. Gentleman, who is, I think, quite competent to defend himself; especially as it is encouraging what is not a very convenient practice—that of attacking a Minister in the House in which he does not sit. But, whenever the noble Earl is guilty of that offence, I think the least he can do is to frame his accusation in terms sufficiently definite to allow of a reply being made. He did not imitate his leader in accusing my distinguished relative of cynical brutality, but he spoke of cynical observations, or something of that kind. I understand that part of the grievance against the Government is that they have not preserved a sufficiently tragic air in speaking of the experiences of Mr. O'Brien. If any Member of the Government has been guilty of the offence of laughing at Mr. O'Brien, or at the proceedings with respect to his clothes, I would ask the noble Earl, in all confidence, was there ever a prisoner so ridiculous as Mr. O'Brien? It is not possible to speak of him with the seriousness with which you would desire to speak of the case of any gentleman who had the misfortune of incurring a sentence of six months'

imprisonment. But I must demur to the statement that this offence has been especially committed or even has been committed at all by the Chief Secretary for Ireland. I did read one very amusing speech of my right hon. Friend; but the matter that he laughed at was nothing connected with Mr. O'Brien, but was connected with the strange proceedings of the Lord Mayor of Dublin. When a Lord Mayor sends to a Minister's house at two o'clock in the morning, and then publishes a statement that the Minister came down to him in his nightgown, and with the cross of some Order on his left breast, and it turns out that it was the Minister's private secretary who had put on a college jacket, it is very difficult indeed to put on that solemn, tragic air which the noble Lord thinks alone suitable to the circumstances. One of the painful consequences of this controversy is, that Irish people appear to have entirely lost their sense of humour, and they not only do not indulge in those sportive graces of fiction to which in former days they were accustomed, but they never seem to have a notion when they are making themselves ridiculous by their proceedings. I confess that I wish very much that it was possible to avoid any statement that would be wounding to the feelings of any sincere and earnest person; but I do feel that there is no real sincerity in this appeal for the compassion of the English people. It is a great stage-play that is being enacted for the purpose of catching a few votes at a by-election. Mr. O'Brien struggling for his clothes; Mr. Harrington mourning after his moustache; Mr. Healy dashing out of Court; Mr. O'Brien escaping; the insults offered in open Court; and all other business of that kind is only so much theatrical work which is intended to be used on platforms at by-elections to take in those of the English electors who pay little attention to these subjects, and who are easily persuaded that some great oppression is being practised. I entirely agree with my noble and learned Friend who spoke last that it is a disgraceful incident in our public life, and that it marks an epoch of degeneracy in Party struggles when no respect for the law, or for the Ministers of the law, is shown by those who have Party objects to serve, and that no regard to the effect of observations on the maintenance of the law is paid by those who have an opponent's character to blacken. The noble Lord asks us whether the state of things that is going on in Ireland is satisfactory; whether we are pleased with what is done to Mr. O'Brien and Mr. Harrington; and whether that state of things is reconcilable with our assurances that the condition of Ireland is improving, and that the operation of the law that we have passed has been salutary? I can assure the noble Lord that we never thought, never in our wildest dream hoped to improve Mr. O'Brien or Mr. Harrington. We never expect to affect their conduct. Whatever happens they will, no doubt, go on to the end trying to make political capital out of the feelings, the prejudices, and the errors of the Irish people. But what we say is, that we are stealing their following from them by the beneficent legislation that we have passed. We say that the outrages which they have encouraged are no longer so common, that the fabric of oppression and tyranny which they have set up is crumbling to its foundation, that their power is being broken, and that the Irish people are slowly, steadily, and quite perceptibly returning to ways of order and confidence and peace. And it is from the unmistakeable signs of that change that we draw our confident auguries of the future. I would ask your Lordships' leave to read a few figures to show from the unfailing testimony of crime and outrage how real the improvement in the condition of Ireland has been. I will take only two points—the question of agrarian outrages and the question of boycotting. I find that whereas at the height of the crisis during the viceroyalty of Earl Cowper in 1881 the agrarian offences ran up to 4,439, in 1883, under the influence of the Crimes Act, they fell to 870. They rose in 1886 to 1,056. Now they have fallen to 660, which is lower than in any year since the time when the agitation commenced, and lower than it was in 1879, when the number was 863. Therefore, we have right to say that the instrument we use to discourage crime is apparently having its effect. Another test is the rapid disappearance or diminution of that atrocious practice of boycotting which is a very different thing from what it pleases some statesmen to call exclusive dealing. On the 31st of July, 1887, the number of persons Boycotted was 4,835. On the 31st of July, 1888, they sank to 1,179. That was in the first year of the Crimes Act. On the 31st of January last they sank to 555. That was in a year and a-half of the Crimes Act. Therefore, we are justified in saying in the Queen's Speech that the measures which Parliament passed have already had a salutary effect. The noble Lord derives great consolation from the result of by-elections. It is a curious arithmetical study on which Oppositions especially love to dwell during the period they remain in that position. It beguiles its tedium. But I doubt whether the experience of the past can encourage us in drawing any very confident inferences from the result of by-elections. It is natural that it should be so; because, whereas in a general election the attention of the whole people is directed to the burning questions of the day, at a by-election it is very difficult to obtain a similar concentration of views. But I ask the noble Lord to remember what took place in the last decade during Mr. Gladstone's Government of 1869-74. There was a constant succession of by-elections going against the Government; and when the General Election came the by-elections were confirmed and the Liberal Party was defeated. But in the next Ministry the by-elections went for the Government. Everybody remembers the crucial cases of Southwark and Liverpool. Nevertheless, when the General Election came the by-elections were not confirmed, but were reversed, and the Conservative Party were defeated. So that in the two great cases which you have to guide you since the Reform Act of 1867 the by-elections in one case were reversed by the General Election, and in the other case they were confirmed. Therefore, I am justified in saying that it is a perfectly idle study to attempt to cast the horoscope of a future General Election by by-elections. But I confess that I wish to pass from that somewhat ignoble discussion. I do not care, in reference to the course that we are to pursue, what the verdict of a by-election may be. Parliament has been returned to give its advice and to sanction the measures which it honestly believes to be for the advantage of the country. In the performance of that duty it must listen to no superior and take the advice of no authority whatever. It is its business to consult its own wisdom and its own conscience. This Parliament will, I have no doubt, like other Parliaments, perform that duty to the end of its existence, whenever that end may come. What the result of the next General Election may be I will not attempt to forecast. I believe, myself, it will be in favour of the maintenance of the Union, because I have great faith in the sound sense of the English people. The noble Lord thinks that he will, at some distant period, obtain a reversal of the last decision at the poll. Concede, for argument's sake, that it is possible that prophecy should prove true. Does he imagine that that would be a close of the controversy? Does he imagine that our convictions would be affected by that, or that we should struggle a bit the less earnestly than before to maintain, and, if need be, to restore the Union. We are engaged upon an enterprise of momentous importance—that of keeping unimpaired the unity of an Empire which has never been divided yet—an Empire which has lasted for centuries, whose glories we have inherited and which we are bound to transmit. It is not by any passing vicissitudes of political opinion that our duty in such a matter can be determined. To the end, whether through good report, or through evil report, but sustained, I fully believe, by the increasing convictions and the courage of the people of this country, we shall uphold the integrity of the Empire.

N O T I C E.

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): Sir, it will, perhaps, be convenient for the House if I now give notice that when we come to discuss the Address in reply to Her Majesty's most gracious Speech, I propose to move an Amendment upon the paragraph relating to administration in Ireland. I do not know whether I shall be in order in reading the terms of the motion I propose to make. My Amendment will be this:—

"Humbly to represent to your Majesty that the present system of administration in Ireland is harsh, oppressive, and unjust; that it violates the rights and alienates the affections of your Majesty's Irish subjects, and is viewed with reprobation and aversion by the people of Great Britain; and also humbly to represent to your Majesty that such measures of conciliation should be adopted as may bring about the contentment of the Irish people, and establish a real union between Great Britain and Ireland."

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

MR. SPEAKER reported Her Majesty's Speech, made by Her CHANCELLOR, and read it to the House.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HER MAJESTY'S MOST GRACIOUS SPEECH.

*Mr. M. H. SHAW-STEWART (Renfrew), who was attired in the uniform of a Deputy Lieutenant: Sir, I rise to move that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty in reply to the most gracious Speech from the Throne. I believe it is the custom for a Member undertaking this honourable task, to ask for the indulgence of the House, and I can assure you, Sir, and I can assure the House, that in following that custom it is with no sense of any formality, but in all sincerity, that I ask for that indulgence, more especially as I have ventured to address the House only on one previous occasion. Sir, the first portion of the Royal Speech deals with Foreign Affairs, and commences with the gratifying announcement of our continued and cordial relations with other Powers. We are next informed that the operations in Egypt which were carried out by Her Majesty's troops, acting in concert with the troops of His Highness the Khedi, have been entirely successful. Those operations, Sir, were not on an extensive scale, but they afforded an opportunity for a display of tactical skill on the part of the commander, and of a dash and discipline on the parts of the British and native troops, such as are calculated to call forth the admiration and gratitude of all who value soldierly qualities in our own troops and in those of our allies. In their Egyptian Policy, the Government have been bound by certain engagements entered into by their predecessors, and to those engagements they have steadily and loyally adhered. The protection of the ports on the Red Sea was one of the conditions of those engagements, and, Suakim being one of those ports, the Government were bound to assist the Egyptian Government in protecting that place from the hostile attacks which harassed its inhabitants and endangered its safety. Suakim has by the action of the Government been entirely freed from those attacks, and I am sure that the House will learn with satisfaction from the Royal Speech that there is no ground for apprehending their renewal. There have been some who have thought that the Government should have pushed forward the troops and occupied Handoub and Tokar, with a view of re-entering the Soudan. Sir, it is very far from my wish to raise or revive Party questions on the present occasion, but it is necessary to bear in mind that with regard to the policy of evacuating the Soudan, the present Government have had no choice in the matter; for that policy was decided on so long ago as December, 1883, as appears in a despatch from Lord Granville to Sir Evelyn Baring, dated the 13th of that month; and to occupy those places now would involve us in a reversal of that policy, and embark us in a very large and costly enterprise. Sir, with regard to Sikkim, I am sure that this House re-echoes the hope expressed in Her Majesty's Speech, that further military operations will not be necessary, although the negotiations have not yet been favourably settled. In dealing with the Rulers of Thibet, Her Majesty's advisers are dealing with a people well versed in diplomatic delays, but we may trust that they will soon realize the fruitlessness of encroaching on our undoubted rights over the territory of Sikkim. Sir, Her Majesty's Speech has intimated that this country will take part in a Conference at Berlin with Germany and the United States upon the affairs of Samoa. It would not be right further to allude to the subject, except to say that I am sure I am only giving utterance to the sentiments of every Member of this House when I express the hope that the Conference will be attended with happy results, and that the affairs of Samoa will be harmoniously and satisfactorily settled. I will now leave the difficult and delicate subject of Foreign Affairs, believing that the conduct of our foreign relations are, humanly speaking, safe in the hands of the Marquess of Salisbury, to whose prudence and foresight we owe in very great measure the satisfactory state of our relations with other Powers. Sir, the next paragraph is of the utmost importance. It foreshadows increased expenditure, but expenditure which cannot safely be withheld, and in a direction which I do not think will be seriously objected to by anyone who knows anything of the necessities of the case. I cannot conceive, Sir, that any serious opposition will arise as to the expediency of the proposals to be submitted by the Government, although the details will no doubt be the subject of considerable discussion. But I shall leave all further consideration of this subject to my hon. and gallant Friend, who is so well qualified by training and knowledge to deal with it. I will only add that, having some opportunities of knowing the opinions of those engaged in the great mercantile shipping industry of the Clyde, I can safely say that all those who are engaged in every branch of that industry are awaiting with the deepest interest the proposals of the Government and the result of our deliberations upon this vital question. Her Majesty's Speech next directs our attention to a subject which has already occupied this House, viz., Local Government. I believe, Sir, that future politicians will acknowledge as one of the greatest achievements of the present Administration, the development and extension throughout the country of the system of Local Government. It is impossible to regard without the greatest interest that which is passing around us in England at present, as we watch the fruit of our labours of last Session gradually developing since the Local Government Act has come into operation. Sir, it had not been my intention to dwell on the subject of Local Government farther than to allude to the proposed measure for Scotland, but an hon. Member (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) having just called attention to opinions which I have ventured to lay before my constituents, I should not like to lose this opportunity of saying that I stand by all I have said. I am in favour of extending the system of Local Government to all parts of the United Kingdom, but it must be done with prudence, and we must be perfectly certain that the people to whom it is proposed to give increased powers are free agents, and altogether independent of the control of any organization which may be at variance with the laws of the land, whatever those laws may be at the time we extend those powers. Now, Sir, it is with the greatest satisfaction that I turn to that part of Her Majesty's Speech which announces the introduction of a Local Government Bill for Scotland. I read the other day—I think in a speech delivered by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, a suggestion that the discussions on Scottish matters might possibly be dull. Well, Sir, I hope that Scottish members on both sides of the House will allow these discussions to be dull, because my short experience of Parliament has taught me that it is in what are called the dull sittings of this House that the most satisfactory work is performed. We do not know what are the proposals of the Government on the subject, and this is not the time or the occasion to inflict my own views on the House, but I think my hon. Friends from Scotland will agree with me that the whole subject of Local Government in Scotland is of a very difficult and complicated character, and will demand the closest attention of Her Majesty's Government. I believe that the Government will consider the question with the utmost care, and that their counsels will result in the introduction of a sound and efficient measure, drawn up on a broad and popular basis. If any indication were needed of the importance that the Government attach to this measure, I think it may be found in the fact that they have selected for the honourable task of submitting this motion a member returned by a Scottish county constituency. The paragraph which announces proposals to develop the material resources of Ireland will be regarded with pleasure by all who desire to see Ireland a prosperous country. I cannot but think that the time has come when such measures will be most beneficial, seeing that confidence is gradually but surely being restored in Ireland, owing to the firm manner in which the rights and safeguards of individual liberty are being there maintained by the Executive. Sir, the reference to the Sugar Bounties Convention will be received by thousands of working men with great satisfaction. There are a great number of trades besides those directly connected with the sugar trade which are to a certain extent dependent on the sugar trade, and I have seen something of the distress caused in recent years by the unfair operation of the Bounty system. The removal of the Sugar Bounties will place the important industries of sugar-producing and sugar-refining on a stable footing, less liable to violent changes and depressions. Sir, I have heard it objected to the removal of these bounties that the price of sugar will be raised, but I do not anticipate that result. I do not believe the average of those recent years will be raised, because it is only the uncertainty and fear of one country suddenly increasing its Bounty, which prevents a large increase in the sugar-producing area of our colonies. It must be remembered there has been no steadiness in the price of sugar produced in bounty-giving countries, for we find that in the last few years it has fluctuated from between something over 10s. per cwt. to over 16s. Another objection, that it savours of Protection, is I think altogether groundless. Protection, if it means anything, means "an artificial advantage given by a Government to one producer over another." But that is also an accurate description of the Bounty system which this Convention is formed to suppress. So that far from being a Protective measure it actually puts an end to a Protective policy. I think, Sir, we may chiefly rejoice in the fact that the Sugar Bounties Convention receives prominent notice in the Royal Speech, because it is so important that other countries should see that the Government are in earnest and are determined to carry to a conclusion the negotiations so happily and so successfully begun. When this is once clearly understood abroad, there will no longer be any temptation to any one country to withhold its allegiance to the Convention, but on the contrary, there will be every inducement for it to join those which have already come together. We are next informed that measures will be introduced dealing with the Three per cent. Annuities and with the gold coinage, measures which I am sure will be brought to a successful issue in the able hands of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Next in order come proposed changes in the Civil establishment, the mention of which shows the honest desire of the Government to take in hand the timely reforms of our Public Departments. This brings me to the list of what I may call the Arrears of Legislation: measures which it was found impossible to pass into law last Session, but of which the Government realise the importance, and which they are determined to endeavour to pass during the present Session. Sir, the Universities Bill for Scotland is a measure which has received the support and approval of those best qualified to form an opinion on University teaching, and it would be matter for deep regret if it were again found impossible to pass it into law. With regard to the proposed Department of Agriculture, I am not one of those who fear that this great industry has seen its best days in Great Britain and Ireland. On the contrary, I believe we are now standing only on the threshold of scientific discoveries and researches, which, when applied to agriculture, will give it new life and fresh impetus. I think we may look forward to the establishment of the long-expected Department of Agriculture as likely to expedite this desirable application of modern science to the oldest of our industries. Such, Sir, is the programme of Her Majesty's Government, one which I venture to describe as substantial and statesman-like, and which I believe will find general acceptance throughout the United Kingdom. I have only to say in conclusion, that I am so convinced of the wisdom of the proposals contained in Her Majesty's gracious Speech, and of the benefit which will accrue to the country by their being passed into law, that I trust we may soon reach the discussion of them, and that the House will agree without any prolonged delay to the Motion which I now have the honour to submit. Mr. Speaker, I now beg to move, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty as followeth:—

"Most Gracious Majesty,—

"We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal Subjects, the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, in Parliament assembled, beg leave to thank Your Majesty for the Most Gracious Speech which Your Majesty has addressed to both Houses of Parliament:

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for the information that during the brief period that has elapsed since the close of the last Session

nothing has taken place to affect the cordial relations which exist between Your Majesty and other Powers:

"We assure Your Majesty that we learn with satisfaction that the operations which had been successfully completed in Egypt a few days before the last Prorogation, have effected the object for which they were undertaken, and that Your Majesty sees no ground for apprehending the renewal of disturbance in the neighbourhood of Suakin:

"We thank Your Majesty for the information that the negotiations which Your Majesty had directed to be opened with the Rulers of Thibet for the purpose of preventing encroachment on Your Majesty's rights over the territory of Sikkim have not as yet been brought to a favourable conclusion, but that Your Majesty hopes that further military operations will not be necessary.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us that Your Majesty has consented to take part in a Conference with Germany and the United States at Berlin upon the affairs of Samoa, in continuation of that which was recently assembled at Washington.

"We thank Your Majesty for the information that the Estimates for the public service of the year will be laid before us. That the unceasing expenditure upon warlike preparations which has been incurred by other European nations has rendered necessary an increase in the precautions which have hitherto been taken for the safety of our shores and our commerce. That the counsels by which other Powers are guided, and which dispose of their vast forces, are at present uniformly friendly to this country, but that Your Majesty has no right to assume that this condition is necessarily secure from the possibility of change.

"We thank Your Majesty for informing us that some portions of the Bill which was presented to us last year for amending the Local Government of England and Wales were laid aside in consequence of the pressure upon the time of Parliament, and that from the same cause it was found to be impossible to enter upon the question of Local Government for Scotland. That Bills dealing with these matters will be laid before us.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for the information that our early attention will be asked to measures for developing the material resources of Ireland, and for amending the constitution of the various tribunals which have special jurisdiction over real property in that country. We assure Your Majesty that we learn with satisfaction that the Statutes which we have recently passed for the restoration of order and confidence in Ireland have already been attended with salutary results.

"We thank Your Majesty for informing us that legislative provision will be necessary for executing the Convention into which Your Majesty has entered for the suppression of bounties on the exportation of sugar, and also for completing the conversion of the Three per Cent. Annuities. That the state of the gold coinage has for some years past been the subject of legitimate complaint, and that a measure for restoring it to a satisfactory condition will be laid before us.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us that the Commission which Your Majesty appointed to inquire into the Civil Establishments of the United Kingdom has not yet completed its labours, that it has already made a Report of much value, and that proposals for legislation arising out of that Report will be submitted to us.

"We thank Your Majesty for informing us that several subjects which Your Majesty commended to our care in previous years, but which the increasing burden of our duties has shut out from consideration, will be submitted to us again. That in this number will be included Measures relating to tithes, for the regulation of the Universities of Scotland, for determining the liability of employers in the case of accidents, for establishing a Department of Agriculture, for cheapening the transfer of land, and for remedying abuses attaching to Joint Stock Companies formed under limited liability.

"We humbly assure Your Majesty that our careful consideration shall be given to the subjects which Your Majesty has recommended to our attention, and to the Measures which may be submitted to us; and we earnestly trust that in these and all other efforts which we may make to promote the well being of Your Majesty's people we may be guided by the hand of Almighty God."

*SIR J. C. R. COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.), who was attired in the uniform of the Royal Marine Artillery: I may commence, Sir, by asking the indulgence of the House, and the kind and courteous consideration which it is ever ready to extend to those who are anxious neither to trespass upon its time, nor to infringe by one iota upon its ancient privileges and customs. I wish also, Sir, to thank my hon. Friend for his very able speech, and for having dealt with so many matters in so short a space of time, with clearness and with force, and altogether in a manner worthy of the country which he represents. Now, Sir, passing to Her Majesty's gracious Speech, I will venture to say that, looking at the Speech as a whole, it may be taken to indicate that the policy of Her Majesty's advisers is steadfast in its aim, and continuous in its operation, as well as business-like in its character; and I look forward, Sir, with hope to seeing the various measures therein proposed converted into law. I concur generally in all that has fallen from my hon. Friend, and it is unnecessary for me, therefore, to follow in detail his speech, but I cannot help giving a passing reference to the paragraph dealing with the operations against Suakim, for I wish to express satisfaction, on behalf of my constituents, that the black troops showed courage, endurance, and discipline; that our officers who were on the spot showed that their opinions were so trustworthy, and that Her Majesty's Government in trusting to the officers on the spot were so completely and so absolutely vindicated. On behalf of East London, and as one of the representatives of industrial London, I cordially re-echo what has fallen from my hon. Friend with regard to the Sugar Bounties. It has been, Sir, a source of considerable agitation in the East End of London, and I am thankful to think that the persistent exertions of Her Majesty's Government have removed what was a just cause of complaint; and not only, Sir, is this a matter affecting the working-classes of this Kingdom, but what has been done is also regarded with satisfaction by our fellow subjects in the Colonies of Mauritius and the West Indies. I come now to the Employers' Liability Bill, in which working-class constituencies take great interest, and I congratulate the Government on the persistency with which it is pressing the measure. I hope that it will soon become law. And now, Sir, I will venture to offer one or two brief observations with respect to the reference in the Speech to Ireland, and I would ask hon. Gentlemen from that country to remember that my opinions have not been formed from newspaper reports or from reading pamphlets or speeches, but from my long association with the country

itself—an association which I hope will long continue. But the Ireland I know is not the Ireland of certain classes of the Press. All my sympathies and my pleasantest memories are associated with that country. I certainly desire to refrain from saying anything calculated to raise a heated controversy, but I must say that from personal knowledge I can endorse the view that recent legislation has had a salutary effect. Liberty to the individual is returning, and something more is returning as a consequence, and that is hope. Ireland is settling down in the walks of peaceful industry, and I am sure that in developing the resources of Ireland as the Government propose, you will really help people who are ready and willing to help themselves. I hope, Sir, and believe that the development of the natural and material resources of Ireland will be a crowning success, as it must be if it is carried through in a broad and statesmanlike spirit. I believe that as knowledge increases among the Irish people, they will recognize the value and truth of the dictum of Dean Swift, that the truest patriotism may be found in the prosaic work of Agriculture, and in making “two blades of corn grow where one only grew before.” I am rejoiced to see that the land tribunals of the country are to be dealt with, because there has been so much legislation during the two past decades with regard to land that there is a great deal of over-lapping and a great deal of friction which requires to be removed in the transactions of the different Courts. This reform will prove a real and common-sense advantage to the country. It is undoubtedly true, Sir, that order is being restored and that confidence is returning in Ireland, and as order is Heaven's first law, so must it be Ireland's first hope. If you look at the returns of the railways, you will see that there is an increase of traffic, and surely that is good evidence of increased business? The other day, looking at the traffic returns of the Great Southern and Western Railway, which connects the whole of the South and West of Ireland with the rest of that country, and with the United Kingdom, I saw evidence of a remarkable fact which justifies the opinion of Her Majesty's advisers, that in every branch of traffic the receipts have enormously increased, except in one class of traffic, and that is for the transport of troops. And so, Sir, you see that while we have not to pay for the movement of troops to enforce order at the same rate as we formerly had to, the Irish people are getting the benefit of increased trade and business, and the Irish shareholders are reaping the fruits of returning confidence. Besides the beneficent legislation that has been passed to aid the Irish tenantry, and besides the legislation which was unfortunately necessary to restore to a settled state of things the disturbed mind of Ireland, we have to thank also the Executive, from the highest to the lowest, for the courage and resolution with which they have carried out, as it was their duty to do, the law. I now, Sir, will venture to make a few general observations with regard to the one paragraph in the Speech which my hon. Friend left very much to me. I come, Sir, to the announcement as to the increase in the precautions which have hitherto been taken for the safety of our shores and of our commerce, and I venture to say, Sir, that throughout the length and breadth of this Kingdom, and throughout the length and breadth of this mighty Empire, there will be a sense of satisfaction and of thankfulness that the precautions necessary for the safety of our shores and commerce are—at last—to be increased. We have, Sir, no indication as yet as to what those measures are to be, and it would be premature to discuss proposals which may rest after all upon imagination, but we have this, which we have never had before—we have guarantees that the expenditure is not going to be hastily incurred. We have the unusual guarantee that the whole subject has been examined by a Special Committee of the Cabinet, presided over by the Prime Minister himself, and any casual reader even of the daily papers will see how unceasingly—although he is bowed down with his duties and responsibilities as Foreign Minister—Lord Salisbury has applied himself to investigating the question. We have another guarantee that, besides this Committee of the Cabinet, there has been a Royal Commission presided over by the noble Lord, the Member for Rossendale, investigating various branches of this subject. And, Sir, added to all that, we have the most valuable and practical experiments of the Naval Manœuvres, and we have the opinions of the distinguished Admirals who formed a Committee thereupon. Therefore I say that we have ample security that the whole question has been deliberately and calmly examined. Now, Sir, speaking as one of the representatives of the people, and by no means as a professional man, I venture to say, in their name, that we certainly mean to keep our Empire, come what may. We must maintain the freedom of the seas, and we know that the greatest interest of our vast Empire is the interest of peace. We also know from the teaching of history that weakness in defensive power is but a temptation to war and to attack, and, in the interest of peace, therefore, it is that the people of the Empire demand adequate security to be taken against the terrors of war. We confidently hope that these obligations will be faced by the Government, and that their responsibilities will be courageously discharged. Now, Sir, I am not going to detain the House with details, but there are one or two matters which I trust the House will kindly allow me to touch upon. As I said before, I am endeavouring to speak on this question, not from a professional point of view, nor as in any sense representing expert opinion, but simply as a Member of the House of Commons representing a large working class constituency. It is commonly said, Sir, that for the defence of the Empire and of our rights we are ready to spend our last shilling and our last man. But, Sir, it is the first shilling and the first ship which will count the most in modern war, and the country will, therefore, grant whatever funds are necessary for its defence. All it asks, and rightly asks, is that it shall have twenty shillings of real protection for every pound it spends. This is a question, Sir, which affects the industrial classes more than any other class. Trade and commerce are the breath of our National life, and if they are interrupted, even temporarily, by armed forces, the result must be ruin to those who live by commerce. Since this country was last called upon to defend itself, there have been two main fundamental changes in our condition; then the population was practically independent of a supply of food or raw material from over the seas; now it is to the sea that the toiling millions must look for the means of subsistence and for their food. In those days when we last had to defend ourselves, the operations of war were slow in achieving decisive results, and defensive armaments could be hastily devised, but now armaments cannot be improvised, and to be unprepared means, not merely danger, but final destruction. These considerations point primarily to the necessity for having adequate naval protection. But that is not all; we have military duties to perform as well. Across the sea we have great frontiers to defend, and these military responsibilities must be fully and completely discharged. We have recently created works and are providing Naval bases and coaling stations, and these places require to be armed, because, unless they are sufficiently and efficiently garrisoned, they can only aggravate the danger to the Empire. Above all, we must maintain at the highest point of efficiency our sea-going and sea-keeping fleet. I will conclude by expressing the personal hope that the phraseology of the gracious Speech from the Throne means an increase of that Navy to which, under the providence of God, we owe the wealth, safety, and strength of this kingdom. I sincerely thank the House for the kindness with which it has listened to me, and I beg to second the motion of my hon. Friend.*

Motion made and Question proposed, "That," &c. [See page 41.]

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid-Lothian): Mr. Speaker, the speeches of the mover and seconder of the Address, which were heard by the House with respectful and friendly attention, do not, I think, give to those who think as I do on politics any title to complain. They contain, no doubt, the expression of many opinions in which we are unable to concur, and which on fitting occasions it might be our duty to contest. But those opinions were stated by those hon. Gentlemen in the exercise of their Parliamentary freedom from their own point of view with frankness, with care, and intelligence, and with a just observance of Parliamentary usage. I therefore offer them my congratulations upon the creditable manner in which they discharged the task committed to them. One observation alone may call for a word of remark from me before I sit down. But I gladly abstain from anything like detailed comment upon points in those speeches whereupon our opinions may not be in entire concurrence. Following the example of the mover of the Address, I will say a few words with reference to that portion of the Speech from the Throne which relates to foreign politics. I should also state that I am afraid it will not be in my power in such remarks as I have now to make very greatly to advance this debate towards its conclusion. The main interest of the debate—although there are many subjects, I might almost say an unusual number of subjects, of extreme importance and interest—the main interest of the debate must centre in the paragraph relating to Ireland. Bearing in mind that my right hon. Friend near me (Mr. J. Morley) has already expressed his intention of proposing to the House an amendment to that paragraph, I have also to bear in mind the condition in which we are placed by the rules of the House as delivered from the Chair in consequence of the prospect of that Amendment. I believe, Sir, I am right in saying that after that Amendment shall have been moved, it will not be competent for us to enter upon a discussion of those portions of the Speech which precede the passage in the Address where the Amendment would naturally find place. Consequently, I think it is well that it should be understood it would be for the convenience of the House, and be almost a necessity of debate, that whatever observations have to be made, whatever proposals have to be made, hon. Gentlemen should deem these proposals necessary to be made before we arrive at the paragraph relating to Irish affairs, when the Amendment which my right hon. Friend has given notice of his intention to propose upon that paragraph is reached. Therefore, I will make my remarks, which I trust will not be of great length, upon points as they arise. I receive, Sir, with satisfaction the assurances contained in Her Majesty's Gracious Speech that the military operations at Suakin, which reached their termination shortly before the prorogation of Parliament, have been successful in attaining the objects to which they were addressed. I must, however—without going so far as to introduce any subject of reproach—I must say that my satisfaction would have been more lively and would have had greater reference to permanence had it been in the power of Her Majesty's Government to point in this portion of the Speech to any prospective contraction in that quarter of the responsibilities of Egypt, and of the indirect but possible responsibilities which may attach to ourselves in connection with the duties of Egypt on the Red Sea. I am bound to say—I am almost obliged to say—that I do not consider that anything has ever been said by a preceding Government to indicate a permanent policy, or anything like a permanent engagement being entered into with reference to the maintenance of Egyptian establishments in the Ports on the Red Sea. I pass from that—because I do not think that that portion of the Speech calls for special attention—and I come to the question of Samoa. I must there observe upon an omission in the Speech which I greatly regret, because the question of Samoa is evidently one which, either on this occasion or on some future occasion, calls for some clear and detailed explanation. The proceedings have not altogether been of a very simple character. There was some time ago a Commission appointed to sit, and which, I believe, was actually sitting at Washington, for the adjustment of the relations of the three Powers which have an especial interest in the affairs of Samoa. That Commission sitting at Washington was brought to a close for reasons which I do not know to have been explained to Parliament. Time has elapsed, and now we are told, without reference to or explanation of foregoing circumstances, that another Commission or Conference is about to sit at Berlin for the purpose of reversing the decision taken with regard to the Conference at Washington—I beg pardon for having used the word "Commission" in lieu of the word "Conference"—for the purpose of reversing that decision, and for promoting in Conference the settlement of this question. What I certainly hoped, and what I still hope may happen, is that an engagement will be given by the Government that the papers will be laid before us with reasonable promptitude. I do not wish to invite lengthened discussion on this matter at the present time, and I do not think that we can profitably engage in it until we have the papers in our hands. There is another subject of which no notice is taken in this portion of the Speech, upon which I certainly, for one, had expected that Her Majesty's Speech could not be silent—I mean the subject of the state of Zanzibar, and the prosecution of the joint enterprise, for an honourable and philanthropic purpose undoubtedly—the joint enterprise in which Her Majesty's Government has entered along with the German Empire, in relation to the Slave Trade off the Coast of Zanzibar. This is a subject on which I urgently press upon the Government a request for early and ample information—I do not mean so much in the present debate, unless it should be raised, as I suppose is possible, in an explicit and detailed form, by hon. Members in the exercise of their own judgment, either on this or the other side of the House. At any rate, it is desirable that we should soon have information which will enable us to form a judgment upon what has passed and what is passing in that country. Undoubtedly no one would question that incidents have there occurred which are or may be of a character calculated to excite misgiving, apprehension, and regret. I speak now, not of the Convention with Germany with regard to the Slave Trade, but of what has taken place in the interior. And, without any prejudice to the more extended observations which may be made in this debate on the question of Zanzibar, I press earnestly on the Government that it is quite necessary that adequate information should be laid before us to enable us to form a judgment upon the condition of that country. Now, Sir, I come to the paragraph which relates to the Estimates, and I cannot help observing that there is not an absolute equality between the measure which we deal out to ourselves and that which we deal out to foreign countries. When we speak of the increase of our own armaments we speak of "precautions taken for the safety of our trade and commerce." When we speak of the increase of foreign armaments, though the things done are precisely the same, it is no longer the case that foreign countries are to be credited with anxiety about their shores or about their borders, which are as important as their shores, or about their commerce, but changes, which for us are only peaceful precautions, in their case are described by Her Majesty from the Throne as "warlike preparations." I cannot think that this distinction in phraseology is altogether felicitous. But on the subject itself I am much too sensible of its gravity and of its importance, and likewise of the necessity of leaving to Her Majesty's Government a perfectly free and open field for the declaration of what they mean to do and as to the manner in which they mean to do it, to say anything which can imply any foregone conclusion, or which can impede in any degree the exercise of their free action on a very great and urgent subject. But this I will say, that if it be true that there is to be very great addition to the expenditure, which is already not far short of three times what it was at a period within my recollection, it will be certainly the duty of the House to be exacting in the proof of the necessity for that addition. Further, I will say that, instead of speaking with exultation of the undoubted power of this country to discharge all the responsibilities of empire by military means, instead of simply regarding that as a matter of exultation, I hope we shall bear in mind that these augmentations—whether you call them warlike preparations or peaceful precautions—are one of the greatest calamities, and not only one of the greatest calamities, but one of the greatest dangers which threaten our time and the time of our descendants. It is extremely difficult even for those who think that they are rendering but a slow obedience to the call of necessity—and I do not hesitate to give the Government credit for that belief—it is extremely difficult to be absolutely sure that you are not aggravating this evil elsewhere, even while you think that the measures you are adopting are simply those of a needful and wholesome character. I may observe that there was in this country a word which I believe still retains its place in the dictionaries, but which I believe in other respects has faded out of recollection, and in particular out of the recollection of those who at the present time frame the speeches from the Throne—I mean the word economy. It was a

Parliamentary tradition that the Queen should assure Her faithful Commons that economy had been observed in the preparation of the Estimates, and I am bound to say that I do not see, in the assumed necessity, or even in the real necessity, if it should be proved, for the extension of armaments, any adequate reason for the omission to convey to us an assurance of the pledge of Her Majesty that what was to be done should be done with a careful regard for economy in its conception and its execution. I pass on from this important subject, into which I do not think it would become me more deeply to enter, especially at the present time—I pass on to the commencement of those portions of the Speech which relate to coming legislation; and here I must say I cannot withhold my tribute to the courage of Her Majesty's Ministers. It is commonly said that the burnt child dreads the fire. The Government has had experience from which it has unquestionably learned that long catalogues of legislative measures in the Queen's Speech at the beginning of the Session are liable to be grievously and terribly abridged before arriving at the close of the Session, before the records of actual accomplishment can be completed. Her Majesty's Government have had that experience, but their courage is unabated, and I think in the present Speech—although I gladly admit that it is a document which has the recommendation of brevity—a longer catalogue of important measures, and I am afraid a longer catalogue of contentious measures, is promised to Parliament than has been usual even upon former occasions, when not such copious warnings had been delivered by practical experience as to the danger of propounding multitudes of proposals that are not likely to become legislative measures. I will confine myself to this subject generally, without touching upon those measures except in almost a single word. I will confine myself to the expression of a very humble and earnest hope that the Session which we begin to-day may reach its prorogation before Christmas Eve. There is a sentence upon the subject of the Local Government Act with regard to which I shall be glad if a word of explanation can be given. Of course, I do not intend to ask Her Majesty's Government for a description of the various particulars which they may intend to include in their amending Act, but they state that it is intended, with regard to some portions of the Bill which were dropped last year in consequence of the pressure on the time of Parliament, to introduce a Bill dealing with those matters. I think it would be vain to hope that Her Majesty's Government intend by the proposals they may make this year to give that largeness of scope to the valuable Bill of last Session which we on this side of the House desire. But there is one very important subject which was dropped out of the Bill, and with which it does not seem too much to anticipate—and I venture to anticipate—that Her Majesty's Government will deal this Session; I mean, the question of District Councils. That is a subject upon which I ask for no details whatever, but it would be well if the House were apprised that upon that subject at any rate it is intended by the Government to propose legislation. I am afraid that the Government may have reason to expect that those of us who think that the Local Government Bill—honourable as it was to its original propounder in this House and to the Government which was responsible for it—yet does require a far larger provision, a far larger catalogue of legislative provisions and powers, than those with which it has yet been supplied—it may be our duty in some cases undoubtedly to make endeavours for the enlargement of such a measure as they may lay before us. But at any rate it will be satisfactory as far as it goes to know that an important supplementary proposition in aid of the scheme of last year is to be submitted to us on the responsibility of the Government. I accord my best wishes for the measure of Local Government for Scotland. That question, I hope, will not be found to raise difficulties more serious than those which we were enabled to surmount last year. I am quite sure that as far as the capacity of the Scottish people for self-governing operations is concerned it would be impossible to secure a more favourable theatre of operations for any measure aiming at the extension of local privilege and power than the theatre which is offered by the kingdom of Scotland. With regard to the absence of Ireland from the provisions for Local Government, I might indeed express the deep regret with which I noticed that absence. But such an expression would tend to become a part of the discussion into which we are to be drawn, and I therefore pass onwards from that subject without comment. I can only say, upon the subject of the Irish paragraph, without touching upon that which is the most important part of it, that there is nothing in the earlier portions of that paragraph which tends to improve the features of the Irish policy of the Government. I do not understand these measures for the development of the industrial resources of Ireland to be anything but a repetition of old experiments, which have been tried before with large outlay of money, and with total failure for the most part of purpose, and which have constituted, in fact and in the main, an exhibition of our impotence to deal with the great and fundamental interests involved in the government of Ireland. With respect to the landed tribunals in particular—the tribunals having special jurisdiction over land—I hope in the preparation of their measures the Government will bear in mind the extremely delicate nature of the ground upon which they tread, and the state of mind of the tenantry throughout the country in regard to the securities given them for the legislative privileges that they enjoy; and that they will avoid even the appearance of anything which can tend to justify the supposition that there is any intention, avowed or unavowed, under the name of remodelling tribunals, to abridge or endanger any of those privileges. As I have said, I will refrain from making the legislative intentions of the Government the subject of comment. I will only make that observation of which I have already spoken on that part of the speech of the hon. mover, where he expressed his hope that the debate on the Address will not be such as to reach any considerable length. Had there been a doubt in the mind of my right hon. Friend near me as to the necessity of an Irish discussion, the Government have themselves, by an unusual proceeding, but a proceeding that I do not deny to have been undoubtedly within their competence to adopt, settled the question for us. The usual form of drawing the Queen's Speech is not to commit the House on contested matters to an expression of opinion. But the Government on this occasion have thought fit in framing the Address to deviate from that well-established usage. I do not say it is a binding usage. The Government may have a right—I do not enter into that question—to introduce into the Address what they please, though if it is to be done, it is well it should be done after notice to hon. Members. But I do not recollect for very many years a case where the House has been called upon to express its opinion upon contested matter in an Address to the Throne. One sentence read by the hon. mover was as follows:—"We assure your Majesty that we learn with satisfaction that the statutes which we have recently passed for the restoration of order and confidence in Ireland have already been attended with salutary effects." [Cheers.] Hon. Gentlemen opposite are quite prepared, I dare say, to adopt that proposition, but those cheers are the strongest confirmation of the observation which I find it my duty to make, that this declaration in the Speech is a binding one, and therefore to us who do not agree with the proposition set forth, but who, on the contrary, do emphatically dissent from it, is not only a binding, but also distinctly a challenging proposition. If the debate on the Address be a prolonged debate, and if it deal widely with the system of administration in Ireland as it now prevails, it is to the direct action, to the responsible proposals of Her Majesty's Government in the first degree, and to the amendment of my right hon. Friend only in the second degree, that the prolongation of the debate will be due. My right hon. Friend will not shrink from his responsibility. He would have found it his duty to make his proposal even if the form of the Speech had been the usual one. The form, however, is not the usual one, and we resist, and must resist to the utmost, an attempt to pledge us to a proposition with regard to the condition of Ireland, which proposition is, in our judgment, totally untrue. I wish to make only one more observation. Beyond stating that we are compelled to challenge the truth of that proposition, I have not said, and I do not mean to say, a single word upon the Irish question. I venture respectfully to suggest that it will be for the convenience of the House, if there is to be upon the Irish paragraph a distinct motion, debate, and division, that we should separate that debate and discussion entirely from the remarks which we may think it our duty to make on the preceding portions of the Speech, and that we should, if we can, deal with them as separate subjects and reserve for Ireland the advantage of a discussion which will be, of course, proportional to its importance, never, I hope, forgetting the great importance likewise of getting forward with public business; and that we shall not lose the time of the House by casual, partial, and imperfect discussion of the Irish question mixed with a number of other subjects. With these remarks I will conclude what I have to say on the present occasion. I will only now say that if it should be the view of Her Majesty's Government that it would be better to revert to the usual form of Address and to remove the binding statement—if it has crept in through inadvertence and it is desired to amend it—I should be the last person to interpose any technical objection in the way of that amendment. However that may be, it is for Her Majesty's Government to consider. The debate upon Ireland is an inevitable debate. As to the discussion of other questions, important as they are, I trust we shall recollect that as to most of them the fullest opportunities are certain to be afforded to us in the development of the business of the Session. In regard to all of them we shall endeavour to evince a desire which I think, in the last Session of Parliament, we (the Opposition) did evince, to avoid the unnecessary prolongation of debate, and to forward the business of the House.

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): My first duty is to join in the congratulations which have been offered to my hon. Friends behind me with regard to the manner in which they have discharged the very difficult duty of moving and seconding the Address to the Crown. The speeches from my hon. Friends give promise of great usefulness in the part my hon. Friends may take in discussions in this House, which I feel confident will be amply fulfilled. I may perhaps be permitted to refer to the last observations of the right hon. Gentleman before I proceed to deal with his earlier remarks. The right hon. Gentleman has made an offer to the Government to assist them in removing from the Address a passage which he said would bind the House to an expression of opinion, but I am not aware that there is any marked difference in the tone and character of Her Majesty's Speech from the Speeches which preceded it under the Government of the right hon. Gentleman himself. In the Queen's Speech reference has always been made to Ireland and to the success of the measures which have been adopted for Ireland.

MR. GLADSTONE: It was not the form of the Speech, but the form of the Address, that I complained of.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I do not enter into any question with the right hon. Gentleman as to the form of the Address, as the right hon. Gentleman is much more a master of matters of that kind than I can be; but my impression is that the Address is framed in the usual form, and that it is simply an echo of the Speech. The right hon. Gentleman has reminded the House that we must have a debate on Ireland. We recognize that, under the circumstances in which we are placed, a debate on the affairs of Ireland, on the Administration of Ireland, and on the conduct of the Administration of Ireland is one which we must be prepared to meet thoroughly and completely in the face of the country and of the House. We are perfectly ready to meet the challenge which the right hon. Gentleman, the Member for Newcastle has thrown down. But, like the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, I trust that regard will be had to the exigencies of the public service, and to the duties which the House has to discharge in addition to those with reference to Ireland. Taking the advice which the right hon. Gentleman has given, I will refrain from making any allusion to the state of affairs in Ireland until we come to the debate on that subject. Now I will turn to the observations which fell from the right hon. Gentleman in regard to Foreign Affairs. The right hon. Gentleman expressed his satisfaction at the result of the operations at Suakin; but he insisted that there was no indication on the part of the Government of any prospective contraction of the responsibilities of

we learn with satisfaction that the Statutes which we have recently passed for the restoration of order and confidence in Ireland have already been attended with salutary results.

"We thank Your Majesty for informing us that legislative provision will be necessary for executing the Convention into which Your Majesty has entered for the suppression of bounties on the exportation of sugar, and also for completing the conversion of the Three per Cent. Annuities. That the state of the gold coinage has for some years past been the subject of legitimate complaint, and that a measure for restoring it to a satisfactory condition will be laid before us.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us that the Commission which Your Majesty appointed to inquire into the Civil Establishments of the United Kingdom has not yet completed its labours, that it has already made a Report of much value, and that proposals for legislation arising out of that Report will be submitted to us.

"We thank Your Majesty for informing us that several subjects which Your Majesty commended to our care in previous years, but which the increasing burden of our duties has shut out from consideration, will be submitted to us again. That in this number will be included Measures relating to tithes, for the regulation of the Universities of Scotland, for determining the liability of employers in the case of accidents, for establishing a Department of Agriculture, for cheapening the transfer of land, and for remedying abuses attaching to Joint Stock Companies formed under limited liability.

"We humbly assure Your Majesty that our careful consideration shall be given to the subjects which Your Majesty has recommended to our attention, and to the Measures which may be submitted to us; and we earnestly trust that in these and all other efforts which we may make to promote the well being of Your Majesty's people we may be guided by the hand of Almighty God."

*SIR J. C. R. COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.), who was attired in the uniform of the Royal Marine Artillery: I may commence, Sir, by asking the indulgence of the House, and the kind and courteous consideration which it is ever ready to extend to those who are anxious neither to trespass upon its time, nor to infringe by one iota upon its ancient privileges and customs. I wish also, Sir, to thank my hon. Friend for his very able speech, and for having dealt with so many matters in so short a space of time, with clearness and with force, and altogether in a manner worthy of the country which he represents. Now, Sir, passing to Her Majesty's gracious Speech, I will venture to say that, looking at the Speech as a whole, it may be taken to indicate that the policy of Her Majesty's advisers is steadfast in its aim, and continuous in its operation, as well as business-like in its character; and I look forward, Sir, with hope to seeing the various measures therein proposed converted into law. I concur generally in all that has fallen from my hon. Friend, and it is unnecessary for me, therefore, to follow in detail his speech, but I cannot help giving a passing reference to the paragraph dealing with the operations against Suakim, for I wish to express satisfaction, on behalf of my constituents, that the black troops showed courage, endurance, and discipline; that our officers who were on the spot showed that their opinions were so trustworthy, and that Her Majesty's Government in trusting to the officers on the spot were so completely and so absolutely vindicated. On behalf of East London, and as one of the representatives of industrial London, I cordially re-echo what has fallen from my hon. Friend with regard to the Sugar Bounties. It has been, Sir, a source of considerable agitation in the East End of London, and I am thankful to think that the persistent exertions of Her Majesty's Government have removed what was a just cause of complaint; and not only, Sir, is this a matter affecting the working-classes of this Kingdom, but what has been done is also regarded with satisfaction by our fellow subjects in the Colonies of Mauritius and the West Indies. I come now to the Employers' Liability Bill, in which working-class constituencies take great interest, and I congratulate the Government on the persistency with which it is pressing the measure. I hope that it will soon become law. And now, Sir, I will venture to offer one or two brief observations with respect to the reference in the Speech to Ireland, and I would ask hon. Gentlemen from that country to remember that my opinion have not been formed from new reports or from reading; phl the country my long

itself—an association which I hope will long continue. But the Ireland I know is not the Ireland of certain classes of the Press. All my sympathies and my pleasantest memories are associated with that country. I certainly desire to refrain from saying anything calculated to raise a heated controversy, but I must say that from personal knowledge I can endorse the view that recent legislation has had a salutary effect. Liberty to the individual is returning, and something more is returning as a consequence, and that is hope. Ireland is settling down in the walks of peaceful industry, and I am sure that in developing the resources of Ireland as the Government propose, you will really help people who are ready and willing to help themselves. I hope, Sir, and believe that the development of the natural and material resources of Ireland will be a crowning success, as it must be if it is carried through in a broad and statesmanlike spirit. I believe that as knowledge increases among the Irish people, they will recognize the value and truth of the dictum of Dean Swift, that the truest patriotism may be found in the prosaic work of Agriculture, and in making “two blades of corn grow where one only grew before.” I am rejoiced to see that the land tribunals of the country are to be dealt with, because there has been so much legislation during the two past decades with regard to land that there is a great deal of over-lapping and a great deal of friction which requires to be removed in the transactions of the different Courts. This reform will prove a real and common-sense advantage to the country. It is undoubtedly true, Sir, that order is being restored and that confidence is returning in Ireland, and as order is Heaven’s first law, so must it be Ireland’s first hope. If you look at the returns of the railways, you will see that there is an increase of traffic, and surely that is good evidence of increased business? The other day, looking at the traffic returns of the Great Southern and Western Railway, which connects the whole of the South and West of Ireland with the rest of that country, and with the United Kingdom, I saw evidence of a remarkable fact which justifies the opinion of Her Majesty’s advisers, that in every branch of traffic the receipts have enormously increased, except in one class of traffic, and that is for the transport of troops. And so, Sir, you see that while we have not to pay for the movement of troops to enforce order at the same rate as we formerly had to, the Irish people are getting the benefit of increased trade and business, and the Irish shareholders are reaping the fruits of returning confidence. Besides the beneficent legislation that has been passed to aid the Irish tenantry, and besides the legislation which was unfortunately necessary to restore to a settled state of things the disturbed mind of Ireland, we have to thank also the Executive, from the highest to the lowest, for the courage and resolution with which they have carried out, as it was their duty to do, the law. I now, Sir, will venture to make a few general observations with regard to the one paragraph in the Speech which my hon. Friend left very much to me. I come, Sir, to the announcement as to the increase in the precautions which have hitherto been taken for the safety of our shores and of our commerce, and I venture to say, Sir, that throughout the length and breadth of this Kingdom, and throughout the length and breadth of this mighty Empire, there will be a sense of satisfaction and of thankfulness that the precautions necessary for the safety of our shores and commerce are—at last—to be increased. We have, Sir, no indication as yet as to what those measures are to be, and it would be premature to discuss proposals which may rest after all upon imagination, but we have this, which we have never had before—we have guarantees that the expenditure is not going to be hastily incurred. We have the unusual guarantee that the whole subject has been examined by a Special Committee of the Cabinet, presided over by the Prime Minister himself, and any casual reader even of the daily papers will see how unceasingly—although he is bowed down with his duties and responsibilities as Foreign Minister—Lord Salisbury has applied himself to investigating the question. We have another guarantee that, besides this Committee of the Cabinet, there has been a Royal Commission presided over by the noble Lord, the Member for Rossendale, investigating various branches of this subject. And, Sir, added to all that, we have the most valuable and practical experiments of the Naval Manœuvres, and we have the opinions of the distinguished Admirals who formed a Committee thereupon. Therefore I say that we have ample security that the whole question has been deliberately and calmly examined. Now, Sir, speaking as one of the representatives of the people, and by no means as a professional man, I venture to say, in their name, that we certainly mean to keep our Empire, come what may. We must maintain the freedom of the seas, and we know that the greatest interest of our vast Empire is the interest of peace. We also know from the teaching of history that weakness in defensive power is but a temptation to war and to attack, and, in the interest of peace, therefore, it is that the people of the Empire demand adequate security to be taken against the terrors of war. We confidently hope that these obligations will be faced by the Government, and that their responsibilities will be courageously discharged. Now, Sir, I am not going to detain the House with details, but there are one or two matters which I trust the House will kindly allow me to touch upon. As I said before, I am endeavouring to speak on this question, not from a professional point of view, nor as in any sense representing expert opinion, but simply as a Member of the House of Commons representing a large working class constituency. It is commonly said, Sir, that for the defence of the Empire and of our rights we are ready to spend our last shilling and our last man. But, Sir, it is the first shilling and the first ship which will count the most in modern war, and the country will, therefore, grant whatever funds are necessary for its defence. All it asks, and rightly asks, is that it shall have twenty shillings of real protection for every pound it spends. This is a question, Sir, which affects the industrial classes more than any other class. Trade and commerce are the breath of our National life, and if they are interrupted, even temporarily, by armed forces, the result must be ruin to those who live by commerce. Since this country was last called upon to defend itself, there have been two main fundamental changes in our condition; then the population was practically independent of a supply of food or raw material from over the seas; now it is to the sea that the toiling millions must look for the means of subsistence and for their food. In those days when we last had to defend ourselves, the operations of war were slow in achieving decisive results, and defensive armaments could be hastily devised, but now armaments cannot be improvised, and to be unprepared means, not merely danger, but final destruction. These considerations point primarily to the necessity for having adequate naval protection. But that is not all; we have military duties to perform as well. Across the sea we have great frontiers to defend, and these military responsibilities must be fully and completely discharged. We have recently created works and are providing Naval bases and coaling stations, and these places require to be armed, because, unless they are sufficiently and efficiently garrisoned, they can only aggravate the danger to the Empire. Above all, we must maintain at the highest point of efficiency our sea-going and sea-keeping fleet. I will conclude by expressing the personal hope that the phraseology of the gracious Speech from the Throne means an increase of that Navy to which, under the providence of God, we owe the wealth, safety, and strength of this kingdom. I sincerely thank the House for the kindness with which it has listened to me, and I beg to second the motion of my hon. Friend.*

Motion made and Question proposed,
"That," &c. [See page 41.]

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid-Lothian): Mr. Speaker, the speeches of the mover and seconder of the Address, which were heard by the House with respectful and friendly attention, do not, I think, give to those who think as I do on politics any title to complain. They contain, no doubt, the expression of many opinions in which we are unable to concur, and which on fitting occasions it might be our duty to contest. But those opinions were stated by those hon. Gentlemen in the exercise of their Parliamentary freedom from their point of view, and with intelligence and integrity, and therefore

upon the creditable manner in which they discharged the task committed to them. One observation alone may call for a word of remark from me before I sit down. But I gladly abstain from anything like detailed comment upon points in those speeches whereupon our opinions may not be in entire concurrence. Following the example of the mover of the Address, I will say a few words with reference to that portion of the Speech from the Throne which relates to foreign politics. I should also state that I am afraid it will not be in my power in such remarks as I have now to make very greatly to advance this debate towards its conclusion. The main interest of the debate—although there are many subjects, I might almost say an unusual number of subjects, of extreme importance and interest—the main interest of the debate must centre in the paragraph relating to Ireland. Bearing in mind that my right hon. Friend near me (Mr. J. Morley) has already expressed his intention of proposing to the House an amendment to that paragraph, I have also to bear in mind the condition in which we are placed by the rules of the House as delivered from the Chair in consequence of the prospect of that Amendment. I believe, Sir, I am right in saying that after that Amendment shall have been moved, it will not be competent for us to enter upon a discussion of those portions of the Speech which precede the passage in the Address where the Amendment would naturally find place. Consequently, I think it is well that it should be understood it would be for the convenience of the House, and be almost a necessity of debate, that whatever observations have to be made, whatever proposals have to be made, hon. Gentlemen should deem these proposals necessary to be made before we arrive at the paragraph relating to Irish affairs, when the Amendment which my right hon. Friend has given notice of his intention to propose upon that paragraph is reached. Therefore, I will make my remarks, which I trust will not be of great length, upon points as they arise. I receive, Sir, with satisfaction the assurances contained in Her Majesty's Gracious Speech that the military operations at Suakin, which reached their termination shortly before the prorogation of Parliament, have been successful in attaining the objects to which they were addressed. I must, however—without going so far as to introduce any subject of reproach—I must say that my satisfaction would have been more lively and would have had greater reference to permanence had it been in the power of Her Majesty's Government to point in this portion of the Speech to any prospective contraction in that quarter of the responsibilities of Egypt, and of the indirect but possible responsibilities which may attach to ourselves in connection with the duties of Egypt on the Red Sea. I am bound to say—I am almost obliged to say—that I do not consider that anything has ever been said by a preceding Government to indicate a permanent policy, or anything like a permanent engagement being entered into with reference to the maintenance of Egyptian establishments in the Ports on the Red Sea. I pass from that—because I do not think that that portion of the Speech calls for special attention—and I come to the question of Samoa. I must there observe upon an omission in the Speech which I greatly regret, because the question of Samoa is evidently one which, either on this occasion or on some future occasion, calls for some clear and detailed explanation. The proceedings have not altogether been of a very simple character. There was some time ago a Commission appointed to sit, and which, I believe, was actually sitting at Washington, for the adjustment of the relations of the three Powers which have an especial interest in the affairs of Samoa. That Commission sitting at Washington was brought to a close for reasons which I do not know to have been explained to Parliament. Time has elapsed, and now we are told, without reference to or explanation of foregoing circumstances, that another Commission or Conference is about to sit at Berlin for the purpose of reversing the decision taken with regard to the Conference at Washington—I beg pardon for having used the word "Commission" in lieu of the word "Conference"—for the purpose of reversing that decision, and for promoting in Conference the settlement of this question. What I certainly hoped, and what I still hope may happen, is that an engagement will be given by the Government that the papers will be laid before us with reasonable promptitude. I do not wish to invite lengthened discussion on this matter at the present time, and I do not think that we can profitably engage in it until we have the papers in our hands. There is another subject of which no notice is taken in this portion of the Speech, upon which I certainly, for one, had expected that Her Majesty's Speech could not be silent—I mean the subject of the state of Zanzibar, and the prosecution of the joint enterprise, for an honourable and philanthropic purpose undoubtedly—the joint enterprise in which Her Majesty's Government has entered along with the German Empire, in relation to the Slave Trade off the Coast of Zanzibar. This is a subject on which I urgently press upon the Government a request for early and ample information—I do not mean so much in the present debate, unless it should be raised, as I suppose is possible, in an explicit and detailed form, by hon. Members in the exercise of their own judgment, either on this or the other side of the House. At any rate, it is desirable that we should soon have information which will enable us to form a judgment upon what has passed and what is passing in that country. Undoubtedly no one would question that incidents have there occurred which are or may be of a character calculated to excite misgiving, apprehension, and regret. I speak now, not of the Convention with Germany with regard to the Slave Trade, but of what has taken place in the interior. And, without any prejudice to the more extended observations which may be made in this debate on the question of Zanzibar, I press earnestly on the Government that it is quite necessary that adequate information should be laid before us to enable us to form a judgment upon the condition of that country. Now, Sir, I come to the paragraph which relates to the Estimates, and I cannot help observing that there is not an absolute equality between the measure which we deal out to ourselves and that which we deal out to foreign countries. When we speak of the increase of our own armaments we speak of "precautions taken for the safety of our trade and commerce." When we speak of the increase of foreign armaments, though the things done are precisely the same, it is no longer the case that foreign countries are to be credited with anxiety about their shores

or about their borders, which are as important as their shores, or about their commerce, but changes, which for us are only peaceful precautions, in their case are described by Her Majesty from the Throne as "warlike preparations." I cannot think that this distinction in phraseology is altogether felicitous. But on the subject itself I am much too sensible of its gravity and of its importance, and likewise of the necessity of leaving to Her Majesty's Government a perfectly free and open field for the declaration of what they mean to do and as to the manner in which they mean to do it, to say anything which can imply any foregone conclusion, or which can impede in any degree the exercise of their free action on a very great and urgent subject. But this I will say, that if it be true that there is to be very great addition to the expenditure, which is already not far short of three times what it was at a period within my recollection, it will be certainly the duty of the House to be exacting in the proof of the necessity for that addition. Further, I will say that, instead of speaking with exultation of the undoubted power of this country to discharge all the responsibilities of empire by military means, instead of simply regarding that as a matter of exultation, I hope we shall bear in mind that these augmentations—whether you call them warlike preparations or peaceful precautions—are one of the greatest calamities, and not only one of the greatest calamities, but one of the greatest dangers which threaten our time and the time of our descendants. It is extremely difficult even for those who think that they are rendering but a slow obedience to the call of necessity—and I do not hesitate to give the Government credit for that belief—it is extremely difficult to be absolutely sure that you are not aggravating this evil elsewhere, even while you think that the measures you are adopting are simply those of a needful and wholesome character. I may observe that there was in this country a word which I believe still retains its place in the dictionaries, but which I believe in other respects has faded out of recollection, and in particular out of the recollection of those who at the present time frame the speeches from the Throne—I mean the word economy. It was a

Parliamentary tradition that the Queen should assure Her faithful Commons that economy had been observed in the preparation of the Estimates, and I am bound to say that I do not see, in the assumed necessity, or even in the real necessity, if it should be proved, for the extension of armaments, any adequate reason for the omission to convey to us an assurance of the pledge of Her Majesty that what was to be done should be done with a careful regard for economy in its conception and its execution. I pass on from this important subject, into which I do not think it would become me more deeply to enter, especially at the present time—I pass on to the commencement of those portions of the Speech which relate to coming legislation; and here I must say I cannot withhold my tribute to the courage of Her Majesty's Ministers. It is commonly said that the burnt child dreads the fire. The Government has had experience from which it has unquestionably learned that long catalogues of legislative measures in the Queen's Speech at the beginning of the Session are liable to be grievously and terribly abridged before arriving at the close of the Session, before the records of actual accomplishment can be completed. Her Majesty's Government have had that experience, but their courage is unabated, and I think in the present Speech—although I gladly admit that it is a document which has the recommendation of brevity—a longer catalogue of important measures, and I am afraid a longer catalogue of contentious measures, is promised to Parliament than has been usual even upon former occasions, when not such copious warnings had been delivered by practical experience as to the danger of propounding multitudes of proposals that are not likely to become legislative measures. I will confine myself to this subject generally, without touching upon those measures except in almost a single word. I will confine myself to the expression of a very humble and earnest hope that the Session which we begin to-day may reach its prorogation before Christmas Eve. There is a sentence upon the subject of the Local Government Act with regard to which I shall be glad if a word of explanation can be given. Of course, I do not intend to ask Her Majesty's Government for a description of the various particulars which they may intend to include in their amending Act, but they state that it is intended, with regard to some portions of the Bill which were dropped last year in consequence of the pressure on the time of Parliament, to introduce a Bill dealing with those matters. I think it would be vain to hope that Her Majesty's Government intend by the proposals they may make this year to give that largeness of scope to the valuable Bill of last Session which we on this side of the House desire. But there is one very important subject which was dropped out of the Bill, and with which it does not seem too much to anticipate—and I venture to anticipate—that Her Majesty's Government will deal this Session; I mean, the question of District Councils. That is a subject upon which I ask for no details whatever, but it would be well if the House were apprised that upon that subject at any rate it is intended by the Government to propose legislation. I am afraid that the Government may have reason to expect that those of us who think that the Local Government Bill—honourable as it was to its original propounder in this House and to the Government which was responsible for it—yet does require a far larger provision, a far larger catalogue of legislative provisions and powers, than those with which it has yet been supplied—it may be our duty in some cases undoubtedly to make endeavours for the enlargement of such a measure as they may lay before us. But at any rate it will be satisfactory as far as it goes to know that an important supplementary proposition in aid of the scheme of last year is to be submitted to us on the responsibility of the Government. I accord my best wishes for the measure of Local Government for Scotland. That question, I hope, will not be found to raise difficulties more serious than those which we were enabled to surmount last year. I am quite sure that as far as the capacity of the Scottish people for self-governing operations is concerned it would be impossible to secure a more favourable theatre of operations for any measure aiming at the extension of local privilege and power than the theatre which is offered by the kingdom of Scotland. With regard to the absence of Ireland from the pro-

Egypt or of this country in regard to the Ports of the Red Sea. We have had to consider whether the circumstances are so greatly changed from those under which the obligations were entered into by the late Government as to justify us in advising the Government of Egypt to relinquish that which we believed, and which the late Government believed, to be necessary for the security of Egypt, and also to be necessary for that policy of the suppression of the slave trade to which this country has been so long committed. We believe that at present the possession of Suakin is necessary to the safety and security of Egypt. We are of the same opinion as that under which the Government of the right hon. Gentleman acted four years ago, and no circumstances have occurred to justify us in tendering advice to the Government of the Khedive that the Port of Suakin should be relinquished in favour of those whose object and endeavours have been to disturb the tranquility and prosperity of Egypt. I think we have made great progress towards a settlement, and an approach to a period of prosperity—progress much greater than we could have reasonably expected within the time during which our influence has been exercised, and we have every reason to rely on the prudence, judgment, and good sense of those who administer the government of that country. The right hon. Gentleman has remarked on the omission from the Speech of any paragraph in reference to Samoa, and he regretted there was no policy indicated. The right hon. Gentleman was hardly accurate in suggesting—I do not know that he stated—that Her Majesty's Government are responsible for the suspension of the Conference which sat at Washington. The Conference is to be renewed at Berlin, and papers are in course of preparation and will be presented to the House; but it would not be proper that Her Majesty's Government, pending the proceedings of that Conference, should express any strong opinion as to the course which has been pursued in Samoa. We have, however, the assurance of the German Government that they do not recede from the engagement which they gave to respect the rights of the English and Americans in Samoa, and we have complete confidence that the German Government will abide by their engagements, and carry them out to the fullest extent. As to Zanzibar, no one could have read the accounts of the proceedings in the interior of Africa without the deepest regret, but Her Majesty's Government are not responsible for the course which has been pursued. Germany acts within her perfect right in the course she has taken. She is exercising no powers beyond those given under the arrangements made by the late Government in 1885; and we certainly have no right, as a nation or as a Government, to complain of the course which has been pursued by her. Papers are in course of preparation. The right hon. Gentleman has referred to the paragraph relating to the Estimates, and he regretted that the word "economy" was omitted. If it will be any satisfaction to the right hon. Gentleman and to the House, I will say that the greatest possible regard has been paid to economy in the preparation of the Estimates for the services of the country, but we think that it is rather unnecessary to refer to economy and to take credit for economy at a time when our sense of public duty compels us to ask for a larger provision for the public service. Economy has been most strictly, rigidly applied, and when the Estimates come before the House for consideration it will be found, I am confident, that the Civil Service Estimates show evidence of economy, and that even in the military and naval departments evidence of economy will be exhibited—facts which, in my opinion, are far more valuable to the House and the country than the introduction of words in the Speech from the Throne. We prefer to give evidence of serious work in this direction rather than to talk loudly of it. Then the right hon. Gentleman complains that we attribute somewhat different motives when we come to refer to the warlike preparations of others; we do not use the same language or attribute the same motives to ourselves when we speak of the defences and precautions necessary for the security of the country. We attribute no unworthy motives to other nations. We do not venture to call in question—we have no right to call in question—the disposition made by foreign countries of their resources at their disposal. We do not question their right to do with their resources as they think fit—to increase their armaments, their armies, and their navies. We say what we believe to be the attitude at the present moment of every European Power—we say that it is absolutely friendly to this country. We have no reason to doubt their assurances or mistrust their good intentions, but the enormous armaments that prevail in Europe are of such a character that those who are entrusted with the great and responsible duty of caring for the security of our interests, our trade, our commerce, cannot but regard them as dangerous, as menacing to our interests. We do not know, but we do hope and believe, that we shall not be threatened by any combination of any Foreign Powers; but, Sir, if I would say anything on this head, it would be to re-echo the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman as to the evils, the misfortune, these enormous armaments entail upon those who have to bear the cost. It is not for me to say in any case such armament is not necessary for the safety of the Power making it, but these armaments entail an expenditure and create a danger which is alarming and serious to Europe. It is deeply to be deplored by Europe at large; but, in view of it, it becomes our duty to take such precautions for defence alone as may be necessary to protect the country. I will not venture to enter into these precautions, because an opportunity will be afforded on Thursday next, when my noble Friend, the First Lord of the Admiralty, will lay the proposals of the Government before the House. We have carefully considered these proposals. We believe them, upon our responsibility as a Government, to be necessary for the safety and security of the Empire. We do not frame them from any hostile purpose or inclination towards any Government on the face of the earth. We simply desire to protect and render safe the interests and the trade of the country, its food supplies, and the raw material which come into the country, and which is necessary for manufactures and for the employment of the people. The right hon. Gentleman has spoken of the long catalogue of measures and its liability to abridge them; I am afraid he is only right. I am afraid of a long list of measures when he says th in the Queen's Speech details a number of measures the Government desire to lay before Parliament, but a list undoubtedly liable to curtailment; but I venture to think that if we had put before the House some two or three measures only as those we desired the House to consider, we should have been reproached by the right hon. Gentleman and his Friends for ignoring what in their view were many burning questions ripe for solution. I have some hope that Members of Parliament, looking to the importance of the questions to be submitted to their consideration, will, for the time, deny themselves the satisfaction of prolonged debate on measures which have been well considered in principle, and that they will allow these Bills, so far as the details are concerned, to go again before those Standing Committees which rendered great service last year. I hope that the Session may be terminated under these circumstances before Christmas Eve, and I hope hon. Members will contribute to that result by some amount of self-denial and by the avoidance of the repetition of arguments used by previous speakers. I appeal to them to do that in the interest of business. The country requires legislation, and it is the duty of the Government at least to give the House of Commons an opportunity of considering these measures. The responsibility will rest with individual Members of the House of Commons if by protracted debate this is prevented. The right hon. Gentleman referred to the Local Government Bill, and expressed the hope that the portion which referred to the District Councils would be submitted to the early consideration of the House. My right hon. Friend who conducted the Bill with marked ability and conciliation will reintroduce that measure as soon as engagements will permit. We shall redeem our engagement. I am not aware of any other point which requires an answer.

MR. GLADSTONE: Will the District Councils Bill precede the Scotch Bill?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: No, Sir, it will not. We think that our engagement to Scotland to introduce the Local Government Bill for Scotland stands first, and we shall introduce it without delay. This measure has received the favourable consideration of Scotch Members on both sides of the House, and I trust it will have been mainly developed by Scotchmen. No doubt these settlements have been the most prosperous establishments in that part of the world. There has been no introduction of the liquor traffic there, such as has been so prejudicial in many other settlements we have established. We can look upon the settlements founded here as of a very legitimate kind indeed, and I think that it would ill become Her Majesty's Government, who are entrusted with the interests of our country in all parts of the world, to be remiss or blind to anything affecting the position and safety of our settlements in this part of Africa, and of absolute free access to them from the seaboard. I venture to make these few remarks, because, undoubtedly, it was a matter of great surprise to me, and it will be a matter of great surprise to others, that this, which is a matter relating to foreign affairs of the greatest interest, and which stands in a most critical position, is entirely omitted from Her Majesty's Speech. I would press the right hon. Gentleman (the Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs) to put us, at as early a date as possible, in possession of further information, and I would call his attention to the extreme interest felt in the question by the people of Scotland.

*COLONEL EYRE (Lincolnshire, Gainsborough): I wish to make a few observations on the following passage contained in the gracious Speech from the Throne:—

"The unceasing expenditure upon warlike preparation which has been incurred by other European nations has rendered necessary an increase in the precautions which have hitherto been taken for the safety of our shores and our commerce."

I am glad to see that Her Majesty's Government have at length recognised the position we are in, having regard to the enormous armaments of continental nations. An immense change has come over our foreign neighbours in this respect of late years. Their armies are now numbered by millions where, a few years ago, they were only numbered by hundreds and thousands, and it therefore seems to me imperative, looking at our peculiar position, that we should strengthen our forces, both naval and military. In former times, in what has been called juventus mundi, our forefathers were in the habit of drawing inferences in favour of peace or war from the flight of birds, but in these less imaginative days we find indications in the state of the money market. When the Funds of a foreign nation drop we have every reason to believe that there are causes behind that induce a feeling of insecurity. But even then we may be deceived, and twenty-four hours before the outbreak of the Franco-German war Foreign Office experts asserted that at no time had there been a more peaceful aspect throughout the Continent. Within forty-eight hours, however, the most gigantic war of the century commenced. We have no reason to assume that what occurred at that time will not be repeated, therefore, much as we may deplore that civilization at the end of the nineteenth century employs its arts and expends large sums of money in elaborating the means for destroying human life, it is necessary we should be prepared with the means of defence for Great Britain, and the equally or more important greater Britain beyond these island shores. For the last forty years our belief, whether rightly or wrongly I will not stop to argue, has been to depend almost entirely on foreign imports for the necessities of life, and in proportion to this dependence we should increase the means of protecting our water ways. Comparison with foreign navies should not be by number of ships or amount of tonnage, but we should have in view the naval work to be done. In addition to our own water ways we have our colonies to protect, and we must remember that we have to send our troops out to the continent of India. The only way we can help our army there is by sending troops by way of the Suez Canal or round the Cape of Good Hope, and we must remember that the former of these was a doubtful passage, seeing that the sinking of a single ship in the Canal would stop all naval communication for weeks, and possibly for months. Therefore, in time of war we may have to rely on the Cape route, and upon large transport ships in the foreign stations, ships which will have to be relieved from year to year; and in these days of steam it is necessary that we should have coaling stations in different parts of the world. It ought to be distinctly laid down, therefore, what is expected of our Navy; and it would be false economy if we failed to put ourselves in such a position that we might feel ourselves safe from the combination of any two Great Maritime Powers on the Continent. I never have believed, and never shall, in the actual invasion of this country. I think the system of attack will be to cut off our food supply; and, unfortunately, it is the fact—and at no time except just after the harvest—is there more than six months' provisions in the country. Therefore the cutting off of our water way would mean the starvation of the working classes. I believe that whatever sum of money Government may demand from the country for providing adequate means of defence will be cheerfully and willingly given. At no time more than the present during the last thirty years has there been a general feeling throughout the country that it is necessary to do something for the defences of the country. Before I sit down there is another point to which reference is made in Her Majesty's Speech to which I should like to make reference. We are told that provision is to be made for Local Government in Scotland. I am glad that the Government are going to extend the immense advantages to Scotland which have accrued to England from the Local Government Bill of last year. It is impossible to exaggerate the amount of interest which has been taken in the Local Government Bill of last year by all classes of the people, and especially by the working classes. I believe that in the future wise measures of this kind will greatly tend to strengthen the constitution of the country. I am told that more than a hundred Peers of the Realm have been elected upon the County Councils, and I believe that the position of the House of Lords will be enormously strengthened in consequence. Then, again, a very large number of Magistrates have been elected; and I am certain that their experience will be of the utmost value in the new experiment which is about to be tried in reference to Local Government. I am satisfied that the extension of Local Government to Scotland will have the same beneficial effects as in England; and I may add that it will have this additional advantage—it will bring home, day by day, to the working classes the duties which devolve upon them as citizens.

In former times, in my own division, the working classes took little interest even in Parliamentary elections before they obtained the suffrage, and they are now looking with deep interest to the importance of the votes which have been entrusted to them.

*MR. SAMUEL SMITH (Flintshire): I desire, Sir, to offer a few words with regard to the omission from the Queen's Speech of all reference to the Education question as it relates to England and Wales. This I consider to be a very serious defect. I would point out that we have had two very important Commissions on Educational questions within the last two years—one of which was the Technical Education Commission, which collected a most valuable body of evidence, and whose recommendations have been before the country for several years, although up to the present moment they have never been acted upon by the Legislature. Besides this, we have had in two Speeches from the Throne references to the subject of technical education, and still no beneficial result has been brought about, while this year all allusion to the question has been ignored. When we consider how the people of this country are suffering from the competition of Germany and other countries in which technical education is promoted, I feel sure there will be a feeling of great disappointment throughout this country if nothing should be done during the present year in the shape of legislation upon this subject. I would also call attention to another, and an equally important, Commission which reported last year—I allude to the great Royal Commission on elementary education. We never had a stronger Commission, nor one which took greater pains to collect evidence, or which has reported with greater force, clearness, and ability. Their report covers some 400 pages, and the Blue Book in which it is printed contains an enormous mass of important information. With many of the suggestions made by the Commission all friends of education must agree, and I am happy to think it is not the intention of the Government to legislate on any of those questions which would disturb the settlement arrived at in 1870, and which was accepted by the country. I wish, however, to call attention to the great recommendation of the Royal Commission, and establish a national system of evening continuation schools, in which the attendance should be made obligatory up to 15 or 16 years of age. For my part, I believe that no Government could confer a greater blessing on the country than the Government which succeeds in successfully grappling with this important question. I have taken the pains to make considerable inquiry into the subject, and I find that the working-classes are practically unanimous in their desire for continuation evening schools. I may mention that no fewer than 5,000 memorials are in process of signing, and will be sent up to the Prime Minister and the Education Department, in favour of this system, and, as far as I know, not a single Trades Union has objected to the recommendation. The fact is, that the period in which education proves to be of the greatest value is after children leave school, say from 12 to 17, when character is being formed. Up to the age of 12 children have not the intelligence which would enable them to understand the uses of education, whereas, during the years which elapse from 12 to 16 or 17 you may sow the seeds either of a good and useful career, or of a useless and disreputable one. I ask, therefore, that this House should take up and deal with this question, and that, instead of paying so much attention to affairs in every other part of the world, we should look at home and see what we can do to remedy the sad deficiencies of our educational system. For these reasons I greatly regret that the Government have given no place to this important subject in the Speech from the Throne. I am sure that there is felt throughout the country an amount of interest in this matter of which many here have no conception, and that if the present Government shrinks from dealing with it, from mistaken notions of economy, they will only leave to their successors the honour and glory of passing a measure which will confer inestimable blessings on the children of this country. I believe that false ideas of economy have much to do with the present position of matters. We are told that ten millions of money, or some other large sum, is to be asked for the construction of ironclads and the increase of our armaments, and I am one of those who would not object to any expenditure that is proved to be necessary for the proper defence of the country; but I believe that better and far more lasting results can be obtained from the improved education of our people and in properly training our children at that critical period when so many of them go astray. An expenditure for such a purpose would be one that would bring about the richest possible reward. Let us grant that it would add half a million to the burdens of the country. The amount is hardly worth talking about, especially when we remember that few countries spend so small a proportion of their revenue on national education as England, which certainly expends in this way far less than France, Germany, the Scandinavian countries, and the United States do relatively to the income of those countries. By spending the amount I have mentioned, you will be certain hereafter to reap the benefit of it ten, twenty, and even fifty times told. And, Sir, I should not only like to see evening continuation schools established, but I should also like them to be free schools; in fact, I should like to see all our elementary education made free, as is now the case in most of the civilized countries of the world. In connection with this question, I cannot forbear alluding to the cognate subject of Welsh intermediate education, to which I am sorry to see the Government have made no reference in the Queen's Speech. They are aware that we have had Bill after Bill on this subject brought before Parliament for several years past; and, also, that the people of Wales feel the strongest and deepest interest in it. Wales is greatly in need of Imperial aid for the creation of a more complete system of high-class schools, and the Welsh people have been deeply disappointed year after year by the neglect of this question, on which their hearts are so firmly set. I think the matter is one on which the Government might be reasonably expected to meet the representatives of Wales halfway, without any sacrifice of principle on their part. Of course, I can hardly expect that a Conservative Government will take any step in the direction of Welsh Disestablishment. The question will only be settled when a Liberal Government comes into power. But we may expect them to do something for the Welsh people in the way of higher education, especially when they know the amount of discontent which exists on account of the neglect of Welsh questions generally. If the Government could only meet them half-way, by conceding what they ask in the matter of education, they would do something towards allaying the discontent which is prevalent in regard to other questions. Apologising to the House for having occupied so much more time than I had intended, I will conclude by expressing a hope that this Session will not be allowed to end without the passage of some useful measures of social legislation—legislation that will touch the hearts and consciences of the people, and which I am persuaded is earnestly desired by the country at large.

*SIR RICHARD TEMPLE: I had no intention of intervening in this debate, and should not have done so but for the remarks which have just fallen from the hon. Member opposite (Mr. S. SMITH). I feel that some reply, however slight, ought to be given from these benches. In the first place, I must renew the tribute I have often paid to the zeal and earnestness evinced by the hon. Gentleman on the subject of education generally, and on certain branches of it in particular. There is no hon. Member of this House who has greater claims to respect, not only from this own side, but from both sides of the House, for his efforts in the cause of education, than the hon. Member. He not only preaches, but he also practises the doctrine he enunciates. The hon. Gentleman has complained that the subject of education has been omitted from the Queen's Speech. I may state that I am no more in the secrets of the Government than he; but I can readily imagine that in the crowded state of public business there are many useful measures they would gladly propose, but which they would not be able to carry out during the present session. It may be the intention of the Government to carry out by executive action some of the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Education. But if there is any difficulty in legislation the hon. Member has himself supplied one reason at least. He has referred to the question of free schools. There is no better way of applying the torch to the combustible embers of controversy on the subject of education than by urging the question of free schools. Surely he must know this raises up the whole controversy between the voluntary and national system on the one side and the Board School system, which I unworthily represent, on the other. He speaks of free education. Well, that, probably is at the bottom of the difficulty in legislation; certainly it is as regards elementary education. But when he speaks in such terms of moving pathos about the numbers of poor parents who are dragged, in his imagination, before the magistrates by the School Board officers for not sending their children to school because they could not pay the school fees, let me assure him that that is a picture which is greatly exaggerated, because parents in the position thus described are not taken before the magistrates, for the school fees of their children are remitted. The difficulty in respect to the free system does not, in fact, concern the poor, but concerns the class above them and the lower middle class. Once fees are abolished, it will be very difficult to exclude the middle classes from the benefit of that principle, and then the question will arise whether we are to have the middle class educated at the cost of the ratepayers at large. Well, there are large classes in this country who think otherwise—who hold the doctrine that the first duty of an independent Englishman is to pay for the education of his own children, so far as he can. Those who plead this doctrine of free education, in the manner adopted by my hon. Friend, quite forget that the greater part of the cost of elementary education is paid for by the public already. We have made a recent calculation in London, and it shows that at this moment eleven-twelfths of the cost of elementary education in the metropolitan area is defrayed by the ratepayers, so that, with all the talk of hardship in levying the fees, only one-twelfth of the actual cost of elementary education falls upon the parents. There is thus no grievance whatever. One can readily understand why the Government should hesitate to set aflame the embers of the educational controversy which my hon. Friend wishes to stir up. Apart from legislation, we might have some of the matters which my hon. Friend has indicated dealt with by executive action. In a revised Code, for instance, we might have payment by results much softened and greatly modified in the way which the teachers, both of Board and voluntary schools, greatly desire. Then, in regard to continuation schools, my hon. Friend, in his philanthropic zeal and enthusiasm, has again allowed himself to be drawn into the vortex of exaggeration. My hon. Friend makes the most astonishing statement, that our great cities are swarming with poor, uneducated children, who wander about the streets in idleness and neglect. But is it not the fact that one great reason why parents in both town and country object to the compulsory clauses of the Education Act is, that they want their children to work, in order to eke out the family's subsistence? And in the towns the children earn a certain pittance and livelihood for themselves out of school hours. The truth is, the children are urgently required not only for domestic duties at home, but actually to earn something towards the family purse; and I appeal if this is not a truer description of the real facts of the case than that given by my hon. Friend. That being so, what becomes of the superstructure of my hon. Friend? But apart from that particular argument, I cordially endorse the principle of my hon. Friend's remarks. I earnestly support him in his warm contention, and I hold it is a matter of great national importance that we should have a system of continuation schools. My hon. Friend says that evening classes in England have died out. I say they certainly have not died out in the metropolitan area, for which I am responsible, because there are more evening classes, better organised and better attended, than anything of the kind which has existed before. The London School Board began that system about six years ago; they have been gradually working it out, and I doubt not that Birmingham, Manchester, and other large towns are doing, or certainly could be got to do, a similar work. My hon. Friend entered into some general statistics as to the numbers likely to attend the continuation classes. But when he gives large round numbers I think he should be reminded that the proper basis of calculation is the number of children that leave school annually. Now the number of children who leave the London Board schools annually is about 40,000, and in the voluntary schools about 25,000, and if we can obtain a certain modification in the Code, it is quite possible they might be able within a very few years to secure an attendance at the evening classes not far short of 40,000. My hon. Friend has spoken of half a million attending these evening classes throughout the country. That is a very high computation.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH: I think we ought to have half a million in attendance at our evening classes, providing that the account may range from 13 to 16 years. Remember we have four and a half millions under school age.

*SIR RICHARD TEMPLE: It appears to me to be a very high figure, but at this short notice I am not able to check the calculation. But supposing it is half a million, we must look at the question of the cost. In my opinion the cost would not be excessive, provided we did not adopt the doctrine of free education. At this moment the number of continuation schools in London probably costs the local rates and the Government together something over 10s. a scholar, perhaps 12s., so that half a million of scholars might be arranged for at a cost of about a quarter of a million sterling. That is of course a manageable sum, but once the principle of free education is adopted, the cost would be excessive, and then we should have an educational burden indeed. I venture to warn my hon. Friend that the educational burden is beginning to be felt very heavily both in town and country, and any attempt to increase it would cause great dissatisfaction. If evening schools are to be made successful, the curriculum must be at once improved, and why that has not been done I cannot understand. A year or two ago a memorial was presented to my right hon. Friend the Minister of Education from the London School Board suggesting alterations and improvements which could have been carried out by a wave of my right hon. Friend's hand or a stroke of his masterly pen. But we were told we must wait the Report of the Royal Commission. We have that Report now, I entreat my right hon. Friend to give the modifications asked for, and if that is done I will undertake within a year or two to the Government are about to place upon the taxpaying portion of the community, and which I regard as entirely unnecessary. I believe the expenditure already made upon the Navy would, if properly and economically used, and used with common sense, be more than sufficient for all the purposes of defence, not only of the shores but of the mercantile marine. I would not hesitate to stand before any commercial community, and announce exactly this same view, and though, perhaps, it is always popular to raise a cry of the country in danger and to call out for more expenditure upon the Army and Navy, it is the duty, at any rate of those on the Liberal side of the House, to protest, and let our protest be endorsed as far as possible by the taxpayers of the country.

MR. MARK J. STEWART (Kirkcudbright): The hon. Member for Flintshire (Mr. S. Smith) has introduced the subject of education, and I desire to say a few words from the point of view from which I regard the matter. My experience, and I have had a great deal in rural districts of Scotland, as Chairman of a large School Board, is that at the present moment there is a very great desire on the part of the parents to have their children better educated than they are in the Board Schools in Scotland. They do not blame the teachers. The teachers do their best, but the time at their disposal is so very limited that it is impossible for them to devote any real time to the teaching of higher education. Of course Board Schools are in the main intended to supply the mere rudiments of education, but that has never been held sufficient for Scotch children. The result is, that instead of improving scholarship in Scotland, the present School Board system has deteriorated it. The system is no doubt an immense boon to the greater number of children, but for those children who are most anxious to make progress it has a very bad effect. It does not offer any real incentive or stimulus to the prosecution of matters which such children are expected to learn in after life, and under such circumstances, in view of the competition in foreign nations in matters requiring real technical education, we shall very soon find that our children are a long way behind. It has been said to-night that there is a strong aversion on the part of parents to keep their children at school even as long as they are now required to do, and that if you supplement the system by evening schools that aversion would perhaps be even too strong to overcome. I do not see the point of that at all. My belief is that all the children might be taken from school at twelve instead of thirteen; they could at once go to the evening schools, and there obtain much greater knowledge than they would if they continued at the elementary schools another year or so. There is, no doubt, a strong aversion to burdening the rates in any way whatever; that would be resented not only by the parents, but, generally speaking, by the whole of the community. But what has been suggested elsewhere, and what, I think, is only a fair suggestion, is that the nation should take its part in educating the children of the country. It is false economy to say we cannot afford to do it. I would much rather spend more money on education than on the defence of the country, though I think that expenditure on both objects is essentially needful at the present time. I rejoice to learn from the Queen's Speech that the Government have not abandoned the intention to establish a Department of Agriculture. I trust that what has been done by dairy schools will be continued in other directions, so that to the fullest extent science will be brought to bear upon agriculture, in the production of better crops and such improvements as are necessary to enable our farmers to meet the foreign competition which they have to face.

SIR DONALD CURRIE (Perth W.): My hon. Friend the Member for Hull (Mr. C. H. Wilson) has protested against the action proposed by the Government in regard to the defence of the Empire. Although my hon. Friend is one of the largest shipowners in the country, I hardly think he represents the mercantile shipping opinion of the country when he declares that the merchant shipping community are unfavourable to the proposed expenditure. I hold the very contrary. No menace to other Powers is intended: all that is made is a declaration that there is a necessity for precaution to be taken. It is said in the Speech, "The increasing expenditure upon warlike preparations which has been incurred by other European nations has rendered necessary an increase in the precautions which have hitherto been taken for the safety of our shores and our commerce." I hold that we require this expenditure for the protection of the Channel; for the defence of our position in the Channel it is absolutely necessary to have a largely increased Fleet. For the protection of the carrying trade of the country such a Fleet is absolutely essential, though you would find that steamers of ten knots an hour, which carry grain in such large proportions to this country, would have very little employment under the British flag if we were at war with a large and important foreign Power. Further, I hold that for the defence of the Colonies an increased fleet is essential. I entertain the strongest opinion that we are utterly unable to compete against a combination of any two Powers such as might occur. The present, however, is not the time to enter into detail; an opportunity of doing so will shortly arrive. In the meantime, I answer the protest of my hon. Friend by an equally strong disclaimer.

MR. W. MACDONALD (Queen's Co., Ossory): I think I may fairly congratulate the Government on the form of Her Majesty's Speech. It is slightly more original than usual. Some of the old worn phrases have been dropped, and, altogether, the Speech is a fairly readable document. But when I pass from the form to the various subjects touched upon, I cannot be equally laudatory. There is, as usual, a statement as to the condition of affairs at home and abroad, and there is an enumeration of the measures which the Government intend to submit to Parliament. The allusion in the Speech to foreign affairs is singularly brief. We are told that the relations with Foreign Powers continue to be friendly, but I think we are bound to ask whether these relations are on a permanent basis of security. I gather from an allusion later on in the Speech, that the Government have some misgivings on this point. Personally, I think that the relations between this country and the United States are by no means so satisfactory as those who really wish for the well-being of both countries desire. There is the Fishery question between Canada and the United States, which is not yet settled, and I cannot altogether congratulate the Government on the way in which they have managed the negotiations. The Government sent to the United States as their representative in the negotiations the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain). It no doubt occurred to the Government that the right hon. Gentleman was a very clever intriguer, and that he might possibly turn his talents against them. The right hon. Gentleman had intrigued against a former colleague of his, the late Mr. Forster; he had intrigued with the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell), he had intrigued against the hon. Member for Cork; he had intrigued with Captain O'Shee, he had intrigued with the Times, and no doubt it occurred to our sagacious rulers that it would be a good thing to find employment for him, lest he should intrigue against them. Accordingly, they employed him on this mission. It at first appeared that the experiment would be successful. The right hon. gentleman was feted, speeches very complimentary to this country were made by distinguished Americans, and the right hon. Gentleman was congratulated upon the work he had done, not only by his allies and friends, but even by some of his opponents. But a few months passed, and when the time arrived for the ratification of the Convention which had been drawn up between the United States and this country, the Senate of the United States threw the thing up, and almost all the labours of the right hon. Gentleman proved in vain. Why did they prove in vain? Because of the feeling entertained towards the right hon. Gentleman by the Irish race. If the Government had had sufficient sagacity to send a man who was not hated as the right hon. Gentleman unfortunately is by the Irish race at home and abroad, the probability is the negotiations would have taken a different turn. I hope there is one lesson which the country will learn from this failure, and that is, that until you satisfy the demand of Ireland there will always be in America an element of disturbance, an element which you will have to reckon with more or less. Then we are entitled to ask, with regard to foreign affairs, whether we have "Peace with Honour," a phrase which hon. Gentlemen opposite were once so fond of using. Have the Government shown any care or tender regard for the honour of this country? Your Ambassador was returned his papers and sent away from the United States because of his interference in domestic politics in that country, and yet I cannot find that one word of remonstrance was addressed to the American Government, or that this spirited Government took the smallest means of showing that an affront had been offered to this country. Again, a very odious charge has been brought within the last month or two against the gentleman who now represents this country at St. Petersburg. The charge was of the basest nature, and I don't believe it. It was made in a most offensive manner, and yet I cannot find that the Government made any remonstrance. I cannot find that there was anything like a manly, outspoken expression of indignation on the part of the Government at the treatment of their representative. There is an instructive lesson in all this. Some of us have watched carefully the public character and career of the Prime Minister, and have fancied at times that we noticed in him a disposition to bully the weak and to truckle to the strong. I am afraid the same disposition has been manifested lately. Where the strongest Governments are concerned there is nothing like a manly, outspoken assertion of English rights, but when the Irish Members are to be insulted, or the people of India are to be insulted, because they are supposed to be weak, there is plenty of strong language used by the head of the Government. Coming to home affairs we are brought face to face with the eternal question of Ireland. What have you done the House has been doing in that country, and what have you to show as the result of your action? You have imprisoned for six months with hard labour, an hon. Friend of mine well-known for his moderate and reasonable speeches in this House. You have imprisoned him for publishing in his paper a speech he delivered, at what you are pleased to call a suppressed banquet of the Irish National League. Removing him from the gaol in which he was confined to the Fortress of Tallin, you carried him in an outside car in prison dress through the streets of his native town, without an overcoat, and then you put him in a third-class railway carriage. My hon. Friend is as well known, and as much respected among his own people and constituents as any Metropolitan member is in this city. You thought to degrade him, but in truth you raised him in the estimation of his countrymen. The admiration we had for him as a journalist and a Member, has deepened into respect and affection since your persecution of him. I need not go over the treatment of my hon. friend, the Member for North Cork. That gentleman does not think he ought to be treated as a common criminal, but the Chief Secretary, who could not meet my hon. friend on the floor of this House, and who felt the great injury his cause suffered from the speeches of my hon. Friend, employed warders to strip my hon. Friend by force, notwithstanding everyone knew the delicacy of his constitution, which, indeed, is stamped upon his features. If you subsequently changed your treatment, and restored him his habiliments, you did so not from any feeling of humanity, but in deference to the storm of indignation raised throughout the country. Then how have you acted towards my friend, as I am proud to call him, Father McFadden of Wicklow? You sent to arrest him immediately after mass in the midst of his admiring flock. No priest is more beloved or more deserving of the love of the population. He is widely known for his philanthropy, his humanity, and his efforts to promote the industry and comfort of his people. This priest you sent a District Inspector to arrest after mass when the people were strongly under the influence of their affection for their pastor, and you are surprised at the fury that resulted? You have actually the audacity to insult Father McFadden, and the whole priesthood of Ireland with a charge of complicity in murder? Is such a proceeding in the interest of law and order you profess yourselves so anxious to preserve? What have you gained by this display of force, this outrage to the country in Ireland? We may form a ridiculous notion of what the Government think they have gained from a speech delivered by the Chief Secretary to a small number of Unionists. The right hon. gentleman discovered a great improvement in the material condition of Ireland because deposits in Irish Savings Banks had greatly increased, and this he assumed was entirely due to the firm policy of the Government. But I should have thought the veriest tyro in Irish affairs would attribute this to a very different and less high-flown cause. There has been a great increase in the price of stock, enabling farmers to put by more money than heretofore. The relations between the police and the people, said the Chief Secretary, were improved, and then the very next day we have this deplorable murder of a police officer at Gweedore. The right hon. Gentleman quoted statistics, at which he usually sneers, perhaps because he has no special faculty for dealing with them—they require an impartiality of mind he does not possess. Boycotting, he said, had diminished something like 70 per cent. I have always felt very sceptical as to these boycotting returns. Suppose a Government set about tabulating the number of persons boycotted by the Primrose League in this country, would not the statistics present a very different appearance prepared under the authority of right hon. Gentlemen on that side or on this? In fact, these boycotting returns may be made big or small at pleasure. They afford cover for coercive legislation, but they do not afford sufficient information to allow of verification. Then, it is said, outrages were 200 fewer in 1888 than in any year since 1879. But there the statement stops, and I attach little importance to it. Under the term outrages are included not only murder, conspiracy to murder, and manslaughter, but also threatening letters and the taking of forcible possession—an offence that means that some unfortunate wretch, driven out on the hillside in midwinter, crept back to his dwelling for shelter for himself or kin. We do not want to know if offences of this kind or threatening letters have diminished, but whether murder, and what we all recognise as serious crimes have diminished. Show us this clearly, and we may be inclined to recognize some improvement in the state of Ireland. Until then I must preserve my scepticism and conclude that all this straining of the law, all this cruelty to Irish Members, all this harshness, all these insults heaped on the priesthood of Ireland have had no compensating advantage to the side of the Government, into all this despotism with which the Government of Ireland has degenerated must go down before investigation and the light of public opinion. As to proposed litigation, we are rejoiced that proposals for local government in Scotland are to be brought forward this Session. Scotch business has been very much neglected, and the complaints of Scotch Members are amply justified. I am glad the Government are trying in a small way to repair the evil. But, I confess, my mind is not altogether easy on this subject. In years long ago, before I sat here, I used to constantly hear that Scotland was governed in accordance with the wishes of Scotch people, just as if a Parliament sat in Edinburgh; but I have long since ceased to accept such a statement. Again and again, I have seen the wishes of Scotch members set aside and overlooked by the votes of English Members holding different political views to the majority of the people of Scotland, and I am very much afraid that in this Bill some crucial question will arise, when this same thing will be repeated, and my Scotch friends will be on a purely Scotch question overvoted by English Members. Should that be so, I hope the lesson will sink deep into the hearts of the people, that never can Scotland really attain justice until a Parliament for Scotland legislates for the wishes of the people, unclogged by English votes. I observe in the Speech no promise of any Local Government Bill for Ireland, and from the point of view of an Irish Member I do not regret that for one I am absolutely convinced that no mere Local Government Scheme will satisfy the demand of the Irish people for a Legislature in Dublin. That demand would be just as strong though a Local Government Bill were passed, but the fact of the omission is worth noting, with the recollection that hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite pledged themselves over and over again on the hustings and through the mouth of the noble Lord, the member for Paddington to “simultaneity,” in the treatment of Great Britain and Ireland. Where is the approach to “simultaneity”? You shift this over from that the question of the housing of the industrial classes has found no place in the Queen's Speech. It must be perfectly clear to all Members who have read the report of the Royal Commission on the Housing of the Poor, published in 1885, that the question is one of urgent importance. My hon. Friend the Member for Bristol referred just now to the East of London, but I must remind the House that there is a South of London and a West of London. It is well known that there are poor people living within 200 yards of the House, whose homes are a disgrace to civilization. It must not be forgotten that the question now stands upon an entirely different footing to that on which it stood in 1885. We had not then, as we have now, a thoroughly representative Municipal body for the whole of London. We have now a County Council who, if they have not already sufficient powers, should have them at once. I hope that the Government will either bring in a Bill upon the subject or give facilities for the consideration of the measure which is to be introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Hoxton (Mr. Stuart). I have made these observations in no party spirit, but because I feel that the present condition of the dwellings of the poor is a disgrace to the country and demands immediate attention.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway County, N.): I am afraid that there is one subject which has been slurred over in the speech from the throne. The seconder of the address (Sir John Colomb) in his excellent speech made one remarkable assertion. The hon. Member sits for a Metropolitan constituency, and he dealt ably with such topics as he understands; but he certainly made an unfortunate reference to Irish matters. He spoke of law and order having been restored in Ireland. When we look around us we miss many of our colleagues who are locked up in prison or are awaiting their trial. That sort of talk might do in a Primrose Cabinet, but it is altogether absurd in the House of Commons. The Queen's Speech contains some reference to the policy of developing the material resources of Ireland. I am glad to find that the Chancellor of the Exchequer finds it necessary to do something for Ireland, and looking at the words put into the mouth of Her Majesty, we may, perhaps, assume that the policy of evasion pursued by the Government on this subject during the last two and a-half years will no longer be followed up. We were told then of the great Conservative policy of developing the resources of Ireland, but more than two years have elapsed, and absolutely nothing has been done. They said that in the first place we must have a Royal Commission. Well, we have had a Royal Commission, but it reported a year and a-half ago, and nothing has been done. The noble Lord the Member for Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill) made promises, but the Government have done nothing to redeem them, and I think it is their duty now, at the beginning of the Session to explain to the House how we stand in the matter. All that the Government did when they received the Report of the Royal Commission was to take the most difficult part of it—that which referred to drainage and navigation combined—and they insisted on dealing with that or nothing. They proposed that a large amount of money should be spent out of local resources upon the drainage of the Shannon and the Barrow, which the people of Ireland thoroughly objected to; and they did nothing for the general improvement of the Irish harbours and railways. They are now more solemn than ever in their promises; but as there has not been, during the last six or twelve months, any increase in armaments on the part of the European Powers, I do not think the Government are justified in neglecting the development of the resources of Ireland, and demanding a large sum of money on behalf the Naval and Military Services. All this expenditure might have been foreseen by the Government, seeing that the expenditure on the part of Foreign Powers has been a gradual one. Her Majesty's Government should have made their preparations earlier, and I believe the money would have been more profitably expended. They now propose to spend a large sum of money all at once, and at least one-half of it will be wasted. At present our relations with foreign countries are satisfactory, but the Foreign Minister may say "we may be in difficulties with a foreign country, and it is well to be prepared." If that were said I should not think it would be out of the way to ask for £1,000,000 or £2,000,000 at the outside. However, if the Government should say it is insufficient my reply would be. "Then you have been neglecting your duty during this past two years." We must remember that our foreign neighbours have been spending these vast sums on armaments for the last 8 or 10 years and that they have made no change in their policy during the past 6 months—if they had changed their policy, no doubt a change of policy on the part of Her Majesty's Government would be justified. At present, no doubt we are beating the air, the Government having given us no information as to how much they intend to spend. But should their proposal be to spend as much as £12,000,000, the result would be that the contractors will revel in it, the War Department will indulge in every conceivable fad, the country will get only £4,000,000 or £5,000,000 of value, and the House of Commons will lose control over the Estimates. More than that, a precedent will have been set for future gigantic expenditure. I think the War Minister and the Lords of the Admiralty ought to imitate the economy of those of their predecessors who have endeavoured to make money go a long way, and not imitate the extravagance of Mr. Wm. Pitt, who burdened this country with a debt of hundreds of millions. I hope the Government will, as soon as possible, give us some indication of the amount of money they are going to ask for.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): This debate has been somewhat desultory, because by common consent the discussion of the most important questions mentioned in the Queen's Speech has been postponed until the Measures are before the House. Hon. Members have complained of omissions from the Speech, but that is a little at variance with the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian, who hinted in his remarks that perhaps Her Majesty's Government had fallen into the error of proposing too many Measures. There are, I think, plenty of topics for the consideration of Parliament which in due time will engage its attention. I have risen principally to notice remarks made by some hon. Members which deserve reply, and particularly those made by the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Buchanan), who has in a very temperate speech referred to subjects which have in former Sessions been discussed by him. The hon. Member takes a warm and very natural interest in the safety of trading and mission stations in Central Africa. Well, I cannot on this occasion say anything of a different nature to what I have said before, which is that, while those stations, whether commercial or missionary, are entitled to all the respect that belongs to enterprises most honourable in themselves and involving great personal sacrifices on the part of their promoters, it is impossible for Her Majesty's Government to undertake the responsibility of imposing on this country any burdens in connection with them. These enterprises are undertaken by the free act of their promoters, and are in a region with which the Government of this country are not in immediate contact, and in which no assistance the Government can render them could proceed from any base. It is therefore impossible that Her Majesty's Government could give any indication that those persons could depend upon any material assistance from them. I have stated that there are certain things that Her Majesty's Government will require on behalf of those persons. When the Portuguese endeavoured to close the Zambesi, their right to do so was disputed, and it was stipulated that our countrymen should not be interrupted in obtaining those warlike stores which might be necessary to maintain their positions. I cannot recognize the justice of the complaint that the Portuguese have established a custom-house on a tributary of the Zambesi, because it was an admission that the Portuguese territory ended there, and Her Majesty's Government have rather reason to complain that that custom-house has been removed. The hon. Member suggested that the Government should interfere with the progress of the Portuguese force, which has gone into the interior of the country, lest it should disturb our Settlements. If such were likely to be the result of the expedition, it would undoubtedly be a matter of complaint on the part of Her Majesty's Government; but I hope no such occasion will arise. Her or by any attempt to fan the affair into undeserved importance by those who might not wish well to the good relations between Great Britain and the United States. As to the affair in which the name of her Majesty's Ambassador in St. Petersburg has been involved, I can only say that I do not think that there is any one in this country who believes for a moment that that distinguished British servant would have been guilty of any act which was unworthy of his position or of which he would have cause to be ashamed. It is to be regretted that mischief-makers should have dragged his name forward in this undeserved manner; but it has not been necessary at any time to clear it. The incident has passed by without any interruption of the good relations between those great countries which have so many common interests, and which are so concerned in the advancement of civilization and the preservation of European peace.

*MR. JAMES BRYCE (Aberdeen): Mr. Speaker, I do not think that the present moment is one very well suited to the discussion, large discussion, of the Foreign Policy of Her Majesty's Government; at the same time there are some matters raised by the remarks of my right hon. Friend, and by those made in an earlier part of the evening, which seem to require comment. I was a little disappointed that my right hon. Friend the Under Secretary did not answer more fully some of the points raised by the hon. Member for Edinburgh, and that no more distinct indication has been given of what information would be forthcoming on those subjects in the form of Parliamentary Papers. I would like to know when we are to expect Parliamentary Papers regarding Zanzibar, and I would be glad also if he would give us some fuller account of what line the Government propose to take as regards Samoa, and also when the Samoan papers will be produced. I quite agree that Great Britain has no reason to be jealous of the settlements or colonisation of Germany on any part of the East African Coast. The possessions of Great Britain are large enough to enable her to regard even with satisfaction the progress of a Power always friendly to herself and connected by so many ties of blood and sympathy. I do not understand from what was said by my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, and those who before the late Recess criticised the action of Her Majesty's Government with regard to East Africa, that they at all desired that Her Majesty's Government should have adopted a policy of suspicion or jealousy towards Germany, but merely doubted the wisdom of the action which Her Majesty's Government had taken in joining Germany in the blockade. I do not wish to express any opinion on that until further information is forthcoming. But the question is more serious than the Under Secretary seemed to admit. What has been feared all along was that the participation of the English Government in these hostilities, which seemed to be in danger of spreading into the interior, might prejudicially affect British traders on the coast and missionaries in the interior. We know that no inconsiderable loss has already been suffered by English and Indian coast residents, and there is grave risk that the relations with the internal tribes may be further disturbed. I should like to hear from the Government what action they will take in that matter. The House has not been told what advice Her Majesty's Government are tendering to Germany with regard to her policy in East Africa, and how far they have informed themselves with regard to the risks arising in the interior to the trade and interests of British subjects. These are points on which the Government may not be prepared to give answer at a moment's notice; but it is to be hoped that before long the House will have the assurance that the Government are alive to and are taking precautions against the dangers which any active operations on the part of the Germans may entail upon British subjects. Now I must say that our anxiety on these matters and the care with which hon. Members are inclined to watch the conduct of the Government in co-operating with Germany are considerably increased by the previous conduct of the Government. We cannot help remembering that since Her Majesty's Government came into the control of these matters, there has been, in one way or another, a considerable withdrawal from the position of influence which Great Britain has occupied on the Zanzibar coast, and to a great extent that position of influence and authority, held by her without offence to any other Power, and with great benefit to East Africa, has been yielded to the German Government. We cannot forget that it was they who recalled Sir John Kirk, and I must say that the disposition to be subservient to Germany in every demand has led hon. Members to regard with more suspicion than would otherwise have been the case the action of the Government in joining the blockade. If this was the feeling in regard to Zanzibar, it was much more intensified in the case of Samoa. I defy any hon. Member to study the history of the last two or three years in Samoa without perceiving that the English Government has played a rather ignoble and subservient part there. Hon. Members will remember the debate which took place in June or July last on Samoan affairs. It was shown, and has not been denied by the Government, that the Germans had treated Malietoa with unjustifiable severity, and that Her Majesty's Government had not remonstrated. The remonstrance against their high-handed behaviour, which continued even after the dethronement of that unfortunate King, at last proceeded not from the English Government, but from the United States, and I confess to a feeling of regret that it has been left to the American Government to vindicate the rights of the people of Samoa, and to remonstrate against the harsh and high-handed action of the German Government. We find now that the United States are determined to see that the interests of their subjects and what they considered to be their influence are placed on an equal footing with the influence exercised by Germany. Perhaps the Government will now take a similar view, but I hope it is not too late for Her Majesty's Government to take the United States into their confidence and to act as cordially with them as they have acted compliantly with Germany. The Government have told the House scarcely anything with regard to Suakin. The right hon. Gentleman must know that the country looked with considerable anxiety for an expression of the views of the Government as to the future of that place. What are the reasons which induce the Government to expect a more pacific state of things? What are their intentions in case the security of the garrison should be again threatened? Before sitting down I have a word to say on another matter. Some time ago a proposal was made from the Government of the United States to the chief maritime Powers that they should join in a congress to be held at Washington to settle a number of questions relating to the safety of life at sea. I understand that for some reason no definite reply has been received from Her Majesty's Government to that invitation, but the statement has appeared in public prints that the invitation was declined, and apparently on no very weighty grounds. I believe an impression exists in America that the Government were in a state of some irritation, arising out of what is called the Sackville incident, and it has been supposed that their refusal to take part in that conference had something to do with the annoyance caused to them by that incident. I feel, however, that this is not a likely circumstance, and I hope Her Majesty's Government take a higher view of their own international responsibilities and duties than to allow an incident of that comparatively trivial nature to make any difference to their diplomatic action in a matter such as this proposed Maritime Conference. I shall be glad to receive some assurance that Her Majesty's Government have given full consideration to the invitation to take part in this congress; whether they have refused the invitation; and, if so, on what ground. I trust that full information will be forthcoming on the whole matter, but must express the hope that no such petty diplomatic troubles as those which occurred immediately before the recent Presidential Election will be suffered to affect the relations of two great peoples who are animated by sentiments of mutual affection and respect.

SIR J. FERGUSON: If the House will permit me, I should like to satisfy the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bryce) as to one matter he has just referred to. It is a mistake to suppose that Her Majesty's Government has declined the invitation of the United States to join them in the Maritime Conference. There was a mistake made in communicating the message of the United States Government to Her Majesty's Government, and it was understood that the points to be discussed were to be particularized before the answer of the Government was given. But when that view was corrected and the United States desired that the point should be particularized after Her Majesty's Government and other Governments had given a general assent. Her Majesty's Government at once expressed its willingness to enter the Conference. Then the United States said it was too late to meet at Washington in the coming season, and it was proposed that the Conference should be postponed until the autumn. Before the autumn arrives no doubt preliminaries will be arranged, and I hope the Conference will meet. As to Suakin, I think the First Lord of the Treasury has dealt sufficiently with that point, which, I may point out, has not been noticed by any subsequent speaker. The operations there have been perfectly successful. The tribes are showing a peaceful disposition, the Dervishes have retired, and the policy of standing on the defensive has proved so successful in Egypt that, notwithstanding the losses caused by the unusually low Nile, there is a substantial surplus on the proceeds of the year and a substantial addition to the reserve fund formed by the Egyptian Government.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to move
"That this debate be now adjourned."

Motion agreed to.

PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES.

MR. C. A. V. CONYBEARE (Cambridge): I should like to ask the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is going to give the House the opportunity of discussing the contract with the new printers of the Parliamentary Debates? We were told last session we should have an opportunity of considering and revising that contract; but I understand that the new firm have already begun operations. If this be so, I do not see how this House can revise the contract with the least possibility of modifying, varying, or objecting to it. If, as I am told, the new printers have commenced operations, we have a right to complain of the course the Government have taken in going away from their promise, and not allowing us the opportunity we were to have had.

*MR. JACKSON: I cannot admit that the Government has gone back from its word in reference to the alleged promise to give the House an opportunity of discussing the new contract for the reporting and publishing of the debates of Parliament. What I said in answer to the hon. Gentleman was that a copy of the contract would be laid on the Table. That has been done. The Government has made the contract on their responsibility. They believe it to be a very good contract in the interests of economy, and they have no reason to doubt that the work will be as well done as hitherto; indeed, that the debates will be more fully reported in the new Hansard than had previously been the case, and I believe the contract is one with which the House will be satisfied.

MR. CONYBEARE: I do not object to the terms of the contract; but I think I am right in saying it was not laid on the Table or placed before the country until after the House had adjourned for the Christmas recess.

*MR. JACKSON: It could not have been laid on the Table of the House after the House had adjourned.

House adjourned at ten minutes before Twelve o'clock.

INDIAN PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY, in rising to ask the Secretary of State for India what steps had been taken to carry into effect the recommendations of the Indian Public Service Commission, said: It is now some months since the Report of this Commission on the Public Service in India was presented to Parliament, and I should hope that the Government would now be in a position to give us some information as to the conclusions at which they have arrived upon the very important matters dealt with by the Commission.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Viscount Cross): I am very glad of the opportunity of answering the question. It is quite true that the Report of the Commission came to this country some time ago, but the observations of the Government of India upon that Report did not reach this country until the 29th of October, and as nothing could be done in the meantime, until those observations had reached me, I do not myself see how we could have taken further steps in the way of carrying out the recommendations. A Special Committee of the India Council has been appointed, who have the advantage of the services of Sir Charles Turner, who was a Member of the Commission, and is now a member of the Special Committee. That Committee have been considering the question very carefully since that time. I have made inquiries, and I find that I may expect a Report in a very short time, and no time will be lost in considering the nature of that Report, in order that some steps may be taken to see how the recommendations of the Committee can be carried out. No doubt the matter is one of extreme importance, but the Report of the Commission covers a very wide field.

THE LINCOLN PROSECUTION.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

*THE EARL OF CARNARVON, in rising to inquire whether, looking to the extremely grave consequences likely to ensue, Her Majesty's Government were prepared to take any action in reference to the case of "Read and others v. the Bishop of Lincoln," now pending before his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury, said:—My Lords, the question of which I have given notice is, I am quite aware, a very unusual one to put on the paper, and the course which it may be thought that I indicate as that to be taken by Government I frankly admit is one which could not be recommended or adopted except under the most serious circumstances. But, my Lords, the circumstances of this case are unusual, perhaps I might say unprecedented, and they seem to me to raise issues of so momentous a character that it is well worth while for Her Majesty's Government to consider seriously whether they have any means at their disposal for arresting a course of things and events which may be most disastrous—whether there is not in the armoury of Constitutional law some implement which may avert a great calamity. My Lords, only a few days ago we saw in the Library of Lambeth Palace—a place consecrated by many great historical associations—a meeting of a remarkable Court. It was one in which his Grace the most rev. Primate presided, surrounded by a certain number of Assessors and aided by the Vicar General of his Province; and before that Court was cited a right rev. Prelate, who presides over the Diocese of Lincoln, to answer certain charges which were placed on record against him. I believe that lawyers are agreed that the form of those proceedings is technically criminal, and in substance it must certainly be held to be criminal; because, although this particular action might and would end with a mere spiritual monition, yet if that monition were disregarded it must, in the course of things, proceed to a suspension, and that suspension must terminate in deprivation. My Lords, for certainly 200 years there has been no precedent for such a Court. There is, I believe, but one clear precedent between this time and the Reformation. Some doubt was naturally felt in the minds of many whether that Court could exercise a valid jurisdiction. That question I will not enter into; but I understand that for all judicial purposes we may take it as settled by a more or less formal decision of the Privy Council, and I doubt not that the most rev. Primate was perfectly justified when he decided to act on that decision, and to constitute that Court. My Lords, I would be the last person to seem by any word of mine to throw a shadow of doubt on the validity of that Court. I am satisfied that, whatever a Court may do, that Court, constituted as it is, will endeavour to do in the interests of justice towards all parties. My fears are directed to a different point. They are directed to the consequences which may, and which I conscientiously believe will, ensue if this matter is allowed to run its course. My Lords, let me speak quite plainly for a few minutes. I believe that whatever be the issue of this present litigation it must be disastrous. If, on the one hand, the judgment be in favour of the accused Bishop, there will be, I take it, a conflict or an apparent conflict with previous decisions, and there will undoubtedly be a long course of serious litigation. The last time this Court of Audience ever sat, in the case of Bishop Watson, to which I have referred, I believe that the case was appealed from the Court to the Court of King's Bench, and from the Court of King's Bench to the House of Lords. And so, we may depend upon it, it will be in this case. But if, on the other hand, the decision should be adverse to the right rev. Prelate, then I fear that the consequences will be very much more serious indeed. Do not let us blind ourselves to the plain, broad matter of fact. This issue is clearly not stated for the purpose of trying and legally determining certain ceremonies or particular points which are at issue. It is, and it must be regarded, as a struggle between those parties into which the Church of England is unhappily divided at this moment. I speak absolutely without prejudice on the one side or on the other. I speak in defence and for the sake of that wide and wise comprehension which has characterized the whole history of the Church for generations, and I believe that this particular action is far more serious than any action that has been tried in spiritual matters within the memory of the existing generation. It is the culmination, so to say—it is the end of a succession of cases which have been tried before the Privy Council. I should not be far wrong if I said that this is probably the greatest crisis in matters ecclesiastical within the memory of any now living. Up to this time, as your Lordships are aware, there has been a clause in the Church Discipline

Act which has accorded to every Bishop of every diocese the power of interposing his veto when any question of this sort is raised. It is the absence of that discretionary power which has brought about this issue. And if this action succeeds, as we are bound to suppose it may succeed, it can but be the commencement of further litigation in the same sense. Prosecutions will be veiled thinly under the name of prosecution, and they will very soon take the form of religious persecution. I am convinced that if this matter go on there is imminent risk of the Church of England being rent in twain by the conflict of these parties. There will be within the Church a large body of Clergy, of learning, of piety, of zeal, who are the very salt of the Church, it may be said, who possess in every great town thousands of enthusiastic and devoted adherents, who will not hesitate at any cost to make common cause with the defeated party; and there will be a still larger body who will resent what they consider to be the unmerited persecution of a blameless individual. There will be vast congregations who will not hesitate to throw in their lot with the right rev. Prelate, and, my Lords, the floodgates of passion and strife will be thrown open, and there is no man living who can predict what will be the end of it. Her Majesty's Government, I have no doubt, appreciate the enormous gravity of the situation. They are face to face with a very great difficulty. I do not disguise how hard it is for them to take any action in such a matter. They may say that a case which is sub judice and pending in a Court of Law cannot and ought not to be interrupted. On the one hand they have all the forms, all the regular practice, the technicalities in the reasonable sense of the word, which counsel them to absolute inaction. On the other hand they have a crisis in which the vital and essential interests of the Church, and possibly of the State, are bound up. It is for them to decide whether they will persevere in these formal paths, for which they can plead the excuse of precedent and practice, whether they will stand by with folded arms, or whether they will embrace some effort to prevent the consummation of a great catastrophe. Let me explain, my Lords, that the object I have in my mind is twofold. Something may perhaps be done to arrest the course of this present dangerous suit. I think if my noble Friend at the head of the Government chooses to inquire into the matter, he will find that, though few, there are precedents that may warrant him in taking such a course. But there is a second object, which is even more important, and it is this—the taking of such measures as may prevent in the future the recurrence of such dangerous suits. There are precedents for both contingencies, and there is a great warning—a warning which lifts this matter above the mere technical law into the highest realms of policy. There is a warning which, like a beacon, flames out on your path, and bids you at all events think well before you allow the present time to go by—I am speaking of that disastrous schism in the Church of Scotland. Remember how that arose and what it was. It arose on a question of patronage. The Government of the day hoped for the best, and allowed events to take their course; the schism came; and years afterwards an Act of Parliament was passed, but it was then much too late to cure the evil. So it may be in the present case. I will not attempt to point out to Her Majesty's Government the course which they should pursue; it is one which may well exercise the clearest heads and the soundest judgments. This only I will say—I believe there is more than one course which is open, and there are probably hundreds and thousands in the country who will look with anxiety for the answer which Her Majesty's Government will give to my question.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): My Lords, I have listened with great pleasure to my noble Friend's most interesting speech, and, in common with your Lordships, I have recognized the feelings of deep sincerity which underlie the remarks of my noble Friend. I am very anxious that in what I say there should not appear to be the slightest shadow of discourtesy to my noble Friend; and if I do not attempt to follow him through every argument he has advanced, I hope he will not think it is either because I underrate the gravity of the subject, or because I doubt his authority to speak on a matter so momentous, or because I at all disbelieve in the depth of his feelings on the subject. But it is because in such a matter I speak under a responsibility which forbids me to go far into the subject. The question has been discussed before in this House, and more than once there has been legislation upon it; at least, Bills have been passed here which have not passed through the other House of Parliament, and, therefore, did not become law. The only mode that would be possible for putting a stop to the litigation that is now going on would be for Parliament to interpose its supreme authority, and to arrest that litigation. I do not dwell on the secondary consideration that in the present position of Parliament, and with the present division of feeling, especially in the other House, such a measure, even if it passed here, would not have the slightest chance of becoming law. But that is a secondary consideration, and I do not base my answer upon that—I base it upon this ground, that to interfere with litigation actually progressing, when the Court is opened and the matter is sub judice, is a step so grave, so almost revolutionary, that it would require considerations of the very deepest importance to justify any Government in doing it by legislation. I think I may ask your Lordships to allow me to be satisfied with this indication of my reasons. I cannot forget that the distinguished Judge of that Court is a Member of this Assembly. I cannot forget that the matters which are in issue before him may be taken before others who are also Members of this Assembly, and, therefore, it behoves us all, in speaking upon such a question, that no word that we utter shall in any way prejudice questions which it is for lawful authority to decide.

SELECTION.

On the Motion of Sir JOHN MOWBRAY, the following Members were appointed upon the Committee of Selection:—Dr. Cameron, Lord Edward Cavendish, Mr. Cubitt, Sir Archibald Orr Ewing, Sir Robert Fowler, Mr. Illingworth, Mr. Justin M'Carthy, Sir Hussey Vivian, Mr. Whitbread, and the Chairman of the Select Committee on Standing Orders.

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE (IRELAND) ACT, 1887 (IMPRISONMENT OF MEMBER).

Mr. SPEAKER acquainted the House, that he had received the following letter relating to the imprisonment of Mr. J. L. Carew, a Member of this House:—

Court House, Kildare, Ireland,

Sir,

February 21, 1889.

We beg leave to inform you that we have today arrested Mr. James Lawrence Carew, a Member of the House of Commons, of the offence of "that, on the 11th day of November, 1888, at Narber, in the co. Kildare, being a district since proclaimed under the provisions of "The Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, 1887," he did, with Denis Kilbride, M.P., and Thomas Robertson, and with other persons and persons whose names are unknown, unlawfully take part in a criminal conspiracy punishable by law at the time of the passing of the said Act, to wit, to induce persons whose names are unknown, who were or might be desirous to use or occupy farms of land in Ireland from which tenants had been or might be evicted in due course of law, not to use or occupy such farms" and have sentenced him to be imprisoned in the Gaol at Kilkenny, which is the Gaol of the County of Kildare, for a period of four months, without hard labour, and that the said Mr. James Lawrence Carew proceeds this evening to that prison.

We have the honour to be, Sir,

Your obedient servants,

J. T. M'SHEEHY, R.M.

HARRP. F. CONSIDINE, R.M.

To the Right Hon.

The Speaker of the House of Commons.

QUESTIONS.

THE LAND PURCHASE ACT.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottinghamshire, Rushcliffe) asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, When the Return ordered on the 23rd November last of purchases under "The Land Purchase (Ireland) Act, 1885," would be distributed?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The Land Commissioners inform me that they hope to have the Return in question ready for presentation in about a week.

THE EDUCATION CODE.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Lancashire, Darwen) asked the Vice President of the Council on Education, On what day he expects to lay the Education Code upon the Table of the House?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): My noble Friend is aware that I am obliged by the Act to lay it on the Table of the House within one month of the meeting of Parliament. He will also remember that I have before intimated that I have already promised to produce the Code in a complete form, and to give the House at least six weeks for its consideration. I am unable to inform the noble Lord what precise day it will be laid on the Table.

*MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside): Arising out of the Question of the noble Lord, may I ask the right hon. Gentleman if he will be prepared to give the House ample time for the consideration of the Code, because there has never yet been an important revision of the Code which has not occupied six months rather than six weeks in consideration. The last

Code was laid on the Table in the month of August, and it did not become law until March or April in the following year.

SIR W. HART DYKE: I should not like to give an answer upon that point off-hand. Of course I am anxious to do nothing that would be considered unfair. Adequate time will certainly be given.

DEFECTIVE SWORDS.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) asked the Secretary of State for War what number of swords belonging to British troops were broken in the recent engagement near Suakin; by whom were they manufactured, and when were they supplied; what test was applied to them, and when and where: and, whether there are other similar weapons in the hands of other troops?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (MR. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): In answer to this Question and to that which appears on the paper in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for the Medway Division of Kent (MR. J. S. GATHORNE-HARDY), I may say that as soon as I heard of the alleged failure of swords and pistols at Suakin I directed inquiry to be made into the matter. The Reports called for, which fully answer all the questions raised by my hon. Friends, were laid upon the Table last night, and will be in the hands of Members very shortly, as will also a Report on the swords of the 5th Dragoon Guards, in reference to which the hon. Member for South Donegal has given notice of a Question for Monday. Two swords broke during the action, but no lives were lost through the failure of any weapons at Suakin.

MR. HANBURY: Does the Report say that other similar weapons are now in the hands of British troops?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: The Report will deal fully with the whole question.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): What was the cost to the Government of those swords?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I am afraid that the hon. Member must give me notice of that Question. I have forgotten what the terms of the last contract were.

MR. MAC NEILL: Will the right hon. Gentleman give, in the Report he proposes to furnish, the name of the contractor who supplied these swords?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: Certainly; the names of the firms contracting for all swords that have been tested will be given in the Report.

*MR. MUNDELLA: Will the Report state the difference in cost between really good, serviceable, and battle-worthy swords and those which proved to be defective?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I do not altogether understand the Question.

*MR. MUNDELLA: I want to know what is the difference between the cost of these damaged swords and a superior weapon?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: A superior weapon, such as an officer in the Army might use, will probably cost about seven guineas, while the ordinary swords put into the hands of the cavalry soldiers have averaged, I believe, 16s. or 18s.; and, what is more, they passed every test which the Military Authorities have laid down.

At a subsequent period,

*MR. E. STANHOPE said: In reference to the question of the cost of the swords, I have an additional remark to make. The Question was put to me without notice, and I should prefer to state on Monday what the exact cost is. I may say that there has never been any intention to cut down the price. The Military Authorities settle for themselves what particular class of swords they want, and the contract is then put out to tender.

MR. MAC NEILL: Will the right hon. Gentleman give the House an assurance on Monday that the swords of the officers and of the soldiers are of the same quality?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: No; that is not so. The officers provide their own swords.

MR. HANBURY: Are the officers' swords ever tested at all?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: That is entirely a matter for the officers themselves. The officers buy their own swords—and no doubt take care to provide themselves with the best weapons.

THE POOR LAW AND LADY INSPECTORS.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.) asked the President of the Local

Mr. E Stanhope

Government Board whether his attention has been given to the following passage from the Report of the Select Committee on Poor Law Relief:—

“We recommend that the system of Lady Inspectors should be further extended so as to secure the more complete inspection of boarded-out children, and also the inspection of the female and children's wards in workhouses, and of the staff of nurses and other female officers;”

and, whether any steps have been, or are about to be, taken to carry out this recommendation of the Select Committee?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's-in-the-East): With regard to children boarded out beyond the Union to which they are chargeable the Board have had the services of a Lady Inspector, and there has been an inspection of the children boarded out under the several Boarding-out Committees. These Committees consist either exclusively or for the most part of ladies, and it is upon these Committees that the responsibility for the supervision of the children must devolve. The inspection undertaken by the Board has not been so much with the view of ascertaining the condition of each individual child as of learning, by means of an inspection of the children and the foster-parents' homes, how the duties which devolve on the Boarding-out Committees are discharged. The arrangements for inspection by Lady Inspectors of the female and children's wards, and of the staff of nurses and other female officers in workhouses in England and Wales, which number between 700 and 800, would involve the employment of a considerable addition to the Board's staff of Inspectors, and the Government do not contemplate making such appointments. It is to be borne in mind that the workhouses are also visited by General Inspectors, School Inspectors, and Commissioners of Lunacy, and I should be very reluctant to propose a system of inspection by an additional class of Inspectors. I do not in the least under-estimate the advantages which might result from ladies assisting in the administration of workhouses, but in my opinion this assistance can best be secured by the election of Lady Guardians.

MR. PICKERSGILL: I beg to give notice that in Committee of Supply I will call attention to this subject.

RAILWAY RATES.

SIR BERNHARD SAMUELSON (Oxfordshire, Banbury) asked the President of the Board of Trade whether it is within his knowledge that the Railway Companies have, since the passing of the Railway Traffic Act of 1888, raised the rates on the carriage of merchandize in many instances; and, if so, whether he is able to give any information on the subject by way of a Return or otherwise?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BRACH) (Bristol, W.): I have no official information as to any changes made by the Railway Companies in the rates charged for the conveyance of traffic previous to the 1st January of this year, and can, therefore, lay no Return before the House. No increase in the rates can be made since that date without full publication of the intended increase and the date on which it is to take effect. The Board of Trade have prescribed Rules for such publication, and have called upon the Railway Companies for information as regards any increase made since the date mentioned. When that information is received, I shall be glad to show it to the hon. Member.

THE CASE OF MR. ARTHUR CRAWFORD.

MR. BAUMANN (Peckham) asked the Under Secretary of State for India whether the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the conduct of Mr. Arthur Crawford have presented their Report to the Government of Bombay, and, if so, when the Report will be published; and, whether the Secretary of State will take into consideration a statement that the Governor of Bombay promises to continue in their offices magistrates who swore that they took bribes?

THE UNDER SECRETARY FOR INDIA (SIR JOHN GORST) (Chatham): The recent proceedings at Bombay in reference to Mr. Crawford have been an inquiry under Indian Act 37 of 1850, and not a criminal trial. The Report of the Commissioners furnishes the Government of Bombay with materials to enable them to pass judgment upon his conduct. The Report has been received, and is now under the consideration of the Government of Bombay. But until a final decision is arrived at, the publication of the Report would be contrary to the intentions of the Act. If any such statement as that specified in the Question were made to the Secretary of State, he would, of course, take it into his consideration. The incriminated magistrates have, in fact, been suspended from their judicial functions pending the consideration of the Report.

*MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) asked whether the suspension had taken place after many articles had appeared in Indian papers on the subject?

SIR JOHN GORST: In the Recess I went for a holiday, and I can assure the hon. Member that I did not spend my time in reading the Indian papers. I cannot answer the Question without notice.

MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.): Will the result of the investigation be communicated to the prisoner, or whatever he is called?

SIR JOHN GORST: That could not be done until the Government of Bombay has determined what action is to be taken in regard to the Report of the Commission. Until that determination has been arrived at it will be impossible to communicate the nature of the Report to anybody.

LABOUR IN MINES.

MR. FENWICK (Northumberland, Wansbeck) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the following statement in the last Report of Mr. Hall, Inspector of Mines for the Liverpool District, viz., "The hours of labour of women and boys are longer under the new Act of Parliament than what was the custom under the 1872 Act;" and, whether it is true, so far as this district is concerned, that the intervals for meals provided for in the Act of 1887 no longer count for labour, as under the Act of 1872; and, if so, whether such practice is in conformity with the Coal Mines Regulation Act of 1887?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): Yes, Sir. My attention has been called to this statement. The provisions in the Acts of 1872 and 1887, both as to limiting the period of employment and as to meal times, appear to me identical, but the wording of the provisions in the Act of 1872 was certainly equivocal, and the practice consequently varied. In some districts meal times were not counted for labour; in others, including Mr. Hall's, they were counted, not, however, in all the mines of the district; and since the Act of 1887 they are no longer counted for labour; and this appears to me to be in conformity with the Statute. It was not, I think, the intention of Parliament to limit the hours of women, boys, and girls employed above ground to eight and a-half hours per diem, or to make them shorter than the hours prescribed for boys below ground.

MR. FENWICK: May I ask whether boys under 16 years of age can be kept in a mine for more than 10 hours at a time?

MR. MATTHEWS: The Question which the hon. Member asked me related to the employment of boys above ground.

METROPOLITAN FAIRS.

MR. KELLY (Camberwell, N.) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that the provisions of "The Metropolitan Fairs Act, 1868" are not now carried out, and that fairs, with shows, &c., are now held within the Metropolitan area, to the great annoyance, loss, and inconvenience of the ratepayers; and, whether the Act is treated as a nullity in pursuance of any order issued by himself to the Commissioners of Police of the Metropolis?

MR. MATTHEWS: Since I have been at the Home Office I have had only one complaint with respect to annoyance caused by an exhibition of shooting galleries, swings, and roundabouts at Stratford. The police did not interfere, because they were advised that in that case the only remedy was by indictment, and there is no provision for the costs of prosecution in such a case. The Secretary of State, in 1884, directed the police not to interfere with similar shows, on the ground that they were innocent amusements of the humbler classes; but I do not understand this direction as nullifying the Metropolitan Fairs Act, 1868, or preventing its application in suitable cases.

SCHOOL BOARD CASES.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the report of the following remarks alleged to have been made in Court by Mr. Horace Smith, Magistrate at the Clerkenwell Police Court, on 31st January, "that he got so tired of hearing School Board cases, that he should decline to hear any more summonses after 4.30 p.m.; also that he wished the School Board would take steps to secure the appointment of a magistrate on purpose to deal with School Board cases, as he did not intend to sit any longer than he was paid for;" whether he is aware that owing to the frequent adjournments and the refusal of the magistrates to grant summonses, it is impossible for the London School Board to produce satisfactory results; and whether he proposes to take any and what action to mitigate the hardship of the present arrangements to the poor, and to facilitate the work of the School Board?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am informed by the magistrate that the newspaper report is quite inaccurate. He informs me that from 2 to 4.30 on the day in question he heard nine industrial school summonses and 53 School Board summonses. At 4.30, having day charges to try, he adjourned the remaining 16 School Board summonses. Thursday afternoon is given up every week at this Court to School Board cases. I am told by the chief magistrate that the arrangements adopted for hearing School Board cases have been generally successful in producing an improved attendance, and I have no information leading me to think that the London magistrates could materially lessen the trouble that School Board cases must necessarily cause both to the poor and to the officers of the Board.

SALMON FISHERIES (SCOTLAND) BILL

MR. ALEXANDER LAING BROWN asked the Lord Advocate if, in view of the strong opposition which it has evoked, it is the intention of the Government to proceed with the Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Bill?

Mr. Matthews

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON) (Buteshire) was understood to say that, owing to the strong opposition which the Bill of last Session received, the Question would be carefully considered before another Bill was introduced.

NEW WRIT ISSUED.

For Burnley, v. J. Slagg, Esq., Chiltern Hundreds.

WARLIKE EXPENDITURE.

MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): I wish to say that it is not my intention to proceed, this evening, with the Amendment to the Address which stands in my name, but I shall take the opportunity of introducing it when Her Majesty's Government make their proposal for an increased warlike expenditure.

LOCAL OPTION.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth) gave notice that he would move to add at the end of paragraph 7 of the Address—

"And we humbly pray that in these Bills provision may be made for conferring within prescribed areas the power of direct popular veto on the issue of Excise licences."

ROYAL GRANTS.

MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee) asked the First Lord of the Treasury whether he was now prepared to state the intentions of the Government with reference to the promised Committee on Royal Grants?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): It is the intention of the Government to ask the House to appoint a Committee to consider the practice of this House in the past in respect of secondary grants to Members of the Royal Family, to use the language of the right hon. Member for Mid-Lothian when submitting the grant for Her Royal Highness Princess Beatrice. I will take care that ample notice shall be given of the terms of the Reference to the proposed Committee.

THE SPECIAL COMMISSION.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe) asked the First Lord of the Treasury when the Estimate to meet the expenses of the Special Commission under the Members' Charges and Allegations Act, 1888, would be proposed to the House?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The cost of the Special Commission, 1888, so far as chargeable on Public Funds, is being defrayed from the sum inserted in the Temporary Commissions Vote for "Commissions not specifically provided for." In the Estimates for 1889-90 specific provision is made for the Commission.

war, that they have been arming for war year by year, certainly for the last 16 or 17 years, some of them longer; that the augmentation has been greater year by year, that in each Chamber the excuse for augmenting in one country has been armament in the other—would ask the Ministry, I say, whether they have entered into any kind of relations, or engagements, or undertakings, or understandings, which, in the event of a war breaking out such as the Secretary of State for War considers imminent, this country is embarked in any, and, if any, in what degree, in the possibility of being entangled in any such war. That seems to me to be a grave matter on which this House would be right to challenge the Ministry for some reasonable declaration, especially when we find that the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty has already given this House intimation—intimation which has been given somewhat largely outside, less soberly outside—of the intention to apply for some authority to increase our naval armaments. The noble Lord (Lord Wolseley), who is sometimes supposed to be the only capable General in this country, has in Birmingham, under the auspices of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, extended that demand, which the Government are only putting at this moment for the increase of the Naval Vote, to the whole Army Establishment, and beyond that we have actually got a suggestion from the noble Lord that, it being practically impossible to obtain by the ordinary methods of enlistment a sufficient number of men for the service of the State, Conscription should be resorted to in this country. Now, I am not a supporter of the Government, but I hope that I am always a fair foe to it, and I must say that if it desires to bring about what many of us wish to see—a dissolution of this Parliament—with the utmost rapidity, it has only to introduce some measure of Conscription, and then from one end of the country to the other feeling would be so strong that it would be impossible for any Government, composed of right hon. Gentlemen either on one side or the other, to continue in Office. But, as I judge the signs shown by the Leader of the House, I take it that the Government at present have no notion of anything of the kind, and if I might be permitted respectfully to do so, I would suggest that a General receiving a high salary in connection with his command has neither the right nor the duty to create panics of this kind—panics which might be attended with most disastrous consequences. But even this is not the limit of the panic fever into which we are getting. I have read in The Times—I am one of those who place exceeding confidence in some things I read in The Times, even if they are only inserted with the intention of ascertaining what people think—I have read proposals which shadow out schemes for the fortification of London. Are our cordial relations in such a precarious condition that the Secretary for War weeps in public over the dangers which the Government see menacing us? He, much more than any other Member of the Government, ought to know about these matters, for he must be especially consulted on this subject. And I hope that he, as well as the Secretary to the Admiralty, will take the proper steps to make clear the grounds of their fears, especially when they see one of the highest Generals in the Army trying to drive the whole of England into a panic. I know that every other country is arming. An hon. and gallant Member, for whom I have great respect, in the course of his speech in the debate last night, suggested that the country would grant the Vote asked for willingly. Now, as far as I am concerned, and as far as the hundreds and thousands for whom I have some small right to speak are concerned, I must say that they will condemn everyone who votes recklessly for war expenditure in this House—who votes for it without seeing real peril—who votes for it simply under the panic cry, which from time to time for 40 or 50 years has left us a record of vessels built in haste gone to rust, and of fortifications which you may now row round, and admire the folly of the Ministry who managed to induce the House of Commons to vote for them, and the passive humility of the people who have been fools enough time after time to pay for them. I ask the Government, especially in view of the fourth paragraph of the gracious Speech from the Throne, whether it is suggested that there is no right to assume that the existing condition of things is necessarily secure from possibility of change, and I will ask whether there are no engagements with Germany for example? Prince Bismarck speaks with extreme confidence, and I do not want to use language which shall be foolish in relation to possible contingencies on the Continent; but it is a matter of common notoriety that during the last seven or eight months diplomatists both in Italy and France have regarded communications between this country as sometimes justifying as between those two countries the views which fell from the Secretary for War. I would suggest how deplorable such a war would be; how terrible such a war would be; and, friendly as I hope we are both to Italy and to France, I would suggest that it would be a most suicidal matter if, in any question as to the balance of power or prestige of any Ministry, we had been seduced into entering into any engagement which would give one Power colour for supposing that it had either the moral or the physical force of this country thrown into the scale against it. I ask the Government expressly to answer this question to this House, and in view of the declarations which have been made in the last few weeks in different parts of Europe, I think every Member of this House has a right to make such an appeal to the Government, if it is only to pacify the feeling which has been excited very often by those who know nothing of what war is, and who have never taken part in it, and who foolishly forget in the security of their editorial sanctum that angry words may anger others, and sometimes produce bitter periods of excitement, from which even wise statesmanship cannot extricate their country. I ask the Government to give us some assurance which will make the people feel that there is one word which has some reality in it, whatever statesmen may be in power. Let us remember that the glory of this country has been made by peace, and not by war. Our prosperity, such as it is—and in many respects in some part of our dominions at present it is very great—our prosperity has not been made on the battle-field—it has not been won at the cannon's mouth—it has not been ploughed with the bayonet's point—but it has been made by the industry and labour of our people, to whom wage is paid, and from whom the reduction of wage comes when the tax bill for war grows in size. I quite agree that the Secretary for War might have had grounds for grave apprehension, but I cannot agree that he was right in so publicly expressing them. It is so easy for people with knowledge of how little Governments do to imagine that when they tell anything at all of their fears, and of our dangers, that they are not telling the whole story, or that they are saying something for a purpose which is behind it all. For example, I have heard it suggested that a statesman of great ability in another country, when asking for an increase of military forces, has often pointed attention to what he has alleged to be the aggressive attitude of a nation whose frontiers run with his own; and, under cover of the feeling which he has thus excited among the people, he has been enabled to obtain from them the Vote he asked. Now I do not want to suggest unworthy motives on the part of any Government, but I do hold that some explanation is due to the country from the Secretary for War, or someone speaking for him, as to why he considered it necessary to sound so grave a note in the face of the nation, if the statements in the gracious Speech from the Throne are borne out by fact, that nothing has taken place to affect the cordial relations between this country and other Powers. It is no answer for the Secretary of State to merely refer to the possibilities of an European war; these possibilities have existed ever since the cession of Alsace and Lorraine, and they have grown larger and larger every day by reason of the increase of armaments on every side; and as a consequence, in France, in Italy, and in Germany, although the armies have grown, so in proportion the hunger of the people has grown larger, and I do put it to this House that often armed peace becomes even more dangerous than war, because day by day it makes the people despairing. Let us take the position of France now. We cannot help recognizing that the people in France, with their huge army, naturally desire some employment for that army, which is very costly, and they look to it for some deliverance from ills which it may possibly deliver them from, and also which it cannot possibly deliver them from. Remember that swords not only break—I would not mind if they only did that — but they often cut and injure the holders of them, and the possession of them further tends to make enemies of those around one. I felt a little relief to-night when the hon. Member for the Haggerston Division announced that he did not intend to persevere with his Amendment to the Address, because I think that debates on the Address are not very valuable, while Amendments are generally valueless, and ought only to be moved when, as is the case with the Amendment of which notice has been given by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, they challenge on a grave matter the policy of the Government, and when it is supported by the Leaders of the Party, acting in obedience to the expressions of opinion reaching them from all parts of the country. I ask the Government to remember this in relation to the application they will make for money. On one point last year I felt bound, with not unnatural reluctance, to give some credit to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, for I should have preferred the credit to belong to this side of the House—but I gave him credit because I felt that the right hon. Gentleman's policy showed some desire to take practical steps for the reduction of the burdens on the people. I refer, of course, to the saving which he made in the interest payable on the National Debt. But is the Government to spend on the one hand wastefully that which it has saved on the other hand sparsely? Is a shilling to be saved in interest and ten pounds spent on an iron vessel? Is a shilling to be saved in interest, and ten pounds spent on fortifications? Is the nation to be driven into a panic which is disastrous, which demoralizes the people, and makes them feel as though glory is in war, instead of the ordinary industries of life? Unless the nation is peaceable we shall have a revolution—a revolution begotten of hunger. That we may avoid, if we keep on as we have been acting for the last twenty-five years. Even in that period we have increased our naval and military expenditure to much too great an extent; but, if we go on and multiply it, as is now suggested, then the day will come when a pressure will rise under which even stronger Governments than any we are likely to see in this country will be obliged to give way. The hon. Member who moved the Address used a phrase which I desire to challenge, and on which I am anxious to obtain an explicit declaration from the Government. He said that in their Egyptian policy the Government had been bound by certain engagements entered into with the Egyptian Government by their Predecessors in Office. The protection of the ports of the Red Sea was part of these engagements, and as Suakin was one of the ports, the Government were bound by the engagement made by their Predecessors to keep it. Now I have searched carefully for some proof of this. It is quite possible that I may have missed it, but certainly I have been unable to find any trace of any engagement which can possibly bear that construction. If there be any engagement such as this, I think the House should have been made acquainted with it; and we ought now to learn to what extent we have been and are bound by them. Did the engagement include the protection of Massowah? Are we mixed up with the Italians in this matter? If the Italians are beaten by the Abyssinians, should we have to go to their assistance? According to the Mover of the Address, speaking apparently with the approval of Ministers, and certainly uncontradicted by them, although his words on these very points have been challenged by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, we are under engagements as to which the House has no knowledge; and I think, as an independent Member of this House, that I have a right to ask specifically for explanation as to what those engagements are. But then we are told that the port of Suakin was in danger. Why did not the Government do what Sir Henry Drummond Wolff recommended them to do? And instead of embarking in war, why did they not find some Egyptian Mussulman, who alone, they were told, would have any chance of success in negotiating with the Sudanese? What has been the result of your action there? You have killed some hundreds—perhaps some thousands—of Arabs, a brave foe, but no match for your weapons of precision, a foe described in words of eloquence by an hon. and gallant Member no longer in this House, who, speaking with personal knowledge, for he himself had fought supply the House with one or two specific pieces of information. I want to know whether, in the country known as Mashonaland, between British Bechuanaland and the Zambesi River, there was some talk of a concession in May of last year, and whether Lord Knutsford then declared that Her Majesty's Government would give no countenance to any concession or agreement, unless it were concluded with the knowledge and approval of Her Majesty's High Commissioner? To that I expect I shall get an affirmative answer; and, having got that answer, I want to know whether, since the Prorogation, the Government had become aware that Lobengula has made a concession of certain rights to a Mr. Rudd, the nominee of Mr. Rhodes, a partner in business transactions, as stated by the papers and vouched by the share list, of the High Commissioner himself, of the De Beers Mining Company, and whether, just prior to the concession being granted, or at the actual state, Sir Sidney Sheppard, the Representative of the Government, was present at Lobengula's Kraal? What report he made to Sir Hercules Robinson, and how it is that Mr. Rhodes, who was represented at the shareholders' meeting as the proxy of Sir Hercules Robinson, could have been permitted by the Government to be the real recipient of the concession under the name of Mr. Rudd? I acquit Sir Hercules Robinson of anything more than this: I allege that no Representative of Her Majesty in the position of High Commissioner, being a shareholder in a company, should permit a concession to be granted to the nominee of a gentleman who appears in the list of the company as his proxy. The concession has been granted, and I deny that Her Majesty ought to permit or encourage concessions or monopolies of any of the rights in any of Her Majesty's dominions. I pray the indulgence of the House, but this seems to be a matter which ought not to pass without some word.

*MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, South): I regret very much that some right hon. Gentleman on the Government Bench has not risen to reply to the very able address of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh) before I proceed to ask the House to direct its thoughts to another matter mentioned in Her Majesty's gracious Speech. The particular part of the Speech to which I wish to refer deals with the manufactures and industries of Ireland. It points out that the early attention of the House will be asked to measures for developing the material resources of Ireland. I remember that not very long ago, when the Conservative Government came into power, their promises were very numerous indeed as to their intention to devote some of the revenues of the three Kingdoms to the development of the industrial resources of Ireland. The noble Lord the Member for Paddington (Lord R. Churchill) used some very remarkable words, and many Members of the Conservative Party expressed to me their great delight that it had fallen to the lot of the Conservative Party to make amends for the past, because England owed Ireland a good deal in that respect. If we carry our minds back to historical periods, we find that Irish industries were ruthlessly crushed out of existence by direct legislation under William III. But, great as the destruction was by that legislation, the destruction has been greater still by the indirect results of the Act of Union. Before I proceed to show the results in this respect of the Act of Union, let me draw attention to the state of Irish trade during the existence of the Irish Parliament. The Irish people have often been accused of slothfulness, of not being suited or adapted to successful enterprise in the direction of manufactures, but I pray the House to pardon me while I read a few paragraphs from a book entitled "Two Centuries of Irish History," which, I think, will set that matter at rest. At page 104 it is written—

"The truth is, as British official records show, that the Irish trade and manufactures, so far from being in a perishing condition at this period, had sprung up with marvellous vitality and flourished exceedingly. Thus the British manufacturers gave evidence that their trade in soap and candles to North America and the West Indies had 'much decreased of late.' 'To what causes do you attribute this decrease?' asked the Lords of the Committee of Council. 'We impute it,' was the reply, 'to the possession the Irish have now got of that trade; we export but very few candles now to the West Indies.'"

Some idea of the progress made in Irish manufactures may be formed on learning that from 1780 to 1783, both inclusive, the general export of new drapery, or fine sorts of woollen goods, rose from 8,600 yards to 53,800 yards in round numbers; and of new drapery, or coarser kinds, from 420 yards to 40,500 yards. Only 1,000 yards of fustians were shipped to America in the first year, whilst 47,000 yards were exported in the last. Other Irish manufactures were pressing forward in a similar manner, and some of these products were appearing in foreign markets. What I particularly desire to point out is that this great increase, as it was a great increase at that time, occurred under very great difficulties and restrictions; because we have it stated in the book from which I have quoted that whilst British ports were shut against manufacturing Ireland, Irish ports were open to British goods. Notwithstanding this, Irish trade went up by leaps and bounds. I also find that the Irish fisheries were very prosperous in those times. It will be remembered by many hon. Members that in the time of Lord Beaconsfield there was a discussion upon the subject of fisheries. I remember well that the leader of the Irish people at that time, Mr. Isaac Butt, proceeded to Glasgow to defend the Irish people from the accusations made against them by Lord Beaconsfield, that they were too lazy to develop their fisheries. I think it will be seen from the quotation with which I will now trouble the House that when the Irish people were masters of their own destiny, when they were encouraged in their industry, they compared favourably with others, and even excelled those with whom they were compared. It is said at page 107 of "Two Centuries of Irish History"—

"Men were brought from Ireland to teach the natives of Uist the manufacture of kelp from seaweed. Others were brought to the Shetlands because of their dexterity in fishing, and because they could go out two months earlier and proceed much further to sea than could the natives in their small boats. The inhabitants of Barra learned fish curing from the Irish fishermen, who had a Highland fishery."

They went even further a-sea, and established their "great fishery on the banks of Newfoundland, which," in 1875, "increases daily." This was due, be it noted, to the energy and enterprize of the old natives of Ireland, who, homeless in their Fatherland, poured out by the two and three thousand annually, and remained abroad as residents, in spite of all discouragements. The British who went usually returned. Newfoundland was practically founded by Irish Catholics. The Irish fishers were honest dealers, as well as skilled curers. Though the Irish herring barrel contained only 28 gallons and the Scotch 32, the former sold "at an equal or superior price." So high stood the Irish name that their herrings sold "14½ per cent. dearer than the Scotch." They were never charged with the "fraud, perjury, and all the tricks which ingenuity could invent to rob the public"—such as partly filling barrels with stones and rubbish—which had almost entirely destroyed the sale of British herrings in European markets. That is the testimony as to Irish industry and the success of Irish manufactures taken from British official sources, and under the disadvantages I have named, when there was a higher tariff in England and a lower tariff in Ireland, when there were practically open ports in Ireland and closed ports in England; and yet, notwithstanding all these drawbacks, Irish industries prospered under their Home Parliament. There were in 1800 ninety master woollen manufacturers, supplying 4,918 hands in Dublin; but in 1840—forty years after the Union—the interest was dead. Similar was the fate of the wool combers. In 1841 no less than thirteen carpet manufacturers, which existed at the time of the Union, were blotted out of existence. In 1800 there were 2,500 silk loom weavers, and in 1840 not one remained. In Kilkenny there were fifty-six blanket manufacturers, employing 3,000 hands, but in 1822 there was not one of those factories left. At Balbriggan there were 2,500 calico weavers, and in 1844 only 228. In Wicklow, in 1841, there were none of the 1,000 handloom weavers that found employment there in 1820. In Cork there were in 1800 1,000 weavers of braid and 2,000 worsted weavers, 3,000 hosiers, 700 wool combers, and 2,000 cotton weavers, and in 1841 not a single individual was employed in these industries there. These figures, though they may be tedious to the House, prove my contention that the Act of Union, in an indirect way, had a more detrimental effect on the trade and industry of Ireland than the direct legislation of William III. The fostering hand of the Irish Parliament was taken from these industries, they lost the advantage of Protection laws, while at the same time laws of Protection prevailed in England—or, if there were not laws of Protection, there were at least bounties given for the exportation of English manufactures; and these manufactures found their way freely into Irish ports thereby under-selling Irish products. There is not a river, stream, or brook in Ireland on which there cannot be pointed out the crumbling walls of a decayed factory, alike a manifestation of the past industry of the people, and the cupidity, intolerance, and incapacity of the unkindly rulers of the country. We were promised by the Tory Government a fine thing, but these promises have not been fulfilled, nor is it stated in Her Majesty's most gracious Speech or hinted at by any of the right hon. Gentlemen opposite what the nature of these efforts will be. Will they be confined merely to again bringing forward those schemes for the drainage of the Bann, Barrow, and Shannon? This no doubt would benefit agriculture in the neighbourhood of these rivers, benefit an industry that at the present time is well known not to pay, but what will be done to revive the lost industries of Ireland sacrificed to the cupidity of the English people? Many Members opposite have told me privately they thought England could not tax herself too much in order to recoup Ireland for the great losses suffered in the past, and certainly there is fine material for the Government to use in that direction. The Irish people are an artistic people. If they had not been confined almost entirely to agricultural operations they would have excelled in manufactures that demand the exercise of artistic instinct. It is a well-known fact that in all the operations that demand the exercise of artistic ability, and where Irishmen have the opportunity of competing, they carry off the prizes. There is no large drapery establishment in the three kingdoms, where an eye for colour and harmony is required, where Irishmen and Irishwomen are not appreciated. We know the women who make Limerick lace display an innate artistic sense that cannot be excelled. I was told in Cork the other day by a gentleman who is acknowledged to have been most successful in the commercial world, a gentleman who is known to many opposite who just now smiled at my remarks, Sir John Arnott, who, besides being proprietor of the Irish Times, has been engaged in the drapery business, that for the conduct of his large departments he was at first obliged to engage Englishmen and Scotchmen, but now, not only had he only Irishmen in his Irish establishments, but when he wanted men with an artistic eye and mind for an establishment elsewhere out of Ireland he found such among the Celtic race in the South of Ireland. You have all the material in Ireland for building up successful industries if you wish to set about it in the proper manner—if you wish to return to the Irish people what you stole from them in the past. I am curious to know what the proposals of the Government will be. I can assure them that if they tax this country and make proposals for reviving Irish industries they will receive considerable support on their own side of the House and in the country from conscientious people who have read Irish history, grieve for the injuries inflicted upon Ireland in the past, and are willing now that reparation should be made. I do not know that I have anything further to say on the subject. I merely advert to it because I do not think it will form part of that more important debate which will take place next week. I look forward with curiosity and anxiety to learn the proposals of the Government, and to see whether they are honest in their professions and will redeem their promises in a manner to redound to their credit and the advantage of Ireland.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir JOHN GORST, Chatham): I am sure the hon. Member for Northampton will believe that it was from no want of courtesy that I did not reply to him at once. He raised some very important issues, some of them connected with the Department for which I am here responsible, and I was anxious to see whether anyone else on the opposite side desired to follow the hon. Member and urge on the Government the considerations he has advanced. Of course the power of the Government is limited; they can only speak once, and we might have been hereafter taunted with having too readily rushed upon the attention of the House, not giving other Members an opportunity before the Minister rose to reply. Now I never like putting myself in opposition to the junior Member for Northampton, because I find the principles which he enunciates in his speeches are so sound and generous that I can only attribute the unfortunate application of them he sometimes makes, to his judgment being warped by his occupation of a position in that quarter of the House, and I fancy that if I should be so fortunate as to live to see the day when the hon. Member for Northampton is himself a Minister of the Crown I shall find that he will come round to the opinion that Governments, both Liberal and Conservative, sometimes try to do right, and that all their actions and intentions are not so terribly immoral as Gentlemen sitting in that quarter of the House affect to believe. I can speak with some personal knowledge, for, like other hon. Gentlemen, I have sat in that portion of the House, and I can assure the hon. Member that the opinions which an outsider is apt to form of the intentions and designs of a Government are not so just as at the time they sometimes seem to be. The hon. Member complains, first of all, that he has not had satisfactory assurance of the extreme solicitude of the Government to maintain peace abroad. Now, I really do not know what assurance the hon. Member can require, because no longer ago than the beginning of last Session his hon. Colleague, who is extremely vigilant in watching the Government, on the 10th of February demanded an assurance of this kind. He was then told by my hon. Friend the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs that no engagement pledging the material action of this country had been entered into by Her Majesty's Government which was not then known to the House. My hon. Friend, being further catechized as to what he meant by material action, replied that an engagement of material action implied military responsibility. Well, the hon. Member was not quite satisfied; he returned to the charge on February 14, and then quoted some statement which appeared in a Vienna newspaper, and asked whether the statement that Her Majesty's Government had entered into any undertaking to render material assistance to a European Power under certain contingencies was or was not correct? My hon. Friend referred to his former statement, and said he had already stated "we are under no engagement pledging the country to military, and of course in this he included 'naval,' action, except such as was already known to the House," and in a debate which subsequently took place my hon. Friend, speaking with that caution and sense of responsibility which distinguishes him, and with that accuracy of information which attaches to the Representative of the Foreign Office, entered at greater length into the subject, and in the strongest and most distinct language declared Her Majesty's Government were not parties to any engagement or any kind of entanglement which might oblige this country to enter into any kind of aggressive operations, military or naval. Well, of course, it is the business of hon. Members not to be satisfied with any assurances the Government may give, and the only objection I can see to the frequent reiteration of these pledges is that a Government always protesting may possibly seem to protest too much. If the Government were to accommodate hon. Members with a declaration whenever it was called for, it might be assumed that there was some ulterior purpose, some hidden design. I do not know whether hon. Members will accept an assurance from me, speaking in the hearing of Members of the Cabinet, and representing the India Office, which is the Department of Government most liable to engage in war; but I can assure hon. Gentlemen there is no object which Her Majesty's Government more sedulously strive for than the maintenance of peace in every part of the Empire; that there is nothing which the Government regard with so much horror as the calamity of being compelled, under any circumstances, to have recourse to the violence of war. I cannot help thinking that the hon. Member scarcely bears sufficiently in mind the difference between aggressive and defensive warlike preparations; that is one of the political lessons which experience of Office would very likely teach him. The Government of the United Kingdom—I do not care whether Liberal or Conservative—must be a Government of peace. But it must also be a Government of defence ; and all the military and naval proposals ever made to this House by any Government are never made in the interests of aggression, but of defence. The hon. Member for Northampton, in that general and airy way in which he sometimes expresses his political opinions, says that military and naval expenditure has, during the past twenty-five years, been far too largely increased. But I think it would be better if hon. Members would give some specific instances of such expenditure during the past twenty-five years which is now disapproved of. If it could be pointed out to the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the provision made for military resources, for the Navy, or for materials to meet the possible contingency of war, is too large, I am sure such observations will receive the attention of my right hon. Friend ; and if it could be shown there is good ground for the opinion, I am sure he and Her Majesty's Government would have good reason to rejoice. But I venture to differ with hon. Members, and I believe the general opinion is that, so far from there having been excessive naval and military expenditure, this expenditure has, during the last twenty-five years, been reduced to an imprudent and a dangerous point, and it is the general public opinion that the time has come when, in the interest, not of aggression, but of the defence of the Empire and its commerce, it is necessary to review our naval and military expenditure, with a view to increasing it. And now, in regard to the special topics alluded to, I would remind the House that most of them have relation to the Department of Foreign Affairs, and would have been dealt with by my hon. Friend, if he were able again to address the House. I hope, however, the hon. Member will accept me as a substitute, though I cannot speak with an equal sense of responsibility, or display the same familiarity with details. The first topic on which the hon. Member for Northampton favoured the House was a sort of after-clap of the debate on the Suakin Expedition. The hon. Member is very courageous in reminding the House of that debate—an older Parliamentary hand would have been less ready to recall the prophecies and predictions with which we were then favoured, and which were so signally falsified by the result of events. I do not understand that Her Majesty's Government committed themselves to the admission that this country is under engagement with the Egyptian Government to protect either Suakin or any of the Red Sea ports, but it is undoubtedly the fact that this country has pursued the policy of defending the Red Sea ports of the Egyptian Government, not only during the tenure of Office of Her Majesty's present Advisers, but during a considerable course of time and in pursuance of that continuity of foreign policy which on most subjects prevails.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: I quoted exactly the words reported in the Times to the effect that in their Egyptian policy the Government were bound by certain engagements entered into with the Egyptian Government by their Predecessors in Office, and to those engagements they loyally adhered. The protection of the Red Sea ports was part of these engagements, and Suakin was one of those ports.

*SIR JOHN GORST: I do not know and of course cannot answer as to the accuracy of the report, but clearly what is meant is that happily on most subjects the foreign policy of the country is continuous. The policy instituted by our Predecessors in Office is in its main incidents faithfully followed out by the Government of the day. What is meant is this—that previous Governments had entered into a certain course of policy in reference to the Red Sea ports, had made engagements—not in the sense of Treaties by which a Government is legally bound, but had commenced a course of policy which the present Government felt bound to carry out. I would remind hon. Members of one or two passages in which that policy is set out in despatches from Lord Granville. In a despatch of December 13th, 1883, and to be found in the Egyptian papers presented in the following year, Lord Granville advised the Government of the Khedive to come to an early decision to abandon all territory south of Assouan or Wady Halfa—

“ Her Majesty's Government would then be prepared to assist in maintaining order in Egypt proper, and in defending it as well as the ports on the Red Sea.”

Then again on January 2nd, 1884, in a despatch to be found in the same Blue Book, Lord Granville used these words—

"Her Majesty's Government will on their part be prepared to assist in maintaining order in Egypt proper and continue to protect the ports on the Red Sea."

I refer to these passages to show that the policy which was instituted at that time was one of defending Egypt proper against attack, and in Egypt proper they included ports in the Red Sea, Suakin among the number. This the present Government did when Suakin was threatened, not by the tribes inhabiting that district, but by dervishes coming from a long distance off who had invaded that territory. Her Majesty's Government did that which their Predecessors had on certain conditions engaged to do; they assisted the Khedive. Unfortunately the defence of Suakin was not effected without a certain amount of loss of life, which everybody must regret. So far as may be judged from the present state of affairs at Suakin, Her Majesty's Government have succeeded in preventing the danger which once appeared to threaten Egypt. I will not pursue that matter further, but I must express my astonishment at the observations which the hon. Member for Northampton has made with reference to Sikkim. The hon. Gentleman has asked me to inform him when the people of Thibet began quarrelling with us. The hon. Member is able to answer that question just as well as I am. They began quarrelling with us when they invaded the territory of Sikkim with an armed force, when they built a fort on British territory and occupied that fort for a considerable time. It is really monstrous to say that the Indian Government has manifested an aggressive disposition in the operations which have been recently carried out. All that the Indian Government has done in Sikkim is this. After enduring for an almost unreasonable length of time the presence of this hostile and invading force in their territory, after giving to the Chinese Government ample time as the Suzerain Power to compel its vassal to remove this gross outrage and insult to a friendly Power, the Government of India at last, when every effort had failed, expelled from their own territory the wrongfully invading force, and abstained from anything like a counter-invasion. I do not suppose that the history of the world has exhibited a greater example of forbearance than the stoppage of the victorious Indian Army on the frontier of Thibet and the absence of any kind of revenge or retaliation for the gross outrage received by the Indian Government. The hon. Member asks what are the negotiations? The negotiations now in progress are going on under the auspices of the Government of China, which has in the most loyal manner done its utmost to prevent the incursions of its vassal on Indian territory. These negotiations have for their object the maintenance of peace on the Sikkim frontier, without the necessity for the large body of troops which, in the present condition of affairs, has to be kept there. The hon. Member has asked whether we are likely to be embroiled with China. No, Sir; there is no likelihood of that. On the contrary, the affair of Sikkim has cemented the friendship between this country and China. In a time of trial the Government of China behaved in a most loyal manner to the Government of the Queen. The loss of life which has occurred at Sikkim is not in any way attributable to any want of co-operation on the part of the Chinese Government. It is simply the case of rebellious vassals acting in opposition to the advice and commands of the Suzerain Power, and persisting, in its fanatical zeal, in throwing itself against the British rule, receiving thereby a lesson which I hope there will be no necessity to repeat. A most extraordinary charge has been brought by the hon. Member against the Speech from the Throne, because it contains no mention of India. It contains no mention of India because, I am happy to say, there is nothing connected with our Empire in India which at the present time demands the attention of this House of Parliament. The prosperity of India is so great, the welfare of the people is advancing so rapidly, and everything in India at the present time is so prosperous, that if this House would look nearer home, and would endeavour to make some other provinces of this Empire as quiet and as orderly as India, perhaps the time of Parliament would be better occupied. The hon. Member for Northampton appears to think that some declaration or statement should be made in this House

a Government of defence; and all the military and naval proposals ever made to this House by any Government are never made in the interests of aggression, but of defence. The hon. The hon. Member for Northampton appears to think that some declaration or statement should be made in this House aggression and defence, and he tells us that the wars of this country—at any rate under the present Government—are never in the interests of aggression, but always for defensive purposes. Well, when in the whole history of the world did anyone hear a Government say anything else? Did any Government ever confess to making an aggressive war? If you turn a man out of his house and bolt the door after him you call it “defensive operations” when you resist his attempt to get in at the window. And this is the way politicians, generally, argue about aggressive and defensive wars. Then the hon. Gentleman the Under-Secretary scarcely appreciated, I think, what the hon. Gentleman the Member for Northampton said as to the German colonial operations. It seems to me that much more weight should be attached to the German operations than the hon. Gentleman seems inclined to give to them. Her Majesty’s Government show a wholly insufficient appreciation of public opinion in this country on this matter. Look at the third paragraph in the Queen’s Speech:—

As far as we can understand it, this country has been much more intimately associated with Germany in these negotiations than it has been with the United States, and yet, surely, we are more akin to the United States than to Germany. We have more traditions in common with them, and I cannot but believe that public opinion in this country desires to see rather a fraternal, close, and intimate alliance with the United States, than an intrigue and conspiracy with a despotic power of Europe. But the Government can play on public opinion when it pleases them. In one of the paragraphs of the Queen’s Speech there is allusion to the Convention that has been entered into for the suppression of bounties on the export of sugar. Now I do not for a moment deny that the Government have in the country a certain amount of public opinion to back them up; but that opinion is generated by sectional interests, and it is an opinion that takes altogether a mistaken view even of those sectional interests. There has, undoubtedly, been a considerable outcry about the injuries done to our native labour by the bounties given to foreign sugar; but when we come to the actual facts we do not find that outcry to be fairly and logically justified. I will refer to a Return that the House was good enough to order on my Motion last Session—No. 353, containing a previous Return as to the importation of sugar, and the various sources from which it is brought, and the amount of labour employed in refining. This Return, in table 19, page 26, shows that, in estimating the amount of labour employed in refining at 30 hands per 100 tons of sugar, and making no allowance for labour-saving machinery, in 1880 there were 4,450 persons employed in sugar refining in this country. In 1884, although sugar bounties had been in full operation, the number so employed was 5,200—a very respectable increase, and this notwithstanding that machinery is certainly decreasing the number of hands that are necessary to do the same amount of work. In 1888 the number had fallen to 4,260; but those who examine the Return will see that there are a great many reasons which may possibly account for that decrease besides the influence of foreign bounties. A considerable number of changes have been made in the modus operandi of refining; different classes of sugar are required now from what were used formerly; different methods are adopted, and there is a constant increase of labour-saving machinery. Consequently it may be that this diminution of hands is owing to a passing crisis affecting the trade; but even if that is not so, I ask does a diminution of 940 hands employed in the sugar refining business justify our disturbing the commerce of the whole country? Does that small decrease in the number of people previously employed in one particular industry—not a very great one—justify our doing anything that would threaten to deprive 36,000,000 or 37,000,000 of our population of cheap sugar? I never heard of a proposal of so vast a nature being made upon a narrower basis than this. But there is something more to be said. The Return also shows that there has been a constant increase in the number of hands employed in industries which depend considerably on the cheapness of sugar. The hands so employed in London and the neighbourhood are 6,000, and in the whole kingdom there are at least 12,000 men, women, and children employed in the confectionery and other sugar industries, as against 4,000 or 5,000 employed in sugar-refining. There are other facts which go far to show that our sugar-refining business cannot be suffering to the extent that has sometimes been alleged. The same Return shows that in the production of raw sugar the British cane plant supplied, in 1872, 11 per cent. of the total production of the world, and in 1888, after all the injury alleged to have been done by sugar bounties, British cane supplied precisely the same percentage. The absolute quantity was, in 1872, 325,188 tons, and in 1888, 542,290 tons—not so large an increase as has taken place in other trades, but still an increase that should not be despised. Of course, beet-sugar has increased enormously; but the Return shows that the increase of beet has been mainly at the expense of foreign cane, which has diminished by about 5 per cent. This further point is to be noted—that between 1872 and 1887 the imports of raw sugar increased more rapidly than the imports of refined sugar. Thus, in 1872, the imports of raw beet sugar into the United Kingdom amounted to 1,959,630 cwt., and of refined beet sugar to 1,719,000 cwt. But, in 1887, the raw imports had risen to 9,223,856 cwt., or had been almost quintupled, while the refined imports had not been quadrupled, the figure at the later date being 6,220,453 cwt. Now this preponderance in the increase of raw imports cannot be accounted for by the needs of brewers. It shows a growth in the demands of our home refiners. I cannot see that the sugar-refining industry of this country is falling off, at any rate to such a degree as would justify our entering into a Convention with Foreign Powers, which may have the effect of requiring us to exclude the cheap sugar that is a great benefit to our poor population. I ask what justification Her Majesty's Government have for asking for so great a change of the law as they seem likely to propose in this matter? What is this boasted Convention? Her Majesty's Government gathered together Representatives of a certain number of foreign nations, and there was great difficulty in getting them to agree. Concessions were made, and, after all, France made her consent to the Convention conditional on all the great sugar-producing countries in the world, including, I suppose, the United States and Brazil, coming under it. Well, of the United States the Government evidently has no hope whatever. The United States simply decline to enter into the Convention on any terms. Brazil is willing to do so if all other sugar countries are willing, and I do not therefore see that there is any very clear prospect of that country entering into the Convention either. Let us note this in addition, that France makes her consent dependent on America and Brazil being included, and that Austria makes her consent dependent on the inclusion of all the cheap sugar-producing countries in Europe in the arrangement. How can we have a satisfactory Convention when such a state of disagreement exists among the nations who profess to enter into it? But even if there had been greater agreement, I hold that a more retrograde or more mischievous step has not been proposed for years than that of depriving the mass of our people of the cheap sugar they now enjoy for the benefit of a very small fraction of the population. It may be said that the Convention could work without raising the price of sugar in this country; but that assertion is hardly consistent with the complaint that our sugar refiners cannot compete with bounty-fed sugar on account of the cheapness of the latter. It is against the essential and fundamental principle of Free Trade to deprive our poor people of the right to go into any market in which they can honestly buy at the lowest possible price. Suppose the good people of France or Germany were to offer to make a present of some 50,000 bags of sugar to the poor people of our country, I wonder would the hon. Gentleman, the Under Secretary for the Colonies prohibit the importation of such a handsome present? I do not believe it for a moment; but that is precisely the effect that will be produced by this Convention if it works prohibitively. Let it be granted that our people do receive sugar more cheaply than they ought to do—all that it means is that they get more sugar for the same price than they would otherwise get—that is to say, they get something besides what they would receive if sugar were at a higher price. It may be said that this works unfairly upon the labour of foreign countries. I fear it may. The system of bounties is thoroughly unsound and strongly to be condemned; but the people of France and Germany at any rate do this thing with their eyes open. They think it is a benefit to them. We know that it is not a benefit to them, but a benefit to us. But still, if they, with their eyes open, willingly of their generosity offer to our poor people this good, I want to know what sound political doctrine requires us to refuse it? No, Sir; the true policy of this country is to show its unshaken faith in Free Trade; and once we begin to limit its operation here, and to take precautions there, we shall soon be landed in naked Protection. When other nations see our Government going about cap in hand requesting them to enter into a Convention of this character they will say that England has lost her faith in Free Trade, and that, too, at a time when the soundness of its doctrine is triumphantly manifested by the superiority of our commercial position to that of all other countries in the world. In conclusion, I take this opportunity of giving fair warning that whatever legislation is necessary for carrying out this Convention will certainly be opposed tooth and nail.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Fermanagh N.): I was not able to put the Question I had on the paper to-day with reference to the action of the Australian Colonies in regard to the difficulty in Samoa. The Question I had on the paper was with reference to the representations made by the Federal Council of Australia to the Imperial Government in regard to the Samoan Question. I should like to ask the Under Secretary if he can explain to us the position of Her Majesty's Government with reference to the Australian Colonies on this question? The Australian Colonies are affected by the question more nearly than the people of the United States, of Germany, or of this country, and they have a strong feeling that they ought to be directly consulted in reference to it. At the Conference which is to take place at Berlin, the Representative of this country should be charged with special instructions upon behalf of the Australian people. We know very well that the Islands of Samoa are regarded by the Australian people with a certain amount of jealousy, and the action which I feel very much inclined, and which a great many people are very much inclined, to call the piratical action of the Germans in Samoa, has created a very nasty feeling amongst the people of the Colonies. I think it would have been as well if, in the Speech from the Throne, some statement had been made in reference to the representation which has come from Australia on this question. The right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for India has referred to the friendly terms upon which this country is with the Chinese Government. But this is a question also on which the Under Secretary for India can inform me. Last Session I had occasion to put several questions to him as to the negotiations between the Government of this country and the Government of China on the question of Chinese emigration to the Australian Colonies. That is a question upon which the Australian people feel very keenly. I think it would be much more satisfactory if, in Speeches from the Throne, the Government made it their business to put in a paragraph with reference to the interests of the Australian people. You expect the Australian people to be thoroughly loyal to this country, and to submit all their foreign relations to the Government of this country, and yet there are several pressing questions—there is the question of Chinese emigration to Australia, upon which the greatest interest is felt throughout all the Colonies, as I have reason to know—of which mention of some kind might have been made in the Speech from the Throne, together with a deal more about the interests of those people in the Colonies. I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies in the first place whether it would not be possible at this Conference, so nearly affecting the interests of the Australians, for an Australian Representative to be present with the representatives of the United States and Germany; and, if not, whether the Government will take into consideration the representations made by the Australian people on this question, so that the British Ambassador when he goes to Berlin may be in the position of speaking in a thoroughly representative way? I also wish to know whether there is any information upon the question of Chinese emigration to Australia? I think the right hon. Gentleman may be in a position to answer me upon this point, and it would obviate my having to put a Question on the paper next week.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron HENRY DE WORMS) (Toxteth, East): The hon. Member for Northampton, whose absence from the House I regret, has alluded to some concession which was given some short time ago, and which he alleged ought not to have been granted, assuming that Her Majesty's Government had the power to prevent the granting of concessions. The territory in which the concession has been granted was simply within the sphere of Great Britain's influence, and, although Her Majesty's Government had power to advise, they had none to prevent the grant of the concession. He proceeded to educe from the fact that because Sir S. Shippard visited Mashonaland he was responsible for the grant made there. As a matter of fact, Sir S. Shippard was simply concerned to investigate the Grobelaar incident, and to prevent a collision between two chiefs, Khama and Lobengula, and his visit had nothing to do with the concession. The hon. Member for Northampton has made a grave charge against Sir Hercules Robinson. He has suggested that the concession had been improperly granted through influence exerted by Sir Hercules Robinson. I must say the history he gave of the case was somewhat peculiar. The hon. Member stated that Sir Hercules Robinson was a shareholder in a certain Company; that the agent of that Company had acted as the proxy of Sir Hercules Robinson at a meeting; that a person acting on behalf of that agent had obtained the concession in question; and that, therefore, it was by the influence of Sir Hercules Robinson that the concession had been improperly obtained. Well, Sir, I need not point out that in everyday life men who are shareholders in Companies are often called upon by circular to give proxies to someone else, but I have never yet heard that they were responsible for the subsequent action of their proxies, especially in the degree maintained by the hon. Member. It is only fair to Sir Hercules Robinson to read an extract from a letter written by him on the 15th of January last, to the following effect:—

“As to gold mines, gold shares, and gold syndicates and concessions, over which the people in London as well as here seem to have simply gone mad, I have never touched one of them, and am, neither directly nor indirectly, interested in anything of the kind. In the furious scramble for concessions which has taken place the wildest falsehoods are invented.”

There is, then, no foundation for the statement that any influence has been brought to bear for the granting of this concession by Her Majesty's Government. The country in question is not under a British protectorate, but simply in the sphere of British influence. All the Government can do is to advise the chiefs not to foolishly grant concessions. We cannot prevent their so doing, but it is our endeavour to protect them and the investing public as far as possible. With reference to the remarks of the hon. Member for Fermanagh, the Government has not received the resolution in question relating to Samoa, though we know by telegram that it is on the road. It would be absolutely unnecessary for Australia to be specially represented at the Conference on Samoan affairs, because the representation of Great Britain would insure the representation of all Imperial interests. With regard to the Chinese Question, I have nothing further to add to what I said in answer to the hon. Member last Session. We have had no further representations from the Colonies on the subject. Of course, should there be any representations they will certainly not be carefully considered by the Government.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: The right hon. Gentleman will remember that he informed us that, in consequence of the representations from the Colonies last Session on the Chinese Question, Her Majesty's Government had entered into negotiations with the Chinese Government, and it is with reference to those negotiations that I proposed to ask a question.

*BARON HENRY DE WORMS: The result of those negotiations is not yet known, and that is a matter which does

price than they would otherwise get—that is to say, they get something besides what they would receive if sugar were at a higher price. It may be said that this works unfairly upon the labour of foreign countries. I fear it may. The system of bounties is thoroughly unsound and strongly to be condemned; but the people of France and Germany at any rate do this thing with their eyes open. They think it is a benefit to them. We know that it is not a benefit to them, but a benefit to us. But still, if they, with their eyes open, willingly of their generosity offer to our poor people this good, I want to know what sound political doctrine requires us to refuse it? No, Sir; the true policy of this country is to show its unshaken faith in Free Trade; and once we begin to limit its operation here, and to take precautions there, we shall soon be landed in naked Protection. When other nations see our Government going about cap in hand requesting them to enter into a Convention of this character they will say that England has lost her faith in Free Trade, and that, too, at a time when the soundness of its doctrine is triumphantly manifested by the superiority of our commercial position to that of all other countries in the world. In conclusion, I take this opportunity of giving fair warning that whatever legislation is necessary for carrying out this Convention will certainly be opposed tooth and nail.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Fermanagh N.): I was not able to put the Question I had on the paper to-day with reference to the action of the Australian Colonies in regard to the difficulty in Samoa. The Question I had on the paper was with reference to the representations made by the Federal Council of Australia to the Imperial Government in regard to the Samoan Question. I should like to ask the Under Secretary if he can explain to us the position of Her Majesty's Government with reference to the Australian Colonies on this question? The Australian Colonies are affected by the question more nearly than the people of the United States, of Germany, or of this country, and they have a strong feeling that they ought to be directly consulted in reference to it. At the Conference which is to take place at Berlin, the Representative of this country should be charged with special instructions upon behalf of the Australian people. We know very well that the Islands of Samoa are regarded by the Australian people with a certain amount of jealousy, and the action which I feel very much inclined, and which a great many people are very much inclined, to call the piratical action of the Germans in Samoa, has created a very nasty feeling amongst the people of the Colonies. I think it would have been as well if, in the Speech from the Throne, some statement had been made in reference to the representation which has come from Australia on this question. The right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for India has referred to the friendly terms upon which this country is with the Chinese Government. But this is a question also on which the Under Secretary for India can inform me. Last Session I had occasion to put several questions to him as to the negotiations between the Government of this country and the Government of China on the question of Chinese emigration to the Australian Colonies. That is a question upon which the Australian people feel very keenly. I think it would be much more satisfactory if, in Speeches from the Throne, the Government made it their business to put in a paragraph with reference to the interests of the Australian people. H possibility of such a ruling, I want an assurance from the Government that they will give us the fullest opportunity of discussing the whole Convention. [The Chancellor of the Exchequer at this point returned to his seat, and Sir Lyon Playfair repeated his request, and went on to say]: For my part, I think the Convention an essentially bad one. I think that it is impracticable in its working, and that it will bring us into collision with other countries if its powers are put into execution. Under it we have to give up our free will, and have to trust to a majority of other nations as to whether sugar imported from other nations is bounty-fed or not. Thinking that the Convention is a bad one, and believing also that the working classes will suffer very injuriously by it, we on this side of the House, or, at least, many of us, are exceedingly anxious to discuss the matter in the fullest way, but think it would be quite absurd to attempt to discuss it upon the Address in reply to Her Majesty's gracious Speech.

MR. R. A. ALLISON (Cumberland, Eskdale): I think hon. Members have a great cause of complaint that they have not had an opportunity hitherto of discussing this important matter. There are some people who think that all Treaties and Conventions should be brought before the House at an early stage. I certainly think that a Convention of this character, which deals with most important questions, and which is so entirely at variance with the commercial principles which this country has so long professed, should have been laid before Parliament before the Government committed themselves so deeply to it. I must confess that if the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for the Colonies (Baron H. de Worms) were now present, I should condole with him on the circumstances under which he made his speech: he, an ardent free trader, was supported by two of the most ardent Protectionists in the House. I only hope the same cheers will await the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he undertakes what the Times told him the other day would be the most difficult task of the programme he has before him this Session. The whole circumstances under which this Convention has been made are of the most humiliating character to this country. Surely no more humiliating spectacle has ever been revealed than that of the hon. Gentleman (Baron H. de Worms) going about the Continent endeavouring to get up this Convention. No one who reads the Report of the Convention that has been issued can doubt for a moment that the hon. Gentleman was either willingly, or unwillingly, the mere tool or dupe of those with whom he was conducting the negotiations, and that the Representatives of countries, Protectionist themselves, were only too glad to win so cheap a triumph over one who professed to be so ardent a free trader. It is true he posed very largely as an adherent of the Free Trade policy; but he seemed only too ready to lower his flag at the first summons of the foe. The hon. Gentleman, whose lavish hospitalities were the theme of so many eulogiums, was careful from time to time, by way of keeping up the farce at which he was assisting, to raise his professions in favour of that very Free Trade which, in my opinion, he was deliberately betraying. When the moment for delivering the final stab came—when on the 7th of May he announced the adhesion of the Cabinet to countervailing duties—he declared the final surrender to those demands which are absolutely hostile to the principles of that Free Trade which we believe to be so essential to the welfare of our country. And the right hon. Gentleman, in the closing address he made to his dear Colleagues before the Conference separated, said that Great Britain “has shown no symptoms of a return to the Protectionist policy against which the nation declared many years ago.” The hon. Gentleman made some allusion to the fact that sugar would not be made dearer but we are all accustomed to his arguments on that point. We have some strong authorities we can quote against him. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) came to the conclusion, in 1881, that the price of sugar would be increased by no less than a farthing a pound, which meant a tax of three millions sterling on the great masses of the people. The London Workmen's Anti-Bounty Association came to exactly the same figure; and Mr. Giffen, in 1884, was of opinion that the tax put on the working-classes would amount that will be beneficial to the masses of the people in this country—that this is not class legislation, but mass legislation.

We have felt—not the present Government alone, but successive Governments for nearly a quarter of a century—that the bounty system is absolutely indefensible in the case of shipping and other matters, as well as in that of sugar. The hon. Gentleman appears here in the character of Representative of Leicester. I should like to ask him a question. Will the hon. Member address a meeting in Leicester and advocate the importation into this country of hosiery on which a bounty had been paid by Germany? But if he does not advocate a bounty being given by Germany on hosiery—which she could perfectly well do—how is it he does not agree with Her Majesty's Government in supporting the abolition of bounties on sugar? Surely he cannot make a distinction between one article and another? If we are justified in receiving bounty-fed sugar, we are equally justified in receiving bounty-fed hosiery, or any other article on which it might please foreign countries to give a bounty. If such a state of things becomes general, the home trade of this country will in a very few years be almost ruined. This is not a question of free trade; it is a question of unfair trade. Free trade is what the French call libre échange—a free exchange. Does the hon. Gentleman maintain that because we open our ports free to every article we are bound to allow all articles with a bounty in advance to come in and compete with our own goods and destroy our manufactures? So long as we get the goods somewhat cheaper, it seems, according to the hon. Gentleman, not to matter whether or not a few thousand workmen starve. If we have thousands of workmen out of employ, what becomes of them? Why, they and their families become chargeable to the rates. On the mere question of money, independently of the far greater humanitarian and industrial question, the position of the hon. Gentleman is absolutely indefensible. The hon. Gentleman went on to say that certain countries had not agreed to the Convention, and that Austria has only agreed to the Convention on the condition that all the countries in Europe should also agree. That is not strictly accurate.

Austria said she would reserve her right to reconsider her position if certain European countries did not accept the Convention, and France also said she reserved to herself, under Article VIII., the right to come into the Convention during the limits of time. Now, Sir, with regard to the prohibitory clause, which so excited the hon. Gentleman's ire, I do not think the hon. Member has carefully read the Convention, for the clause only comes into effect by the voice of all the signatory Powers to the Convention. It is a joint arrangement made by all the Powers for the purpose of suppressing the bounty system, which they see is iniquitous. Surely all who have the interests of the masses at heart must feel great relief that, after this question has during 24 years been considered by successive Governments, Her Majesty's present Advisers have been fortunate enough to convince foreign Governments of the folly of the bounty system, and by that means enable our own sugar trade once more to thrive, and to hold out some hope to our Colonies that a revival will take place in the value of land devoted to the cultivation of the sugar plant, and that an industry which flourished for so many years may once again take the place it formerly enjoyed.

*SIR LYON PLAYFAIR (Leeds, S.): I am afraid what I intended to say, which would not have amounted to a speech at all, but simply to a request to obtain information from the Government, is useless just now, as there is no Member of the Government present. My object was to state that this is a subject of such large dimensions, and of such enormous importance to the working classes of this country, that it is perfectly impossible to discuss it satisfactorily or adequately upon the Address in reply to the Queen's Speech. I will not attempt to discuss it upon such an occasion. All I wanted was an assurance from the Government, if any Member of the Government had chosen to be in his place at this time, that there would be an ample opportunity afforded for the discussion of this question. The Queen's Speech speaks of a "legislative provision." Now that legislative provision might be brought forward on such a narrow basis that you, Mr. Speaker, might say we cannot discuss the Convention upon it. In view of the ing that the French would soon give the bounties up. We have come to the rescue, and have done so by fettering ourselves with chains not imposed on other nations. We are taking a backward step, and it is for these reasons I oppose the proposals of the Government. I hope they will be fully discussed, and I trust the House will not pass them without hearing some very much better arguments than those we have yet heard.

*MR. T. SUTHERLAND (Greenock): As the House will have another opportunity of discussing this matter, I do not propose to discuss it at any great length now. But I think I should be wrong if I refrained from saying a few words on a subject which affects so deeply the constituency I represent. The speech of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Allison) does not seem to me to call for any lengthy or elaborate reply. There were two points—two only—in the speech of the hon. Member which struck me as of the slightest importance. The first was that he was most distinctly an ardent Free Trader. That, of course, goes without saying, because, with very few exceptions, every Member of the House is a Free Trader. The next point was that he is not only an ardent Free Trader, but that he highly disapproves of bounties. It will be observed, however, that between his disapproval of bounties on the one hand and acceptance of the practice, though not of the principle, of bounties on the other, there is a wide gulf fixed. It appears to me, if, as it is admitted on all hands in and out of the House, bounties are at variance with the principle of Free Trade in every respect, if they are prejudicial, and part and parcel of the Protective system, then I should like to ask the hon. Member who has just sat down, and others, what is their remedy, what they would have us do? I would ask, in weighing and considering this question, whether it is likely to be more advantageous to this country that this pernicious system should continue to exist, or whether it would be better to put an end to it by such means as we now have in our power? In the first place, I am disposed to agree with my right hon. Friend opposite, that it may be possible to do a vast amount of harm to trade simply for the sake of mere cheapness; but, while I will not attempt to carry that argument any distance, for it remains with those who oppose the Government to show that it will necessarily follow that the price of sugar will be enhanced if these bounties are put an end to, and free and unrestricted competition takes place throughout the world, I believe hon. Gentlemen will have great difficulty in proving a case of this kind. I believe, on the contrary, that by the removal of these bounties you will stimulate enterprise not merely in the trade with which my constituency is concerned (refining), but you will stimulate enterprise throughout our Colonies, not only in the West Indies, but in our great Australian Colonies, where enterprise at present in connection with the production of sugar is wellnigh dormant. If bounties are removed, and Free Trade operates throughout the world in relation to sugar production, it is impossible to imagine that we shall not have a larger, better and cheaper supply than we have at present. Therefore, it appears to me that the action of the Government is simply in the interest of Free Trade, entirely in the interest not only of industrial centres in this country connected with this particular produce, but in the interest of the great consuming class who will obtain, I believe—I do not say at once, I do not say that a revolution in trade will be immediate—but who certainly will under unlimited production obtain a better and cheaper article than at present. There is a fact to be borne in mind, a fact constantly omitted in the speeches of doctrinaires, that the fluctuations in the price of sugar in consequence of our dependence on this bounty-fed article have been enormous, and almost dangerous. Now if the Government had come forward with a proposal, a proposal that has been frequently advocated in places where sugar industries exist, to place on all bounty-fed sugar from all parts of the world a countervailing duty, certainly I should not have supported the Government in such action, notwithstanding the fact that it would have been in the interest of the particular industry with which my constituents are associated. I would not have supported the Government in a proposal to place a countervailing duty on sugar coming from all these countries where the bounty system prevails. In the first place, I believe it would be impossible to impose a really equivalent countervailing duty; and, in the next place, such action would have had the effect of keeping out a large proportion of the raw material now used in this country. The course Her Majesty's Government have adopted is entirely different and much better. They have endeavoured — and I believe that they have so far succeeded by diplomatic action to bring about a general agreement among the Powers of Europe—to put an end to this system which the hon. Member has just denounced, which he has admitted to be pernicious and opposed to the principles of Free Trade. While commending the Government for their action in this direction, and sincerely expressing the hope that they may succeed in giving effect to those efforts, I would point out that their action has a wider significance than merely in relation to the article of sugar. It is a most important point gained by this and every Free Trade country that there should be a general agreement arrived at among the Powers of Europe, as it were, to determine to put an end to the bounty system entirely. I do not say that result is immediately to be brought about; but I say it is a most valuable concession for this Government to have achieved in connection with sugar, because it leads up to and involves a larger principle affecting far greater industries than that of sugar. Of course, I have more particularly in my mind the system that exists in connection with bounties on shipping. Hon. Members are, of course, aware that France and Italy at present have a system of large bounties to enable their Mercantile Marine to compete with other countries, and with this country chiefly. It is commonly supposed that these bounties are productive of little or no injury to the shipping trade of this country; and I am bound to admit that, so far as the matter can be tested by the progress of our Mercantile Marine, that certainly would appear to be the case. But I could, if necessary, point to individual cases of loss and hardship arising out of this system of a singular and large character. One instance I may mention with which I am personally familiar, the competition of a well-known Italian public company in the trade between two English Colonies.

The Rubatine State line of steamships is under the patronage of the Italian Government in a sense not understood here, and the bounty system encouraged the Company to intervene in the trade carried on between two English Colonies under the English flag, and the loss to shipping under the English flag trading between Bombay and Hong Kong is in consequence of a very serious character. The competition of France and Italy in our commerce and with our Mercantile Marine is not very serious, taking it on a large scale; but what I am apprehensive of, and what I have dreaded for years, has been that Germany would extend her bounty system in this direction. We know that in ordinary commerce Germany is the greatest competitor this country has. It is a fact I became aware of through the examination of some papers circulated last Session that the progress of Germany in external trade has been relatively greater than of Great Britain during some years, except so far as our trade with our own Colonies is concerned. Taking the rest of the world, Germany has advanced her external trade in a greater ratio during more recent years than we have advanced ours. Therefore I confess, seeing what the tendency of the German Government has been, seeing how extremely anxious they have been to extend their operations to the most distant parts of the earth, seeing that they have lately been subsidizing large fleets of vessels in Australian and Chinese waters, not on account of German commerce existing, but for the German commerce that might be created, I confess I have been apprehensive that if the bounty system should be allowed to continue there would be, and there may be even now, very great danger that Germany would not be content with bounties affecting sugar, but would extend this evil system to industries of far greater importance. It is not possible to imagine the irreparable loss this country would suffer if this Convention were not to take effect, and the German Government, finding it did not take effect, were to take it into their heads to extend the bounty system to other industries.

MR. C. W. GRAY (Essex, Maldon): I had only intended to take up a short time in reference to agriculture, a subject with which I feel more competent to deal; but the allusion of the hon. Member for the Eskdale Division to myself as a well-known Protectionist who applauded the speech of the Under Secretary for the Colonies leads me to make some reply. I do not think the hon. Member, anxious as he was to appreciate the remarks of the Under Secretary, was thoroughly well up in his subject, and this I think has been clearly shown by the hon. Member who has just spoken, and who, as a Free Trader, has thoroughly supported the Under Secretary for the Colonies. That in itself is significant, and affords a complete answer when answer is required. I was alluded to as a Protectionist, and without contradicting or disclaiming the title, I may say that I have taken the greatest interest in finding out what are the views of British workmen on this and kindred subjects. I have learned the views of many of our British workmen from attending meetings which were being addressed by gentlemen of the politics of the hon. Member opposite, and so-called Free-traders. I will refer to one important speech made by a Trades Unionist on a similar question to this. I will give the place and sufficient data to enable hon. Gentlemen to correct me if I am in error. It was at a meeting held at Sudbury, in Suffolk, a year or two ago, when a large number of operatives in the trade of mat weaving were out on strike. They were addressed in the Market Hall by a Trades Unionist, who came from London with half-sovereigns and half-crowns to enable the men to stand out on strike, and the speech that gentleman made was flavoured with a good deal of Radical politics, and I believe his audience mainly consisted of Radicals. The point in the speech I wish to allude to was this—

“My men, said he, the grievance you have to complain of is this, that your masters have issued a catalogue of prices of goods they sell which they have made so low to undercut catalogues issued by similar manufacturers in other parts of England. You must do everything you can to insist that such a state of things shall not go on.”

Then he went on to insist

“that no master should ever issue a catalogue of prices which did not comply with the conditions; first, that prices should leave the master a fair margin of profit, but what was of far greater importance, such prices as would enable the master to give his workmen fair and just wages.”

These propositions were cheered to the echo by the men. The speaker then proceeded to declare that,

“People who bought the mats should never object to give threepence or sixpence more, if this money enabled manufacturers to comply with these conditions.”

Things conveyed in this practical way make more impression than much theory; and this meeting made a great impression upon me. I believe the man was perfectly right, and I believe the operatives of England have a right to demand that consumers should give such prices as will insure the fulfilment of these conditions. And now to a subject in which I am more at home. We have had every hobby trotted out by hon. Gentlemen opposite—speeches from advocates of temperance, grievances in connection with the Sister-isle, the claims of Scotland, and even gallant little Wales has not been altogether quiet. Compared with other subjects that have divided the interest of the House, agriculture has not occupied much attention. I am glad to find that this time, in the gracious Speech from the Throne, there is something more than an expression of sympathy for the depressed state of agriculture. A little help is worth a great deal of pity, and we find expressed an intention to deal with three subjects directly interesting to agriculturists—namely, tithes, the formation of a Board of Agriculture, and a cheaper form of transfer of land. These are subjects that have been talked about for a long time, and I believe both Parties have held out hopes of bringing in measures to put matters right in connection with these subjects; but, somehow or other, up to the present, they have always been shelved. I hope there will be no shelving of these matters this Session, and that the Government will make every effort to add useful measures in this direction to the Statute Book. The tithe question is most important to the agricultural interest, and I believe a settlement of it is more important still to those who love the Church of England. The opportunity now offers to deal with it in a manner satisfactory to all parties concerned; but if this opportunity is neglected, I fear the settlement will be carried out by the enemies of the Church. I would advise every friend of the Church not to be too greedy as to the terms by which it may be proposed to carry out a much-wanted reform. I hope it will be remembered that, as to a great portion of the agricultural tithe-bearing lands of England, the tithes have become a burden hardly to be borne. I know farm after farm in the Eastern Counties where to-day the tithe equals, if it does not actually exceed, the rent. But into the tithe question I will not now enter, but with the greatest earnestness I appeal to the front bench to carry the measure through this Session, and I would urge hon. Members to display their sympathy with one of England's greatest, oldest industries, and not to allow Party politics to prevent a useful measure being carried to a beneficial and satisfactory issue. With regard to the Board of Agriculture, I will only say that all must admit that the time has come when England at least should have as well equipped a Board of Agriculture as those countries who compete with our farmers in the English markets. Proposals for cheapening the transfer of land should, I think, meet with the approval and support of Members, no matter on which side of the House they sit. Many hon. Members on the other side have advocated it, and argued that agriculture will never return to the proud position it used to occupy until means are given to small farmers to purchase their holdings. I do not myself believe that so long as the advocates of so-called Free Trade are successful, the possession of farms large or small will be of much benefit; but, at the same time, I hold that everyone who thinks he can make a profitable purchase of a small farm should have every facility for the trial. Before I sit down, I, with respect, but without fear—for we farmers have got beyond fear, and if we do not speak out now, when may we?—I would refer to a remark that fell from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid-Lothian. I was surprised to find the right hon. Gentleman throw out a prophecy, or a hint, in the remark that he doubted very much as to whether the Government would really pass these measures. No doubt, if the obstruction of last year is repeated, the passing of such measures will be prevented, and I am afraid that the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid-Lothian may fairly be supposed to have meant, "If you do not take care what you are about, we will see that these measures do not pass." I hope that was not the right hon. Gentleman's intention; but such an interpretation will be given to his words in many a country village during the next few days. I feel that the farmers of England have been most patient, and their Representatives in the House of Commons have been most loyal in their support of the Government. We wish to continue loyal; but, at the same time, our grievances are such that we think that in the name of fairness we have a right to claim more attention for those grievances in the future than they have had in the past.

Mr. C. W. Gray

MR. STUART RENDEL (Montgomeryshire): It is not often that any Welsh Member attempts to intervene in debate so early in the Session, and especially in the debate upon the Speech from the Throne. But, under present circumstances, the Welsh Members would err greatly, and do an injustice both to themselves and their constituents, if they did not attempt to take an immediate occasion of making themselves heard. Last year the Welsh Members were singularly unfortunate in securing an opportunity. The Speech from the Throne this year is marked by the absence of one particular measure which has appeared in several previous Speeches, and unfortunately it is also marked by the presence of a measure to which the Welsh Members entertain a most deeply-rooted objection. The measure which we miss is that for establishing a system of intermediate education in Wales. Previous Speeches from the Throne have contained a reference to that measure as one of urgency and justice. Therefore in this respect Wales, instead of keeping its position, is losing ground in Parliament. It is true that as a private Member I have obtained leave to introduce a Bill on the subject, but it is obvious that a measure of such importance cannot be carried through Parliament except as a Government measure. Until this Parliament it cannot be said that Wales has ever been heard in this House distinctively as Wales. Before the operation of the Ballot Act there was only the representation of a class in Wales, and of a class which desired rather to Anglicize Wales than to recognize it in any way as possessing a nationality and character of its own. It was only after the passing of the Ballot Act that the people of Wales really obtained representation. The first result of a real representation was to show that in no other part of the kingdom was there so much political unanimity as in Wales and such definite political aims. In that state of things it is desirable that if nothing can be done to forward Welsh views care should at least be taken that nothing is done which would distinctly create dissatisfaction in Wales. Now, a very large majority of the Welsh people will regard the Tithes Bill announced in the Queen's Speech as a reactionary and aggressive measure. A Tithes Bill such as the Government introduced last Session, if regarded as a remedy for the evil, would be a remedy much worse than the disease itself. The avowed object of the Tithe Bill was to meet what was considered to be a dangerous agitation in Wales. The abatements asked for at the time of the agitation were conceded by a considerable proportion of the beneficed clergy. Collisions might never have occurred in Wales if it had not been for those bodies of owners, the least deserving of any sympathy from the public, who proved the hardest, the most unbending, and the most determined to resist to the bitter end the demand which the beneficed clergy themselves had conceded. One of those bodies was Christ Church, Oxford. No doubt it was in the exercise of what it deemed to be its duties as the trustees of a charity that it thought it was incumbent upon it to accept a collision, and to resist to the point of endangering the public peace the demand of the tenant-farmers for an abatement of tithe. Another body that took the same course was a more important body—the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. They also determined to resist at all cost and risk, and the result was that certain collisions took place. After all, those collisions led to nothing more serious than a popular demonstration of Welsh discontent and dissatisfaction. It was a significant feature of this Welsh demonstration that the bodies which brought about the collision were those who applied the tithes to purposes most thoroughly alien to the sympathies and interests of the Welsh people. Personally, I do not see how tithes are to be maintained either in Wales or England unless their application meets with the approval of the people. But, assuming public opinion in England to be favourable to the present use of tithe, I ask the House in this matter to treat Wales as a country for the Welsh, as a public by itself; and, considering the application of tithes in Wales, there is undoubtedly a very strong resentment and antipathy on the part of the Welsh against their application for such purposes as the support of Christ Church, or for the purposes to which the Ecclesiastical Commissioners put them. No doubt there have been disturbances in Wales; but upon that point I do not think the House has been adequately informed. I think the Government honestly believed that there is a danger of disturbance in Wales. But if they could now be satisfied that that danger does not exist, their anxiety to settle the question by some alteration in the machinery for the collection of tithe would be abated. What were the disturbances? Any candid reader of the Report of Mr. Bridge, the Commissioner appointed by the Government themselves, would come to the conclusion that these disturbances would never have occurred if it had not been for the somewhat intemperate zeal with which the authorities first concerned displayed military force in the face of the Welsh people, who are most sensitive about the use of soldiery in civil affairs. In the gravest case the collision was brought about in consequence of masses of men being forced down a hill by a mere accident. Mr. Bridge was sent down by the Home Office in the expectation that his Report would justify the taking of strong measures against the Welsh tithe agitation; but, on the contrary, the Reports of that gentleman have really deprived the Government of all justification for taking further steps in the matter. Mr. Bridge asked the Government to institute no new prosecutions in regard to the disturbances into which he inquired. A considerable time has elapsed since the disturbances first occurred, and the peaceful process of agitation against the collection of tithe without abatement has continued. In my own county there have been most effective popular demonstrations of the disapproval of the Welsh people against the present use of tithe and of their objection to pay it unless under actual compulsion. Those demonstrations have been entirely within the law; there has been no occasion to interfere with them; and they have led to no serious inconvenience whatever. I believe that that has been due to the reversal of the unwise policy of the local authorities, and to the extremely prudent military chief constable of excellent civilian ideas, Major Godfrey, who has highly distinguished himself in this matter by the great tact and discretion he has shown. Major Godfrey made it his duty to see, personally, all the persons who were to be distrained upon for non-payment of tithe, and on receiving adequate assurances from them, he, on his part, promised that not a single police constable should appear on the scene when the distress was levied. By the adoption of this prudent and proper treatment of the case no breach of the peace has occurred, and in the county of Montgomery, at any rate, no inconvenience or loss has been sustained. No doubt the course pursued by Major Godfrey met with the disapproval of some of the local clergy, but Major Godfrey has been amply justified by the Conservative Quarter Sessions, and the first person to justify him was the Conservative Lord Lieutenant of the county. I will therefore ask the House to consider whether the practical outcome of the agitation in Wales, as it has now come to light through the examination invited by the Government itself at the hands of Mr. Bridge, and as it has been tested by subsequent events, presents any case such as the Government last Session supposed to exist for legislation of this kind. I believe I shall be supported by the great majority of the Welsh Members when I say that there really is no need for these Bills whatever so far as Wales is concerned. There is a disposition in some quarters to speak of tithe as if it were property, not only of the ordinary kind, but of a specially inviolable and sacred character. Persons who speak in this manner have not taken much trouble to investigate the history of tithe. Among those who appear to be the strongest supporters of tithe will be found those great landowners and pillars of the Church, who depend very largely on Church lands in which tithes have been long ago merged by an act of spoliation and robbery inexcusable and discreditable, which turned public property into private property. The agitation in Wales to a large extent accounts for the existence in the Queen's Speech of the proposal to carry these Bills. But it is in Wales itself that the case of tithe is most indefensible and most dangerous to touch. There is a certain popular assent and sympathy with the use of tithes in England which protects the property and influences our ideas in dealing with it. In Wales that sympathy is entirely the other way, although Wales has been remarkable always for its love of religion, and has no ill-will for the Church as a Church. Wales has a more glorious episode in its history than, perhaps, any other part of the Queen's dominions in relation to its culture of religion. Wales, at a time when Christianity was almost extinct in the country, reconquered and revived it, and that was the act of the humblest of its people, and done in the face of opposition sometimes almost malignant. Having renewed religion in the hearts of the people, the appliances of religion have been completely and adequately supplied from the same humble and popular sources, and there is no part of Her Majesty's dominions where religious appliances are now so adequate to the wants of the people as in Wales. You have in Wales the voluntary system triumphant, adequate, and in actual possession, and in that respect tithes are not in the faintest degree essential to the maintenance of religion. Then, what is the use of tithes? A contrary view, I know, is suggested by many high authorities, and especially those friendly to the English Establishment. It is said that that the Welsh clergy are very poor. If that is so, whose is the fault, and where does the blame lie?—because, after all, almost all the land and the great bulk of the wealth of Wales is in the Church hands; and that the clergy of the rich should be poor while the humble people have so completely supplied their own religious needs can only be described as a deep and lasting discredit to the upper and Anglicizing classes of the Principality. There is another reason why the Welsh clergy are poor, and one that I think too often escapes observation, and that is that the Welsh clergy are a great deal too numerous. The numbers are very easily ascertained. Anyone who refers to "Whittaker's Almanack" can discover them. "Whittaker" is an impartial authority, and though it can only give an estimate of the Church population of England and Wales, I believe its estimate will be pretty generally accepted. It is 13,500,000. "Whittaker" does not give the number of beneficed clergy and curates apart from the unattached clergy, but the totals in 1887 were, in fact, in England alone 12,804 beneficed clergy and 1,275 curates. If I were to deduct half-a-million from the 13,500,000 Church people of England and Wales and ascribe 500,000 to Wales, I should be, I think, treated by the Nonconformists of Wales as making an excessive deduction, and attributing to the Principality a proportion greatly beyond its true Church population. But if, in order to avoid all doubt and criticism, we take half-a-million as the amount of Church population in Wales, then this is the result—there is in England one clergyman for every 700 souls; but in Wales as there are 988 beneficed clergy and 500 curates, leaving out the clergy unattached, you have one clergyman for every 336 souls. Therefore, there are more than twice as many clergy in Wales in proportion to Church population as in England, and we know that if we take the case of bishops, deans, canons, and chapters, the proportion will be even greater. I think this excess will be admitted undue when it is considered that on all hands it is agreed that the Protestant clergy in Ireland was largely in excess of the requirements of Ireland—[ "No!" ]—well, I certainly have always thought that that was an accepted dictum. We have now the exact Church population of Ireland—namely, 702,000, and the beneficed clergy and curates there number 1,615. Therefore, the case of Ireland is that there is one clergyman to every 434 of the Church population, and so Wales with its one to 336 clearly superabounds in clergy. I should not have brought forward this case of excess if it had been merely to explain why the clergy may be poorly paid out of endowments in the absence of assistance from their wealthy friends; but I bring it forward as it has a close bearing upon the question of the time when this legislation is proposed. The overabounding number of clergymen in proportion to the Church population has this practical effect in Wales under existing conditions—that it renders the Establishment in Wales a distinctly aggressive and propagandist body, and the least you could do would be to leave it alone. What, however, is taking place is this—that immense subsidies are being poured into Wales from the Establishment in England, for the distinct purpose of assisting the English Establishment in Wales, as being the weak point of the Establishment generally—and as being an integral portion of it—and with the view of maintaining the solidarity of the Establishment. That, I maintain, is a state of things which is not in the interest of religion. It is not at all a question of piety or anything else, but simply of defence of the principle of Establishment. Wales is being made to suffer in the interests of a powerful body comparatively outside, and with which Wales has no real or heartfelt concern—namely, the English Establishment. I know it is said that the Church in Wales is making progress. Well, if new churches, new benefices, and incumbents, are regarded as progress, without reference to whether congregations exist for them or not, no doubt that position might be sustained. We, who are making our voices heard in Parliament and elsewhere against the existing state of things, are told that we are simply expressing our alarm at the progress the Church is making in Wales; but we are not to be deterred by such accusations from setting forth the true facts of the case. By a majority of more than five-sixths of the Welsh Representatives, we declare to you that you are simply doing mischief in the Principality, aggravating the situation, and making a final solution not only more difficult in itself, but more mischievous in its eventual effect on the Establishment. I think the situation in Wales may be summed up in the words of the right hon. Gentleman the senior Member for Birmingham, whom the whole House now agrees in reverencing.

Mr. Stuart Rendel

Mr. Bright said of the Establishment in Wales that it was Establishment that killed the Church. I believe that all Welsh Representatives will agree in telling the House that if it wants to revive the Church in Wales, the only way to do it is for the Church to kill the Establishment. In Wales there is no ill-will to the Church as a Church, but there is a most deeply-rooted determination to get rid of the Establishment. As to the attempt to revive it by doing what the Ecclesiastical Commissioners are doing — namely, by importing £45,000 a year of English tithes into Wales for the purpose of bolstering it up, I say that is a thing which the farming classes, whether in England or in Wales, will not long continue to endure. The position of the new missionary clergyman of the Established Church in Wales is too often a curse to himself and mischievous to the Church and to religion. He is set down in remote recesses of the Welsh hills, without congregation or friends, utterly isolated and unoccupied. He is beyond the reach of episcopal observation and control, and he too often creates scandals, which we do not wish to bring before the House, but which, believe me — and I know that my Colleagues from Wales will confirm me in this — are convincing the immense majority of the people that the state of things existing at present must be put an end to speedily so far as State aid and national resources are concerned in creating and supporting it. With reference to this great question of disestablishment as bearing upon tithes, I do not believe myself that Wales wishes to proceed to disestablishment by way of disendowment. I believe that Wales wishes to proceed to disendowment by way of disestablishment. We want fairly to bring before the country the propriety of making the Church in Wales voluntary, and of leaving all religions on an equal footing. We do not want to starve the Church out by artificial means, but we feel that if any Administration, particularly the present one, with a majority made up in such a way that it can hardly command the respect of the country, were to smatch a measure of the kind referred to in the Queen's Speech from the House, and endeavour to drive underground the present honest and open and lawful development of opinion in Wales, some great mischief will ensue. What we say is that the Tithe Bill of the Government is an uncalled-for challenge to Wales. It is a challenge to us and a commencement of hostilities if you determine to reinforce the Church, as you believe, by an alteration of the machinery of the law, and we warn you that we believe you are making a great error. I daresay you may not regard our opposition as a very formidable one, and that you may, perhaps, give but little weight to the grounds on which we offer it; nevertheless, I believe that Welsh Members will not be deterred from stating their views plainly on the subject. We say we do not believe it to be to the interests of the Church itself to alter the process by which tithe is recovered; and I venture to give another reason for not doing it, and it is this: at present the mischief of the position of the clergyman in Wales is that he is, more than ever was the case in England, the enforced ally of the landlord. He appears, unhappily, to be in confederacy with the landlord against the mass of the people, and therefore, if you take the course of making the landlord the medium for the payment of the stipend of the clergyman, you will more than ever cement that alliance; you will turn the clergyman into the mere chaplain of the landlord; you will greatly aggravate the mischief which is too rife already in Wales, and will go far to embroil the question of the land with the question of the Establishment. I believe that at present the larger body of landowners in Wales are on good terms with their tenants. The tenants, no doubt, have great grievances, and much might be done by legislation for them; but I believe that on the whole there is a great deal of excellent feeling remaining in Wales between landlord and tenant, for, after, all, the Welsh people have a more natural disposition to hang together in spite of all differences, than prevails in many parts of England itself. But if we throw on the landlord the whole of the odium connected with the support of the clergyman, we shall transform the agitation which is now taking place between the tithe-owner and the tithe-payer to some extent into an agitation between the landlord and the tenant, and it will take the form of an objection to rent. I think, therefore, that the Government would do well to reconsider the necessity and advisability of introducing legislation on the subject of tithes, and, above all, I think they should not introduce it in the form of a challenge to a Welsh party which is bound to make itself heard. Instead of announcing in the Queen's Speech this unhappy question of tithes, the Government would have done better to give Wales that measure of intermediate education which we all on both sides agree in desiring, and which is so ripe for settlement.

*MR. RATHBONE (Carnarvonshire, Arfon): I wish to say a few words on a question which has just been mentioned by the last speaker—namely, that of Intermediate Education. It really is a very strong measure on the part of the Government, after repeated promises to deal with Intermediate Education, to declare to the country that they have not even the intention of considering it this Session. There is no part of the Queen's dominions where a measure as to Intermediate Education is more needed and more desired than in Wales. Young Welshmen are frequently heard to speak of themselves as thirsting for that education. No doubt, to a certain extent, they have a good elementary education, and they have made use of it under difficulties which would have discouraged any nation less devoted to education than themselves. The Welsh colleges have attained a marked success, but there is a great and urgent want for Intermediate Education, for which, as I say, young men in Wales are thirsting—a greater want than is felt either in England or in Scotland. At present the colleges have, to a great extent, to do the work of Intermediate Education, and it is certainly not right that that should be the case. You are bound to qualify young men in a poor country like Wales for finding occupation elsewhere which they cannot find at home, and to fit them to obtain occupation elsewhere. The Welsh quarrymen are one of the most intelligent classes of men it is possible to find anywhere, and they have shown their devotion to education by the immense sacrifices they have made. In one district they raised £1,500 for the colleges, and established scholarships for their children out of their wages, and now, at the present moment, Wales is setting an example to every part of the country by its readiness to avail itself of the opportunities for agricultural training afforded it, and to develop the agriculture of the Principality. Really, is it not a pity to allow a whole generation of young men to grow up without those advantages we have so repeatedly promised them, and which they are so ready to avail themselves of? Fortunately this is not a Party question. You have on both sides of the House promised to bring in these Intermediate Education Bills. You have Conservatives professing to be as ready and anxious to forward this question as the Liberal Party, and surely it is a confession of impotence on the part of the Government and of Parliament to neglect their promises. I put the thing as a practical question. You have two ways of dealing with it even in view of the pressure of business in the House. Why should not the Conservative and Liberal Bills on this subject be sent to a Committee upstairs for consideration? The Government would, of course, have a majority there; but still from such a Committee we might get the best Bill we could hope to gain in a Conservative Parliament, and, although it might not give us all we want, it would be of immense benefit to a generation of young men who are growing up without those advantages which ought to be put within their reach. It would be better still if the Government would bring in such a Bill and send it to a Grand Committee, because the experience we have had of Grand Committees has been most satisfactory. Not only do they get through their business more rapidly than in Committee of the Whole House, but anyone who has sat on a Grand Committee knows that they do their business on any Bill sent to them thoroughly and well. Instead of having a lot of Members running in and out of the House, and not giving attention to the matter in hand, these Committees sit from hour to hour, and the consequence is that the Bills passed by these Committees have been generally accepted by the House, and have been very superior to the common legislation that passes through this House. It does seem to me that if the Conservative Government wish to distinguish themselves as legislators on non-contentious matters, they ought to use this system of Grand Committees, which they have tried and admitted to be beneficial, more than they have yet done. In regard to Scotch, and perhaps, still more, Welsh questions, Bills are promised year after year, and it is a disgrace that such a practice should continue. Send them to the Grand Committees upstairs, and have them thoroughly well considered, and in that way you would get through a great amount of really beneficial legislation, and which would be a credit to us. It is a real discredit to us that one side or the other of the House should year after year promise legislation, and that the country should see us impotent to carry out that which it is our duty to accomplish. I hope the Government will take this question into their consideration, and allow Welsh Members and private Members on both sides of the House to carry out their Bills by means of one of these Grand Committees, and so give that assistance to intermediate education in Wales which is so important to us.

*MR. PRITCHARD-MORGAN (Merthyr Tydvil): We have heard some facts, Sir, with reference to the Principality of Wales, but there is a total absence of any mention of that Principality in the gracious Address from the Throne. Possibly it may be accounted for by the fact that there are so many Members of the House who sit on this side as the Representatives of the most important portions of Wales. Reference is made to our relations with other Powers, but I suggest that our relations with the Colonies are not equally satisfactory. Our relations with the Colonies are to my mind of the most strained character. The action of the Government with reference to the appointment of Mr. Blake, to my mind, showed great weakness. Colonists at the present moment, instead of referring to the "Mother Country," speak of the "Mother-in-law" Country. They simply look upon this country as exercising some little legal supervision without having their real welfare at heart. We have in the Address reference to what has been done for Ireland, and what is going to be done for Scotland, and I think, to say the least of it, that something should be done for that portion of the United Kingdom (Wales), which hitherto has proved itself so loyal, and has not made any complaint whatever. The Irish have properly complained of their treatment at the hands of the Government, and they have received, at any rate, some reparation and consideration. I think the people of Wales should receive some consideration also. The question of equality of religion, of the land laws, and of mining laws, are subjects which materially affect the Principality. I do not wish to speak in respect of any particular matter, but I do say that, inasmuch as, according to Her Majesty's most gracious Speech, we are to have a Board or a Minister for Agriculture, we should have a Minister to look after the mining industries of the country, more especially as those mining industries are retarded, notably in the Principality. The question of royalties is a most grievous one to thousands upon thousands of the people. Various promises have been made by the Government with regard to the subject, but there is not one word about it in the Address, nor do we hear of any proposed legislation upon royalties. So far as the Principality is concerned, endeavours to confer benefit on the general community are retarded by the present Government in every possible and conceivable way. We have carried on our industries there up to the present moment without even police protection. We have to pay for our own police, and we have to pay for our own postal communications. And although I know that offers were made to the Post Office for the payment of £90 a-year under contract to establish a postal communication for the industry to which I refer, yet no consideration has been given to it. I do not think that is the way to encourage industries, more especially when the Government at the same time insists upon their running all the risk, and upon the payment for police protection and postal communication out of the pockets of private individuals. If people are prepared to expend money in the employment of labour, I should think they ought to be encouraged in every possible and conceivable way. Whether they obtain any return for this outlay is a matter for themselves, and not for anyone else; but at any rate the country would necessarily derive benefit from the employment of labour, and by the consequent prevention of poverty and distress, especially in the Principality of Wales.

*MR. BOWEN ROWLANDS (Cardiganshire): If the omission of all mention of Wales from the gracious Speech from the Throne were the result of the unusual pressure of public business on the attention of the Government, or were there any explanation at all which could justify it, I should have been well content to have been silent. But, from what I have observed of the conduct of the Government and their supporters on Welsh questions, I fear it is only another attempt on their part to carry out the policy of ignoring Welsh nationality, and of denying the reality of Welsh grievances. In two Sessions, when application was made to them to set apart an evening for the discussion of the Motion of the hon. Member for Swansea, in respect of a question of such absorbing interest to the Welsh people as the Disestablishment of the Welsh Church, they declined on each occasion, and I fear our endeavour on the present occasion will be equally ineffective as previous protests. What we must thoroughly impress upon the Government is that they cannot ignore the existence of a reality by simply closing their eyes or averting their gaze. Yet that is the attitude they seem to have adopted in reference to any attempt to discuss the grievances of Wales. On one occasion, when we succeeded in getting a small discussion on Welsh affairs, by far the greater number of hon. Members opposite left the House. I have myself observed their conduct on more than one occasion, and I took the opportunity to remark that such indifference was not likely to lead to a belief in the House, as the central body, being better qualified to understand the legislative wants of the various portions of the United Kingdom than those particular portions of the Kingdom themselves. I earnestly hope that no Government, be it Liberal or Conservative, will continue to turn from Welsh questions without them giving a hearing. The Wales of the imagination of the Government and of the great bulk of their supporters is entirely different from the Wales known to those who are best acquainted with the Principality. Now, the Under Secretary for India, in his speech, made the observation that that part of the country was particularly happy which received no mention in the Queen's Speech.

*SIR JOHN GORST: I said that province of the Empire which did not require to be mentioned in Her Majesty's Speech.

*MR. BOWEN ROWLANDS: That is simply to substitute the devoted term Empire for country; but I accept the correction, though it does not seem to me to alter the extraordinary statement that that portion of the Empire may be considered peculiarly fortunate of which no mention is made in the Speech from the Throne. I venture to think that an altogether inaccurate statement. It might be true of a country which had not been under discussion, where troubles had not arisen, and where opposing interests had not come into collision; but it is monstrous to imply the prosperity of a country where all these conditions exist because it is omitted from the Queen's Speech. The picture of Wales which Her Majesty's Government and its supporters desire to create is one which does not represent the real lineaments and features of that country. Their action may be likened to that of the father of the Great Frederick of Prussia, who painted pictures of his tall soldiers, and who, when the pictures were not like the soldiers, painted the soldiers to be like the pictures. The conduct of the Government with regard to Wales is very much like that. They paint for us a picture of that Principality, and offer us a representation created out of their own imagination, but which is in reality no likeness at all. I do not propose to go into the question of tithes, nor the other question of education; but I cannot help saying I find no justification whatever for the omission of Wales from the Queen's Speech. We find Scotland there and Ireland too, and although the grievances of Ireland have reached a more acute stage than those of Wales, I do not believe that because the area is larger they are any more real than those experienced by the Welsh population. I would say to Her Majesty's Government—"If you wish to prevent the grievances of Wales from assuming the dangerous proportions presented by those from which the people of other parts of the Kingdom are suffering, you will deal with them promptly and endeavour to remedy them by removing the causes." I hope this will prove the last occasion on which Wales will be omitted from the Queen's Speech in this way. I also trust it will not be said that this omission is an indication of the prosperity and happiness of the Welsh people, nor of the desire of the Government to do them justice. I hope, moreover, Her Majesty's Government will desist from legislating in the only direction in regard to Wales in which it is intended to proceed—I allude to the dangerous legislation which is threatened with regard to tithes; but that they will address themselves to the removal of those grievances under which the Welsh people have so long laboured and which they have so patiently borne.

LORD HENRY BRUCE (Wiltshire, Chippenham): I trust that in the course of the present Session something may be done to remedy the system under which, in this House, the rights of private Members are totally ignored, so that nothing in the shape of an unofficial programme has even the ghost of a chance of being passed, while all Bills brought forward by private individuals are almost invariably snuffed out by the blocking arrangement. Turning to another matter, I would point out that we are asked in the Queen's Speech to vote a large sum of money "for the safety of our shores and our commerce;" but I do not see how it is possible for us to be in a position to do this until justice is done to our population. It is impossible to close our eyes to the social condition of this country when we know that it contains nearly a million of paupers. This evil is largely produced by the immigration of foreign paupers; and among the evils which result from the increased number of persons thus thrown into the labour market, I may mention what is called the "sweating system," under which, owing to the congested state of the labour market, the working population are compelled to accept starvation wages, and in some cases have to work six-and-thirty hours out of the forty-eight in the struggle for an existence, which is merely one of physical emaciation. Under the Act passed last year, the County Councils, thereby created, are enabled to appropriate certain sums for the purpose of emigrating our own people, whom we can least spare—while, on the other hand, we are receiving the surplus paupers of other countries. The question is, why do not we put a stop to this sort of immigration as other nations do? The authorities of France, Germany, and other Continental countries send our paupers back again, and I do not see what harm there could be in our taking a similar course with the paupers sent here from abroad; because charity begins at home, and our neighbours cannot object to our doing as they do. I cannot help thinking there is a great deal of cant in the way in which some questions are dealt with, as compared with the treatment bestowed on others. We tolerate all the evils that are inflicted on our own population by impure literature, which is flooding the country, and at the same time work ourselves into a state of great excitement over the poor children who, by being employed in the theatrical pantomimes, assist in the necessary work of maintaining the families to which they belong. This reminds me of what was said by Dr. Johnson in The Rambler. Speaking of cant, he said he was reminded very much of the gentleman who on coming down to breakfast, and reading in the papers that half Asia Minor had been submerged, became quite broken-hearted, but who when, a couple of minutes afterwards, he found his eggs were hard boiled, flew into a towering passion. With regard to another matter, namely, the question of over-crowding, it should be remembered that this is not always the result of over-population or improvident marriages, but frequently arises from the fact that our workmen like to reside as near as possible to the work they have to do. If a workman cannot live near his family he is not only isolated, but is put to the expense of maintaining two homes, which cannot be at all satisfactory. The working classes in the Metropolis have a right to complain that they have been duped in regard to the promises held out to them of better dwellings, which were to occupy the prison sites, and which Lord Cross referred to as a "windfall" and a "Godsend." The Bill of 1885, which was brought forward to fulfil the expectancies of the working class, was killed by vested interests. The present Secretary for Ireland, when President of the Local Government Board, said, in speaking of the Bill, "London was the place where most injury had been done to the working classes by displacements, carried out under the Acts of Parliament, and London was also the one town in the United Kingdom where the greatest injury had been done to the working classes by compelling them to migrate. There was, therefore, nothing unfair in undoing the wrong Parliament had itself inflicted." The late Emperor Frederick, when upon his death-bed, said, "Learn to suffer without complaining;" and I say that the working classes have done this. But what does Archdeacon Farrar say upon this subject? He says: "Owing, either to inefficient powers, or the neglect of the appointed authorities, or to the absence of proper superintendence, I have found myself defeated year by year in the effort to force the landlords of foul and rotting tenements to do their duty. I shall rejoice if the County Council rides roughshod over the greed and villany of men who care only to get money out of the abodes of misery and vice. The only way in which it is possible to save the inhabitants of certain slums and rookeries is to break up the degrading localities in which they herd together, and which become mere hotbeds of disease and vice. In better houses, less removed from the eye of the law, they will live healthier and more human lives." And, again, Cardinal Manning writes: "I have no subject more at heart than the intolerable condition of our people crowded in rooms unfit for human habitation. The subject is above and distinct from all politics, and the obligation to promote it lies on both Parties in the State. Since the Royal Commission reported, years have passed and little has been done. I hope this new impulse will give effect to its recommendations and reach beyond them." It should not be forgotten that the East End contributes its quota towards the coal dues, and therefore is entitled to consideration in regard to public works, to a large extent carried out by means of the money it has advanced. I appeal to this House to do what it can in this, the fourth Session of the present Parliament, not to allow Party politics to prejudice the settlement of this question, and, furthermore, to do its utmost to benefit those who are poorer than ourselves.

IMPRISONMENT OF A MEMBER OF THE HOUSE.—QUESTIONS.

MR. C. S. PARNELL (Cork): I wish, Sir, to interpose for a few minutes in this debate to bring a matter of very considerable and pressing importance under the attention of the head of the Government. I regret that the Chief Secretary is not in his place. I do not attach any blame to the right hon. Gentleman, and I regret I have not been able to give him sufficient notice to enable him to be in his place; but this is a matter which will not brook delay, and I therefore feel myself bound to proceed with it in his absence in the hope that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer will take such notice of the matter as will remove the trouble. I have just received, Sir, a telegram—or rather one of my hon. Friends has just received a telegram from the Mayor of Kilkenny in the following terms:—"After Mr. Carew's arrival at Kilkenny Prison last night he was forcibly deprived of his clothes, even of his flannel shirt. His hair and moustache were cut off. He is all day lying on a plank bed. He refuses to wear the prison garments." I have also received a telegram from the Lord Mayor of Dublin to the same effect. Now, Sir, opinions may differ, and rightly differ, as to the course pursued by some Members of this House, and others who have decided to resist the wearing of prison clothes as a question of principle; but you are face to face with the fact that they have refused; and it comes to this—do the Irish Executive intend to enforce this rule at the risk of the health, and possibly of the lives, of the prisoners in gaol? This question of clothes is an old question in the treatment of Irish political prisoners, and I would refer the House to the treatment of the treason-felony prisoners in 1865, and following years, which was inquired into by the Devon Commission of 1871. The clothes of those prisoners were taken from them in the depth of winter, and they were even deprived of their flannels. Some of them contracted maladies which subsequently brought them to their graves. This is the paragraph in which the Devon Commission refer to the matter (Vol. 53, page 12). "We are of opinion that as they (the prisoners) arrived at the prison in mid winter, and as some of them appear to have been men of delicate constitution, and one was deformed and of weakly frame, flannels should have been given to them without waiting for the intervention of the medical officer." Well, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman has explained on a former occasion that if any prisoner who is able to plead a weak heart or delicate lungs refuses to attire himself in the prescribed dress, force will not be applied to him. But the right hon. Gentleman knows very well that he has put it out of the power of any prisoner to plead a weak heart or delicate lungs, however weak his heart or delicate his lungs may be; and I say it is for the right hon. Gentleman, when he is dealing with such notorious facts as I have brought before him, to take his precautions and to give his orders before, so that he may be sure that what is practically murder may not take place. The public opinion of this country was horrified by the accounts of the scenes which took place in the prison where Mr. W. O'Brien was recently confined. Mr. O'Brien had the good fortune to be a man in a prominent position, and he was not permitted to suffer beyond a limited space, and the right hon. Gentleman was compelled to intervene in behalf of that distinguished prisoner. But what is to become of the obscurer men? Are they to be left naked for days and weeks in the winter, deprived of the flannels that they are accustomed to wear? The right hon. Gentleman said he was going to draw no distinction between one prisoner and another, but a distinction has been drawn in Mr. Carew's case. Mr. Carew is not a prominent Member of this House; he has not spoken often, and, I suppose, the prison officials therefore think it safe to make this attack on him. As it is, great mischief may have been done in his case. Even now Mr. Carew may be lying in his cell without, perhaps, even bedclothes to cover him. We do not know what the history of Mr. Carew has been since these telegrams were despatched. I have brought forward this matter, and I ask the right hon. Gentleman to consider how far he is going to press this rigid adherence to red tape in prison rules. Is he going to insist that Mr. Carew shall remain in his present position? Is the right hon. Gentleman going to leave Mr. Carew stripped, without even his flannel shirt? If he determines to go on with his policy—I do not wish to use hasty words, I do not wish to use passionate words, words any of us may hereafter regret, but with this warning before him, and with the knowledge of what happened in the case of Mr. Mandeville, and what may happen in other cases, if he persists in this course of rigid adherence to the law which he himself has been mainly instrumental in passing, and under which no distinction is made in the treatment of political prisoners and the treatment of ordinary prisoners—all I can say is that I believe that the judgment of this country hereafter will not hold the right hon. Gentleman guiltless of the consequences that may result.

*THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I have only been in this building for about three minutes, and was not fortunate enough to arrive in time to hear the opening words of the hon. Gentleman's speech; but I understand that he had read to the House a telegram from the Mayor of Kilkenny to the effect that the Member for North Kildare had arrived in Kilkenny prison last night, had been forcibly deprived of his clothes and flannel shirt, and had been lying all the day long on a plank bed, refusing to wear the prison garb. No, Sir, I have no knowledge of the facts enumerated in this telegram. I have received other telegrams from other Mayors which in no sense were accurate, and it is extremely possible that this telegram from this Mayor might be as inaccurate as the telegrams of other Mayors have been. But on the broad question, if the hon. Gentleman asks me, I can return him a perfectly distinct, clear, and explicit reply. Every man, so far as I am concerned, imprisoned in Ireland under the law obtaining in Ireland should be treated as an ordinary prisoner. The rules regulating the treatment of ordinary prisoners are well known, and are to be found by any gentleman who searches for them. Any relaxation of these rules must be made, in my opinion, upon the authority of the Medical Officer of the prison. The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down says, in his opinion, that the Member for North Kildare is likely to suffer in health for a misfortune which at this moment he is bringing upon himself by refusing to put on prison clothes, which are provided for him according to the prison rules. To say that a man is kept naked in his cell because, being provided with adequate clothing, he refused to put it on, is a gross misuse of the English language. Such a man ought not to be described as a man deprived of his clothing. He is a man who deprives himself of his clothing, and it is as a man who deprives himself of his clothing that he ought to be judged. If, however, this peculiar mania reaches a point which injures his health, it is the business of the prison doctor to make such relaxations in the rules as he may think will adequately preserve the health of the prisoner. Any recommendation of the doctor of that kind is, of course, instantly attended to, and I have not the slightest doubt that in the case of the Member for North Kildare, like every other prisoner, be he Member of Parliament or not Member of Parliament, committed under this Act or that Act—I have not the slightest doubt that the doctor of the prison at Kilkenny will do his duty by Mr. Carew, and if his health be suffering that he will take such steps as are necessary to preserve it. The hon. Gentleman says that a phrase in a letter which I wrote about 14 months ago, on the subject of the first imprisonment of the Member for North-East Cork, was couched in such terms that no prisoner under the Crimes Act could again plead ill-health or any bodily defect as a ground for receiving special relaxations of the rules. The House and the hon. Member and the hon. Gentlemen who sit beside him will perhaps be surprised to learn that at this moment I have obtained statistics of the relaxations given in Irish prisons to all classes of prisoners, and I find that the relaxations of prison rules given under medical authority to Crimes Act prisoners are enormously in excess of the relaxations of the rules given to any other class of prisoners. In fact, the doctors of the Irish prisons have given more relaxations of prison discipline to prisoners under the Crimes Act than to any other class of prisoners. Now there are only three conclusions to be drawn from that fact, and you must choose one of the three. Either the prison doctors in Ireland have been intimidated—

MR. J. G. S. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): By whom?

MR. BALFOUR: By methods perfectly familiar to hon. Gentlemen opposite and their Friends—that is a question on which I shall have more to say on another occasion—or else Crimes Act prisoners are in the habit of malingering, or else there is some connection between physical weakness and Irish Nationalism. I will defy human ingenuity to come to any further alternative. The proportion of medical relaxation in the case of Crimes Act prisoners is enormously in excess, and has been for the last 12 months, of the relaxation given in the case of other prisoners, and what bearing has that upon the statement of the hon. Gentleman? So far from the prisoners under the Act feeling themselves prevented from taking any advantage of the relaxation of the prison rules on account of ill-health, they have taken more advantage of them than any other class of prisoners. So much for the contention of the hon. Member. The hon. Member has stated that the country has been horrified at the accounts given of the sufferings of the hon. Member for East Cork in prison. It is possible that some persons in the country have been horrified at some accounts which have been given of them, but unfortunately all those accounts have not only been inaccurate, but they have been grossly and scandalously mendacious. The sufferings on which hon. Gentlemen have dilated have been purely and absolutely imaginary. There have been sufferings of many persons in Ireland which might, indeed, have horrified the country, but I will undertake to say that anyone really acquainted with what went on in Clonmel Gaol in connection with the hon. Member for North-East Cork would be absolutely incapable of being horrified even in the smallest degree; and probably if he took into account the whole circumstances of the case—second-class carriage and all the rest of it—he would probably consider many of the incidents more calculated to excite smiles than tears. But in any case I can assure the House and the country that the medical precautions taken in Ireland at this moment exceed, I believe, the medical precautions taken either in Ireland, England, or Scotland at any period with regard to any class of prisoners whatever. I do not, of course, pretend that there is anything in an Irish prison which secures immunity from disease, but I do assert positively that if medical care can prevent any prisoner from suffering from his imprisonment, those medical precautions are now taken in Ireland. But I distinctly repeat the principle I have before laid down, that I will not, so long as I am Irish Secretary, admit that any man has earned special privileges in an Irish prison because he has been engaged in what I think the shocking crimes for which Members of this House and others have been imprisoned under the Crimes Act. I do not suppose the House will expect me to follow the example of the hon. Member for Cork, and unnecessarily to violate the understanding which was come to, that the question of Ireland should be reserved for the debate next week; but, however that may be, if it is any consolation to the hon. Gentleman, I absolutely adhere to the principle I have laid down. So far as I can, so far as I have any influence in the matter, and so long as I can have control over the question, I will not draw a distinction in practice which I believe has no justification, either in law or in morality, between a man who shoots a land-grabber or the man who engages in a conspiracy to make the life of a man who takes an evicted farm absolutely miserable to himself, or, on the other hand, the man who deliberately makes speeches having distinct reference to taking an evicted farm in the neighbourhood where he speaks. Such a man is, in my opinion, as responsible for all the crimes that are committed in connection with the agrarian agitation in Ireland as the man who held the pistol which he put to the head of his victim and with which he shoots him.

*SIR GEORGE TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): I will, I hope, in the few words I have to say, follow the example of the hon. Member for Cork, and I certainly shall not follow any other example, and attempt to indulge in sarcasm. I should like first to take up an observation which the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland made at the close of his speech, and I take it up as a Member of Parliament speaking for Members of Parliament. The right hon. Gentleman said in substance that the man who shot a land-grabber or who boycotted a land-grabber out of his happiness and enjoyment of life is not worse than the man who deliberately makes speeches inciting to those crimes. Whose case are we now considering? Who is the Member of Parliament at this moment who is suffering the very heaviest sentence of any Member of Parliament? It is an hon. Member who has been condemned to six months' hard labour. Has he delivered any speeches inciting to crime? What was his crime as placed before the Court? He was charged—I am speaking of Mr. Edward Harrington—practically on two counts, one of having made a speech inciting persons to join the Plan of Campaign; the other count was that he made this speech to a proclaimed branch of the National League, and having so made it published it in his own newspaper. The Court—two Resident Magistrates—took evidence as to whether he had incited to the Plan of Campaign, and they acquitted him. A brother Member of our House is at this moment in prison for six months, with hard labour, not for having incited to crime, but because, under a recent Act, a new crime was invented which had never been on the Statute Book before—the crime of taking part in the proceedings of an illegal association, which illegal association was so defined as to include the National League. The right hon. Gentleman endeavours to excuse the policy which I will now proceed to condemn on general grounds, by trying to make out that he is acting up to the theory of the old fable, and punishing the trumpeter who is inciting men to deeds of blood. What is the case brought forward by the hon. Member for Cork? A young Member of Parliament, a man most courteous, who belongs to the best style of the young Member of Parliament, arrested in the house of a candidate at a by-election, a man who, three days ago, was one of us, respected by all of us, has now been subjected to indignities which I shall not comment upon out of respect for the credit of the House of Commons, because I am certain that if I did name them they would raise a laugh in certain quarters. The right hon. Gentleman thinks this is right ; we think it is wrong. Now, I will take the two arguments that were put forward by the right hon. Gentleman in defence of this proceeding. In the first place, the right hon. Gentleman appears to conceive that it is not in his power to interfere.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, I do not.

*SIR GEORGE TREVELYAN: Then the right hon. Gentleman has altered his mind.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I never touched upon my relations to the Prison Board at all: I never said anything at all about my powers.

*SIR GEORGE TREVELYAN: At any rate, the right hon. Gentleman spoke in a manner that implied that to take any special course of action with regard to men on account of their position, or on account of the nature of their crime, would be an extreme stretch of his authority, the same right hon. Gentleman, with no more reason, has exerted that authority—and I am glad of it—in the case of priests. But the principal argument of the right hon. Gentleman was one which I am very glad to meet on the floor of the House of Commons. It is that we on this side of the House—and I am inclined to think a good many people who do not support us in the country are beginning to feel the same thing—that we on this side of the House are respecters of persons, that we have a great feeling for the educated, the powerful man of official and Parliamentary position, and that we draw a distinction between those men and the great run of persons. This is an attempt to give to an odious tyranny a sort of veneering of popular and Radical sentiment which the great mass of the people are beginning to see through. Our objection is not so much to the punishment of Members of Parliament as Members of Parliament, but because all the Members of Parliament, speaking broadly, who have been sent to gaol under this Act have been sent to gaol for offences which in their nature ought not to be punished by these indignities. We say that about Members of Parliament, and we say it about people who are not Members of Parliament. There was a time in the history of Ireland when serious crime was very rife, and when the Government honestly believed—[Ministerial ironical cheers]—you have not heard yet what I am going to say—and when the Government honestly believed that everybody whom they were punishing were being punished for actual crime. There were certain exceptions, and when those exceptions were brought to the notice of the Government, the Government altered their treatment. The hon. and learned Member for Longford (Mr. T. Healy); speaking below the Gangway last Session, put the case in a nutshell. He said, “Under Lord Spencer one Member of Parliament was sent to prison, and that was myself, and I was sent to prison as a first-class misdemeanant.” I do not know how many Members of Parliament have been sent to prison lately—I suppose that four or five and twenty have been there or are on their way there. [Irish MEMBERS: Twenty-six.] Well, our reason for resenting the manner in which our Colleagues have been punished with indignity for offences for which, if they are offences, the proper punishment is detention without indignity, is summed up in a sentence—I do not know whether I can quote it exactly—which was spoken about the autocratic Government of Lord Eldon and Mr. Pitt at the beginning of this or at the end of the last century. It was: “The gauge of the severity of an arbitrary Government is the amount of humiliation and severity which it inflicts on men of education.” And why? Because men of education are specially formidable, and if great indignities and severities are inflicted upon men of education, men whose names come before the world, who have powerful friends, one may have some conception of the indignities and the cruelties which are being inflicted on the humble and the poor. I very well remember the story of two days in Ireland. Ten or 12 men were taken off at once in a batch and sent to prison for long terms of hard labour for being concerned in a sort of popular expression of disapprobation when Mr. Blunt was taken to prison. On the next day I think as many as 12 men were sent to prison for an average of about a month apiece, for showing anger and emotion on account of their parish priest being arrested and sent to prison. On the same day 24 publicans were charged with having refused to sell drink to policemen who went about to catch the men, and out of the 24, 11 or 14 were sent to prison. There are two days' work in Ireland. These droves of Hottentots went off to prison, every one of them having an Irishman's sensitiveness, an Irishman's patriotism, an Irishman's native delicacy of feeling. We knew nothing of the treatment of these men, who belong to the common people. It is only in such cases as that of Mr. Edward Harrington, and this young man, who was a friend of many of us, and is our friend still, and will be our friend when he is once again among us, that we know anything. All these men, poor and rich, are punished in the manner I have described for faults which partook of the political sufficiently to make a wise Government draw a distinction between them and gaol birds. Does the right hon. Gentleman himself believe [that the punishment of hard labour, with all these indignities, is the same when inflicted upon a man like the Member for North-East Cork (Mr. W. O'Brien), an extremely over-worked literary man, or on such a man as the hon. Gentleman whose case we are now discussing, as it is when inflicted upon a real, genuine, hardened, professional criminal? It is not the same to them, it is not the same to a respectable farmer or labourer, who would never have got into prison if he were not a politician. This is, after all, what the Liberal Party have been accustomed to say about other nations. As far as we have ourselves erred against the principle in the past, we were in the wrong, and ought to admit it now. We do admit it, and we admit that a clearer case than that of this young Member of Parliament has never occurred. When the Government with which I was connected was in office, whenever a case of the kind was brought to our notice, and as soon as it was brought to our notice, the treatment was altered. It was not only in the case of Mr. T. Harrington but in others also that the treatment was altered. This case having been brought to the notice of the House of Commons, we ought as clearly as possible to express our opinion that a great mistake has been made in the Government of Ireland, and that that mistake is only increased by the matter which so deeply concerns the feelings of Irishmen being treated with something very like levity.

Sir George Trevelyan

MR. W. A. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): I should not have intervened in this debate if it had not been owing to the exceptional circumstance that only a few days ago I had the distinguished honour of accompanying the latest criminal of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary on his passage from the north to the south of Scotland, and I had the opportunity of witnessing the manner in which the hon. Member, who is now in prison, was treated, and of comparing it in my own mind with the reception which would have been given to the right hon. Gentleman if he had been in the same place. Four Members of Parliament and the Chief Constable of Perthshire, who, I may remark, was taken away from his daily duties and put on a wholly unnecessary mission, occupied one carriage, the Irish sergeant who had effected the arrest having the delicacy or good taste to occupy another compartment, leaving us entirely alone. The news of the arrest was flashed by telegraph along the route we took, and at every station through which we passed crowds of people assembled. My hon. Friend, who is now in prison, was received at every place with loud cheers. Why, if the right hon. Gentleman had been there he would have been hooted out of the stations. As a Scotchman, I felt humiliated. I remembered that Scotland was once an independent nation, once proud of its national honour, and I felt humiliated that Scotchmen should have a political refugee, so to speak, dragged from their midst by the right hon. Gentleman's minions. Moreover, I could not help feeling a deep sense of shame that there could be found in Scotland any Justice of the Peace who could so forget the national dignity and national honour as to countersign a lettre de cachet of the Chief Secretary's. I am happy to think, however, that the man who countersigned the document, if I may judge by his name, for he is known by the name of Isles, is not a Scotchman. I hope he is not, and I hope there is no Scotchman who would so demean himself as to be guilty of abandoning any person enjoying our hospitality to the tender mercies, or rather cruelties, of the right hon. Gentleman. I cannot help contrasting what is going on in the prison in Ireland with the manner in which the hon. Member was received and treated by the Scotch people, and I say that the conduct of the right hon. Gentleman in trampling upon the national self-respect is outraging the sense of the people of Scotland. If the right hon. Gentleman is determined to enjoy a cynical brutality and cruelty, let him confine himself to Ireland: let him not pollute a country which was honoured by the citizenship of John Knox, and which has hitherto been the habitation of a free and independent people.

MR. HALLEY STEWART (Spalding) moved the adjournment of the debate.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON (Cockermouth) gave notice that as the Amendment of which he had given notice could not be moved before the Amendment standing in the name of the right hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Morley), he would move it at a later stage of the Address.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. Halley Stewart,) put,—and agreed to.

Debate further adjourned till Monday next.

HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES.

No. 3.] FIRST VOLUME OF SESSION 1889. [MARCH 5.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, 25th February, 1889.

QUEEN'S SPEECH—HER MAJESTY'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS.

THE LORD STEWARD OF THE HOUSEHOLD (The Earl of Mount-Edgumbe) reported Her Majesty's answer to the Address, as follows:—

“My Lords,

“I thank you sincerely for your loyal and dutiful Address. I received with great satisfaction your assurances that you will bestow your careful consideration on the measures that may be submitted to you, and I trust that such measures may be settled in such a manner as may best conduce to the interests of all my faithful subjects.”

THE DUBLIN BARRACKS. QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

*THE EARL OF BELMORE, in rising to ask the Under Secretary of State for War what steps it is intended to take to improve the sanitary condition of the Barracks of the Dublin garrison, said: My Lords, this question relates to a matter which is admitted to be of very great importance, and even if there were any doubt upon it, I think the fact that Mr. Stanhope has within the last few weeks thought it his duty to go to Dublin and make a careful inspection of the Barracks would show the importance of this matter. My Lords, although I have put the question in general terms with regard to all the Barracks in Dublin, yet the particular Barracks in which most of these cases of enteric fever have occurred are what are known as the Royal Barracks, the large Barracks near Phoenix Park and very near the river. The River Liffey, although it has been long embanked, at one time was not embanked. It was a tidal river with apparently a considerable amount of shore, and in old times the shore was in a very unsatisfactory and unsanitary condition, as may be found by a Resolution of the Irish House of Commons as far back as the reign of King Charles the 2nd, relating to the unsanitary state of Dublin and the shores of the Liffey. The result of this river (being a tidal river) having been unembanked, was that there was a beach upon both sides of the river. That has now been reclaimed, and it is upon that land that the buildings and streets on both sides now stand. It appears from the Report which my noble Friend near me (Earl Beauchamp) moved for last year that a considerable part of the Royal Barracks are built upon what was originally the shore of the river. My Lords, upon looking over the Report which my noble Friend obtained, I find a very concise and, at the same time, a short account of the Barracks and of what the Commissioners, Sir Charles Cameron and Dr. Grimeshaw, did in the way of finding out what was the cause of the enteric fever which had so long prevailed at the Barracks. Before going into that I may say that on comparing the figures I find that between the year 1879 and the year before last (the year down to which the Report goes) there were no less than 65 cases of enteric fever, and of those 65 cases no fewer than 59 arose in the Royal Barracks. Some of those cases were fatal, although, in the majority of them, those who suffered appear to have recovered. Those 59 cases included

Royal Square will be used for stores, instead of for troops, as it is now. The demolitions in the passages between the Green Squares have been carried out, as recommended by the Cameron-Grimshaw Report, and, in addition, the south ends of both passages which were not recommended in the Report; so that there will be now a perfectly free current of air through the passages between the three barracks. At present it is not intended to carry out the demolition in Cavalry Square and in Stable Square; the access of air which is obtained by the demolition of the south end of the passages is considered sufficient in that case. With regard to the work that has to be done in the current year, a sum of £10,000 has been taken for demolitions, re-appropriations, and sanitary improvements at the Royal Barracks, and also a sum of about £1,200 for sanitary services at other barracks in Dublin. With regard to the Richmond Barracks, upon which there is also a Report from Mr. Rogers-Field, £400 is provided for carrying out the subsoil drainage, in addition to the work that has been carried on in the past year, upon which some £700 has been expended. I believe Mr. Stanhope has also in consideration the question of demolition both at Linen Hall and at Ship Street, which he examined himself personally, and about which he thought there were unsanitary conditions which might be improved; but I believe that arrangements upon that particular point have not yet been completed. I may venture to say, with regard to enteric cases from the Dublin garrison, there has been a marked improvement in the last month. I am certainly justified in saying that there has been no case of enteric fever at the Barracks in the last fortnight; and I believe I am justified in saying that there has been no case of enteric fever at the Barracks in the last month.

FACTORY LEGISLATION IN INDIA.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY, in rising to ask the Secretary of State for India whether his statement at Oldham on January 25th, that a Factory Act would soon be introduced in India, was correctly reported, said: My Lords, on the 5th of November last the Manchester

Chamber of Commerce passed a resolution by a majority of 10—38 to 28—recommending that the British Factory Acts, so far as they related to women and children, should be extended to British India. The seconder of this resolution, Mr. Stuttard, said, in a letter to the Manchester Courier—

“Surely it will be better for the physical welfare of the Hindoo to remain in agricultural employment and give us plenty of cotton, rather than be attracted to the ranks of mill operatives.”

The members of the Chamber of Commerce who had had Indian experience opposed the resolution, while those who supported it showed that they knew little of the conditions under which the Bombay mills are worked. Although that resolution was proposed on the grounds of humanity to the Bombay operatives, it is only doing justice to Manchester men and to the Manchester Press to say that the mask of humanity was soon dropped, and the motive of a wish to check rival competition put forward. If, however, the Indian Government concede the Manchester request for the introduction of the British Factory Acts into India, it will lay itself open to the charge of hypocrisy for taking thought of humanity at Bombay, whence no complaints have arisen, while neglecting the calls of humanity in the Assam tea-plantations, and not interfering to prevent the great mortality of the Bengal coolies on their journey to Assam, nor taking care that the coolie hospitals in Assam should be efficient, and neglecting a duty which the Colonial Office performed for the Indian emigrants to the West India Islands and to British Guiana. The vote of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce was met at Bombay on the 19th of December by a meeting of the Millowners' Association. It was stated at that meeting that while in Lancashire 65 per cent. of the hands were women, the work done by those women was done in Bombay by adult men. The Bombay operatives had two days in the week, and holidays of from one to six months every one or two years to go home to their villages. The women stayed away from the mill for four or five days every month, putting substitutes in their places. The hands left their work four or five times a-day from 10 to 15 minutes, besides half an hour for dinner. It was also shown that to do the same amount of work three and a third more hands were employed in Bombay than in Lancashire; and as no gas was used in the Bombay mills the hours of labour were restricted to daylight. The longest days were of 13 hours 13 minutes, and the shortest of 11 hours. The Times of India of November 30, 1888, writing on that subject, said—

“We have a limitation already of the hours of female and child labour, and, as Mr. Bythell pointed out, ‘there are four times as many persons in an Indian mill to turn out the same quantity of work as was turned out in a Lancashire mill.’ The hours are long here, no doubt; but the natives of this country love to dawdle over their work. The old Bombay members of the Manchester Chamber understood the position exactly; and though they, too, are interested in the supremacy of Manchester, they were too honest to conceal the truth. We have to thank this honest minority for so clearly exposing the motive behind this ingenuous attempt to ‘lift the poor people of India.’”

I may remind your Lordships that the Times of India is not a journal representing the natives of India, but it is a newspaper which attends chiefly to the views of the Anglo-Indian community in that country. Now, my Lords, I would point out to you the inconsistency of a Chamber of Commerce which professes free-trade opinions asking for protection for one British industry alone while all are suffering, and that not against the foreigner, but against our Indian fellow-subjects. What is to be thought of the inconsistency of the noble Viscount for encouraging such hopes, if he did encourage them, while it is notorious that Members of the Conservative Party, desirous of standing well with their Leaders, are compelled to make their private opinions as to unrestricted imports subservient to Party purposes? Is the noble Viscount prepared on all occasions to support the resolutions passed by the Manchester Chamber of Commerce? Is he aware that last November that Chamber passed a fair-trade resolution by a majority of 73 to 13, and though at a poll of the members, suggested by a portion of the directors, that vote was, naturally enough under all the circumstances, reversed, no fewer than 383 out of 1,004 circulars were not replied to. It is therefore certain that these 383 were not very zealous free-traders, and the two parties may be equally balanced in that Chamber of Commerce. There is another reason why the noble Viscount should not have shown at Oldham any sympathy for the Manchester vote for a British Factory Act in India; that is, that his doing so was in disaccord with the first speech delivered by Lord Lansdowne after he landed in India, in which he said that he would do his utmost to encourage native industries that came in aid of agriculture, which could not provide sufficient employment for the people of India. What reason was there for informing the people of Oldham of the Secretary of State's thoughts and intentions. Was it done to catch votes? Was it an electioneering speech? Will the noble Viscount say “No,” but that he spoke as a Lancashire man, finding himself in his own county and among friends? In that case the noble Viscount should remember that when he became Secretary of State for India he became the guardian and trustee of the interests of the people of India—their only guardian, and ought to think of them before thinking of Lancashire. The noble Viscount, at Oldham, indulged in prophecy as to the boldness of any man who would propose to re-impose the cotton duties in India. Certainly to do so at Oldham would require extraordinary boldness. But can the noble Viscount be sure that he will not be obliged himself to propose this in India? Through the repeal of these duties the salt tax has been increased and cannot be further increased, and the opium revenue is diminishing. The noble Viscount referred in his speech to the heartburnings caused by the repeal of the cotton duties. Was my noble Friend reminded of those by a gentleman who supported him on the platform, the Member for Oldham, and is my noble Friend aware what that gentleman formerly thought and wrote on the subject of sacrificing the interests of India to Manchester? Mr. J. M. Maclean, who now represents Oldham in the other House, when formerly an editor of the Bombay Gazette, wrote an article in that paper of February 28, 1876, in which he said—

“‘Give Manchester what she wants or go’—that is, what Lord Salisbury demanded of the Viceroy. What can be more scandalous, to avail ourselves of Lord Salisbury's own words, than for an English Minister deliberately to sell India to Manchester? Yet this is what the Secretary of State proposes to do. In return for the support given by Lancashire to the Conservatives at the last Election, and with an eye to future favours of the same kind, Lord Salisbury intends to deprive India of a revenue of three-quarters of a million sterling a year, to make a present of it, in the first instance at all events, to the English manufacturer of cotton goods. We trust there is sufficient political virtue left in England to expose and stigmatize this disgraceful transaction."

My Lords, I now beg leave to ask the noble Lord the Secretary of State for India the Question which stands in my name.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Viscount Cross): My Lords, the noble Lord who has just sat down has asked me whether my statement at Oldham on the 25th of January, that a Factory Act would soon be introduced in India, was correctly reported, and why I made that statement, and why, if I was going to make that statement, I did not make it from my place in Parliament. The noble Lord does not ask me whether I made the statement, but assumes that I did so. My answer is that I never made the statement at all, and, therefore, the statement was not correctly reported. What I did state was this. The Report of the Chief Inspector of Factories, Mr. Redgrave, which was published towards the end of 1887, contained the result of an investigation by Mr. Jones upon the working of the Factory Act of 1880 in India. As the Report of Mr. Jones was thought worthy of being embodied in his Report by the Chief Inspector of Factories in England, I thought it was well to call the attention of the Viceroy to it, and to ask him to make the necessary inquiries as to whether the factory legislation in India did require amendment or whether it did not. Those inquiries are in course of being made, and no answer has as yet been sent to me from Bombay, where the greater number of factories are. Until I receive the Report that has been asked for it is impossible for me to form any opinion as to whether it is necessary that a Factory Act should be introduced or not. I have no objection now to repeat what I did say at Oldham, which was that it makes no difference to me, as regarded factory labour, what is said by the Manchester Chamber of Commerce or by people in Bombay, because the protection of one industry against another has nothing whatever to do with the reasons for which Factory Acts are passed. As I understand, the whole basis of a Factory Act is that it is absolutely necessary for the protection of the health and the lives of women and children employed in particular industries. This is the only foundation upon which Factory Acts rest. They have nothing to do with the protection of one industry against another, or one class against another, or one country against another. Therefore, whenever it becomes my duty to consider whether there ought or not to be an amendment of the law in India, such consideration will be based upon that principle alone. The noble Lord further asked whether steps had been taken to see that the coolies of Assam and Bengal were properly treated. Some time ago an Act was passed in connection with that subject, and the question was raised whether the Coolie Act should be amended when Lord Hartington was Secretary of State, and his Lordship thought that its operation should be tested for two or three years longer. At the end of that period I had to consider whether I would amend the law or give it a further trial. I found that great improvement had been effected by the Act, and I, therefore, determined to give it another trial and extend it for two or three years. The result has been that very great precautions have been taken under the Act, and I received a despatch from the Viceroy last month saying that very considerable improvement has taken place in the position of the coolies. If the noble Lord will move for a copy of that despatch I should be glad to lay it on the Table. As regards death rates, they vary considerably in different parts of India. Some of the tea gardens are particularly unhealthy, but those are being narrowly watched. I think the last average death rate recorded was 36 per thousand, which is a little above the ordinary death rate among Indian populations. I think I have answered all the Questions of the noble Lord, and I trust I have done so to his satisfaction.

STANDING ORDERS.

THE LORD PRIVY SEAL (Earl CADOGAN), in introducing the Report of the Select Committee made to the

Lord Stanley of Alderley

House on the 31st of July last, said: My Lords, when in the course of last summer I moved your Lordships to appoint a Committee to inquire into the Standing Orders of this House relating to the conduct of public business, I explained to the House the reasons which induced the Government to make that proposal and the objects which they proposed to themselves in doing so, and I do not think it will be necessary for me to trouble your Lordships with any repetition of such statement. There is, however, one point to which I wish to allude once more—namely, to the disclaimer which I then made as to there being any idea or intention that the appointment of a Committee to carry on this inquiry should be either in substitution or anticipation of any more ambitious schemes or proposals which might be brought forward in the future for the reforming of the constitution of this House, or its reconstruction as a branch of the Legislature. It appears to me that the question of the constitution of this House and the subject of the conduct of our legislative proceedings are entirely distinct, and should be kept separate. If we are to wait until any reform is carried out in the construction of this House, with the assistance which has been promised to us by the noble Earl the late Secretary for Foreign Affairs (the Earl of Rosebery), having regard to his Lordship's duties in connection with the London County Council, it is likely that for some years to come we should leave the Rules which govern our proceedings unchanged and unamended. My Lords, if it be true, as has been stated by noble Lords, and by others outside the House, that for many years past this House has not addressed itself to the task of remodeling the Rules of its procedure, it appears to me that however short or however long may be our tenure of the position which we now occupy as a branch of the Legislature, it is incumbent upon us to do what we can in order to meet the criticism, and if possible to carry out the wishes, of those who desire to amend the proceedings of this House. My Lords, the Committee which the House appointed to consider this question was one which I think I may venture to say must carry the greatest possible authority. If noble Lords will look at the names of the Peers who constituted that Committee, it will be seen that they were taken from all sides of the House. The Members were representative of the various stages of thought upon this and other questions, and I think it will be at once conceded that the tribunal to which these Rules have been referred was one which may be considered, not only impartial, but in the highest degree authoritative. I did not receive any great encouragement from the noble Earl opposite the Leader of the Opposition, when I ventured to make the Motion upon this subject; but I feel bound to add that the noble Earl consented to serve upon the Committee, and therefore we had the invaluable advice and assistance which his unequalled knowledge and experience of the procedure of this House would naturally give him, and I must therefore acknowledge the great assistance which he was able to give us in all our proceedings. Then there was another noble and learned Lord who sits on the same bench opposite, and I cannot help expressing my regret that he is unable to be present upon this occasion—I mean the noble and learned Lord (Lord Herschell). One at least of the most important provisions recommended in this Report is due to the initiative of the noble and learned Lord, and I think that all Members of the Committee will agree that we should derive the very greatest possible advantage from his experience. When I say that the Committee also had the advantage of the services of the late Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and others who have in public and in private taken the greatest interest in this question, I think I have said sufficient to show that this Report may, at all events, be received as representative of the general body of opinion in all parts of your Lordships' House. Turning now to the Report, the main difficulty with which the Committee were confronted was, on the one hand, the opinion of those Members of the House who are jealous of the ancient forms and procedure of the House, and who I believe would be best satisfied by leaving things absolutely in statu quo; and, on the other hand, there was the feeling of those who would wish for a larger and greater measure of reform and change than is recommended in the Report. It has been our duty as far as possible to steer a middle course between these two sets of opinion, and I trust that the House will think that we have, to a certain extent, been successful in that aim. Speaking generally, we decided to remove, where possible, all paragraphs in the Standing Orders enforcing absolutely obsolete and useless forms, forms which had for a long time dropped entirely into the background. We wish to preserve that which is antique, but, if possible, to do away with that which is antiquated. Then, my Lords, there are certain new provisions which will be found in the amended copy of the Standing Orders which has been furnished to your Lordships, and which I will endeavour as shortly as possible to explain, and it occurs to me that possibly I might in a very few words be able so to classify these new Rules and changes as to make them clearer to your Lordships than they would be by a cursory examination of the papers now in your Lordships' hands. With regard to the obsolete forms, your Lordships will find there are several, No. XVII., No. XXXVII. and No. LVII., to which I need not further allude. They are simply Rules which have long dropped out of use. There is one, No. XLII., which will be found on page 29, which has been amended so as to conform with the present practice of the House. Then there is a set of Rules, some of which are important in themselves, because they relate to messages and conferences between this and the other House of Parliament. I think that all of us must wish that the relations between this House and the other House should be as cordial and conciliatory as possible. These Rules which we have struck out, and to which we have proposed Amendments, were not only objectionable and even offensive in themselves, but calculated somewhat to hinder that comity between the two Houses which is at all times desirable. At paragraphs LXXXVIII. and LXXXIX., at page 50, your Lordships will find the new Rules which we have inserted instead of the old Rules, the new Rules being, in fact, a statement of the procedure which has been in use for some time past. Then, my Lords, in reference to the conduct of Debates and Procedure, your Lordships will see at page 16, Paragraph XXIV., that we have amended the old Standing Order by omitting the part which prohibits our calling each other by our proper names and titles. No new Rule has been prepared providing that we are to call ourselves by our own names, but the prohibition has simply been removed. Your Lordships will be fully aware of the inconvenience which has occasionally arisen from the practice which it is intended to reform. There is a small alteration on page 16, also in Rule XXV., enabling the Mover of a Bill to speak in reply at every stage of that Bill. Then I come to a provision which is, I think, more important. On page 22, paragraph XXXA, your Lordships will see that a provision has been made for there being a quorum of the House upon any division, with certain limitations. The chief objection which has been found to the absence of any rule as to a quorum is that it has been possible that a Bill which passed through the other House of Parliament, after considerable discussion, upon some occasions should be rejected by a very inadequate number of Peers towards the latter end of the Session. Perhaps I had better read the proposed new Rule to your Lordships—

“ If, on a Division upon any stage of a Bill, it shall appear that 30 Lords are not present in the House, the Lord Speaker shall declare the question not decided, but the debate thereon adjourned to the next sitting of the House; and if such Division take place when the House is in Committee, the Chairman shall declare the question not decided, whereupon the House shall resume, and shall be again in Committee at the next sitting of the House.”

That, my Lords, I think, will remove what was formerly a reproach as to the inadequate attendance of Peers upon occasions when important legislation has been before the House. Then there is another paragraph, which provides not only for an adjournment of the business in question, but it gives power to the House to order that the business in question at the time of the adjournment should be taken at the next sitting, or at some later hour of the evening. This, of course, I need hardly say, refers to the difficulty which has been experienced in this House, and not in this House alone, of carrying on discussions after 8 o'clock, or even before 8 o'clock. Great anxiety has been felt that the debate should be closed at or about 8 o'clock, and the result has been that some questions have been inadequately discussed, and many noble Lords who wish to take part in the debates have been prevented from giving their valuable assistance to the House. The Rule which has been proposed by the Committee is as follows :—

“If at the close of the speech of any Lord it shall be moved that the business then in hand be adjourned, or the House being in Committee that the House be resumed, and it shall be so ordered, it shall be lawful for the House thereupon, without notice given, to make further order that the business in question shall be taken first, either at some later hour of the evening or on some future sitting-day to be then fixed.”

Then, my Lords, there is one further Amendment to which I ought to call your attention, and that is at page 24, No. XXXIV. This provides for the taking up of Bills that come up from the House of Commons. Your Lordships may remember that there was a Rule that if a Bill were brought up from the House of Commons after twelve sitting days without some noble Lord giving notice of the second reading, the Bill should be dropped for the current Session. It has occasionally happened that a Bill has been dropped merely through the neglect of the Member having charge of it. Provision is now made that such Bills may be taken up at a later period of the Session, with certain limitations. This is a matter which I think the noble and learned Lord (Lord Herschell) brought forward last Session, and it is a small alteration which I think will commend itself to the House. Then I come, my Lords, to what is the most important of the recommendations of the Committee, which will be found on page 27, paragraph XLI. The Committee recommend the following Rule :—

“At the commencement of each Session of Parliament Standing Committees shall be appointed, to one or other of which, unless the House shall otherwise order, every Bill shall be committed, instead of to a Committee of the whole House; and, on the Report of the Standing Committee being received, the Bill shall not be re-committed unless the House so order. The Standing Committees shall not exceed four in number, and shall be appointed for such classes of Bills as the House may determine.”

There are other provisions enumerated in following paragraphs which, perhaps, I may summarize as follows :—Standing Committees, first of all, are to be nominated by a Committee of Selection. They shall consist of not more than fifty nor less than twenty Lords, and the Committee of Selection is to have the power to add not more than ten Lords in respect of any particular Bill. The quorum of a Standing Committee shall be twelve. The Standing Committee may appoint any Sub-Committee for the consideration of any Bill. The Chairmen of these Committees are to be nominated by the Committee of Selection, but there are not to be more than 12 nor less than eight Lords to serve as Chairmen, and they shall nominate amongst themselves the Chairman of each Standing Committee, and may change the Chairman from time to time. I should add that the Committee of Selection will consist of the Chairman of Committees and eight other Lords to be named by the House. Then, my Lords, I think the only other paragraphs to which I need call the attention of the House are to be found on page 12, Nos. XVIIa. and XVIIb. These allude to the absence of noble Lords. Your Lordships are aware that there has always been power in the House to enforce the attendance of its Members. That power has not been exercised for many years, and it is to be hoped that it will never be necessary to exercise it. The two Rules proposed are these—

“The absence of any Lord from this House, except for sufficient reason, shall not prevent the Committee of Selection from calling for his services.

These, my Lords, I think are the chief features of the Report to which I now beg to draw your Lordships' attention. I do not think I need add any further remarks. There were certain subjects which, to my regret, were withdrawn from the purview of the Committee, but I have gone at sufficient length into the result of the Committee's deliberations as far as they went, and I trust that the proposals made will commend themselves to the approval of the House.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, the noble Lord opposite has brought before your Lordships' House a subject of very great importance, and the recommendations of the Select Committee, constituted as it was of Members representing various views and opinions, deserve to receive, and I am sure will receive, careful consideration by your Lordships' House. I do not propose to

possible to steer a middle course between these two sets of opinion, and I trust that the House will think that we have, to a certain extent, been successful in that aim. Speaking generally, we decided to remove, where possible, all paragraphs in the Standing Orders enforcing absolutely obsolete and useless forms, forms which had for a long time dropped entirely into the background. There were certain subjects which, to my regret, were withdrawn from the purview of the Committee, but I have gone at sufficient length into the result of the Committee's deliberations as far as they went, and I trust that the proposals made will commend themselves to the approval of the House.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, the noble Lord opposite has brought before your Lordships' House a subject of very great importance, and the recommendations of the Select Committee, constituted as it was of Members representing various views and opinions, deserve to receive, and I am sure will receive, careful consideration by your Lordships' House. I do not propose to go through the alterations and additions to the Standing Order seriatim, but upon the most important change—namely, that of the appointment of Standing Committees—I may say that that proposition is one in which I heartily concur. My Lords, I take this opportunity of expressing the hope that the whole subject of Parliamentary reform will not form the subject of any Party debates, but will be dealt with by this House upon its own merits.

*EARL BEAUCHAMP: My Lords, I am sure I shall be expressing the sentiment of the House generally in paying tribute to the admirable manner in which the noble Lord has brought forward these proposals; but I must say that it appeared to me that there is one very great hiatus in his statement. He described very clearly what was proposed to be done, but he certainly ignored the very important question whether there was any reason at all for these changes in our Standing Orders. I do not myself see that any adequate ground has been made out for such a change. With regard to the proposal to appoint Standing Committees, I fear that the proposal will be the means of excluding a very large number of Peers from the debates in Committee, and I do not think that that is a very desirable thing. We are not so overwhelmed in work as they are in another place as to render it necessary so to economize our time. I can quite imagine this happening in your Lordships' House—that a Bill may be brought forward on which a Peer not accustomed to take much part in your Lordships' proceedings, and who would not naturally be a Member of any Standing Committee, might be able to bring to bear upon the discussion of that Bill a great deal of valuable information of the most useful kind, but, not being a Member of the Standing Committee, he would have no opportunity of giving the House the advantage of his criticism upon the various clauses of the Bill. The only opportunity he would have of discussing it would be either upon the second reading of the Bill or on the Report, but to rise and make a speech at a stage where you can only speak once is very different from being able to make frequent observations in Committee. Furthermore, I think your Lordships, in passing this new regulation, will be doing away with a very good opportunity for young Peers to take part in your Lordships' proceedings. If the present system had been found to work unfairly or inconveniently, then I could understand these changes being proposed; but I have never heard of any complaint in this direction. The complaints against your Lordships' proceedings are many and various, but I have never heard any complaint alleged against our proceedings in Committee in discussing a Bill. I cannot help thinking that this proposal is an imitation of the French Bureaux, which certainly have not been attended with happy consequences as regards the French Assembly. Anybody who is acquainted with the proceedings in the French Assembly will know that under the form of proceeding there, it is impossible to get that numerical proportion and balance of discussion which we get in our proceedings here. I trust we shall not adopt this particular proposal without full consideration. I am sure it is a great mistake, in an Assembly like this, to make change, without very full discussion and mature deliberation. I am for improvements, but I am distinctly against mere change; and in this case I really fail to see what we are to gain by alteration. With regard to the suggested alteration as to adjournments, I think the provisions proposed are very wise and proper. Again, I think it is hardly worth while to depart from our present Rules upon the subject of addressing one another by our names. The practice we have hitherto pursued is very decorous, and I do not think we shall gain in decorum by calling each other by our names and titles. I am not quite certain how the forms of the House will enable these complicated questions to be put, but certainly as regards the appointment of Standing Committees I must say "not content."

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, although I became a Member of this Committee last year, I was not able to serve upon it, and I therefore approach this matter with the disadvantage of not having heard the arguments which were, no doubt, put forward in favour of the proposal for Standing Committees. I heard, however, very fully from my noble and learned Friend (Lord Herschell) what his views were in making the suggestion, which, in point of fact, is only a modification of a proposal made by the noble

Marquess opposite. The noble Earl who has just sat down seems to think that there is nothing whatever in our present arrangements with regard to discussions in Committee which requires any alteration. I am quite unable to agree with him. I do not think he has at all apprehended the point in discussion in this matter. I do not suppose that it is the proceedings in Committee which are found to be defective, or which require alteration; but what we find is this, that there are a great number of small and comparatively unimportant Bills which pass through Committee without any notice or discussion whatever. Now it seems to me there is one function which is pre-eminently the function of this House, apart from any great initiative proposals, and that is the revision of Bills. It becomes more and more difficult, of course, for the other House, with the great multiplicity of business which they have, to give minute attention to Bills not of the first consequence. What we want is that all these Bills should be carefully scrutinized. What is everybody's business is always found to be nobody's business, and if the House is divided into small Committees, whose special business it is to consider the Bill referred to them, I think it will be of advantage to the country, and will redound very much to the credit of the House. Believing as I do that this alteration will lead to a more thorough examination of particular Bills, I certainly welcome the proposition. With regard to Bills of great importance, I apprehend that it is not intended to refer them to Committees of this kind. Of course they would come before the Committee of the whole House. With regard to noble Lords who might take a particular interest in a subject, and who might not happen to be upon the particular Standing Committee, I observe that there is a provision in the proposed Standing Order that any ten Members (or of course fewer) may be added to a Committee for the purpose of the discussion of any particular Bill; so that any Peer having special knowledge might be added, and the Committee would have the advantage of his experience.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, I want to point out to my noble Friend that the proposals now before us have not the intention, and would not have the effect, of depriving this House of any control over its Committees. The House might, if it pleased, direct that a Bill, after it has passed the Standing Committee, shall be considered in Committee of the whole House. There will still be the stages of Report and Third Reading. I imagine that when a Bill has been read a second time the Motion put from the Chair will ordinarily be, "That the Bill be referred to a Standing Committee," and it will then be open to any Peer to move, instead of the words "Standing Committee," to insert the words "Committee of the whole House." The Question always is, "That this Bill be committed," and under the new Rules I suppose it would be simply necessary to add "to a Standing Committee." It would therefore come before the House on each occasion, and there would be full opportunity for every Member of the House to give his opinion. My Lords, I feel very strongly as a Member of this House for some years that Bills of a secondary class are not considered with that care which they deserve, and that we do not examine into the phraseology of Bills, and especially the references in the Bills which form so large a portion of our modern statutory language, with the care which might reasonably be expected of a House constituted as this is. Upon the whole I think the proposal a good one; but I would point out to your Lordships that we do not stand pledged to it for ever; if it turn out that the proposal does not answer, it will be easy to send the matter back to the Committee.

LORD STRATHEDEN AND CAMPBELL: My main object, my Lords, in rising is as far as possible to confirm what has fallen from the noble Lord opposite (Earl Beauchamp) as to its being desirable, and, indeed, indispensable, that each of these changes should be separately weighed, and canvassed, and considered. There is no sort of unity between the various alterations; they are not all subordinated to any common object, so as to make their being accepted or rejected en bloc either desirable or practicable, and I hope the noble Lord will see his way to giving the House an opportunity of considering the various proposals seriatim. Very little has been said about a proposal which now considered. After that we shall take, seriatim, Amendments on all the points. Then comes the final Motion that these be the Standing Orders of this House. That seems to me to give all the opportunities which noble Lords can desire.

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY: My Lords; I rise for the purpose of making a suggestion which I think will meet all the difficulties which appear to have arisen. It is quite true that the only satisfactory way of discussing these Standing Orders is to take them seriatim, and it is equally true that that will take an enormous amount of time; but I think there is a middle course, which is this—that we should take seriatim all those Standing Orders which are absolutely new, and then take those in which any alteration has been made, leaving without discussion those Standing Orders in which no alteration has been made. I do not think that noble Lords will find that that will take a very great deal of time, and I am inclined to think that it will be satisfactory to the supporters of the proposed changes as well as to those who wish to oppose them.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, I would point out that it is only this evening that we have had from the noble Earl (Earl Cadogan) any explanation of the grounds upon which the Select Committee came to the conclusions reported to us. It cannot be expected that noble Lords who have now, for the first time, heard that explanation should commit themselves without more mature consideration, and I cannot help thinking that the better course would be to take these alterations seriatim.

*THE EARL OF DERBY: I think, my Lords, we shall find it impossible to discuss this matter satisfactorily unless we take the Amendments one by one. Here is one that, upon a Division upon any stage of a Bill, a quorum of 30 Members shall be required; here another constituting Standing Committees; another relating to conferences with the other House. How is it possible that in one discussion we can deal with all these subjects, which have little or no connection with one another?

THE EARL OF CORK AND ORRERY: I would suggest to my noble Friend that he should withdraw his present

Motion, and bring it on after we have had time to look into the Amendments and alterations proposed.

EARL CADOGAN: My Lords, I was about to ask the leave of the House to withdraw my Motion.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn, and the Order, on Motion, discharged.

SWEATING SYSTEM.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: My Lords, in rising to move the Resolution of which I have given notice, it will not be necessary for me to make many observations. Although the last Session offered unusual facilities in the way of time, your Lordships Committee were unable to conclude their labours, and, as the Chairman of the Committee, it has devolved upon me to ask your Lordships to re-appoint them. I beg to move—

That a Select Committee be appointed to continue the inquiry into the sweating system in the United Kingdom, and to report thereon to the House, and that the witnesses before the said Select Committee be examined on oath.

The Motion was agreed to, and the Lords following were named of the Committee—

L. Abp. Canterbury.	L. Foxford,
E. Derby.	(E. Limerick).
E. Brownlow.	L. Kenry,
V. Gordon,	(E. Dunraven and
(E. Aberdeen).	Mount-Earl).

LAND TRANSFER BILL.

BILL PRESENTED. FIRST READING.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord HALSBURY): My Lords, my object in asking your Lordships to allow the Land Transfer Bill to be re-introduced immediately is to obtain, if your Lordships shall so please, the re-appointment of the Select Committee which worked upon the Bill of last Session up to Clause 54, and which, I venture to hope, will be willing to bring the work to completion early in the present Session. Under the circumstances, I presume your Lordships would think it convenient to postpone any discussion either of the principles or of the details of the Bill until it shall have returned from the Select Committee.

LUNACY ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

BILL PRESENTED. FIRST READING.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord Halsbury): I ask your Lordships' leave to re-introduce the Bill for amending the Lunacy Laws. It is from no fault of this House, or of those who have held the Office which I occupy, that the numerous amendments of the law on this most important subject which are contained in this Bill have not been realized long ago. Most of these changes meet with general assent; some of them are of very substantial value. I persevere in my endeavour to have this matter dealt with, and leave to others the responsibility of neglecting it. With your Lordships' assistance, I hope to send the Bill, as soon as possible, to the other House, where it is the intention of the Government to give as early an opportunity as may be practicable of having it considered. I shall not think it necessary in this House, where the same Bill has passed so many times, to do more than point out in Committee the very few differences between this Bill and its predecessors, and to invite your Lordships' assistance in dealing with the serious question of mechanical restraint which I regret to find prevailing in some quarters. I shall very shortly introduce a Bill consolidating the Lunacy Acts, and I hope that whatever may be the fate of such parts of this Amendment Bill as are subjects of controversy, at least those parts which bear on the work of consolidation will be allowed to proceed without the loss of another year.

TRUST COMPANIES BILL.

A Bill to enable incorporated Companies to act as executors, administrators, and trustees, and in other fiduciary capacities.—Presented (The Lord Hobhouse); read 1st. (No. 10.)

House adjourned at half past Six o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, February 25, 1889.

NEW WRIT ISSUED.

For South-West Riding of the County of York (Barnsley Division), v. Courtney Stanhope Kennay, esquire, Manor of Northstead.

QUESTIONS.

BURGH POLICE (SCOTLAND) BILL.

MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.) asked the Lord Advocate, if he intends to proceed with the Burgh Police (Scotland) Bill during the present Session.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. Robertson, Bute-shire): It is not intended to proceed with the Burgh Police (Scotland) Bill until after the subject of Scotch Local Government has been considered by the House.

THE NEW LAW COURTS.

MR. BROADHURST (Nottingham, W.) asked the First Commissioner of Works whether, in accordance with his promise made last Session, he has caused an investigation to be made as to the condition of the roofs and other parts of the New Law Courts; and, if so, what has been the result?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET, University of Dublin): Yes, Sir; a careful inspection was made at the new Law Courts during the long vacation in last autumn, and the roofs were found to be in several cases in a very unsatisfactory condition, principally from the shrinkage of the large timbers used in their construction; but the defects have been carefully remedied, and the roofs are reported to me to be now perfectly safe.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE DE BEERS MINE.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he could give the House any information as to a concession alleged to have been recently granted by Lobengula to Mr. Rhodes, Chairman of the De Beers Mine, or to Mr. Rudd, the agent of Mr. Rhodes; whether he is aware that such concession purported to convey certain mineral rights in Mashonaland in consideration of the payment by Mr. Rhodes or by Mr. Rudd of £1,200 and 1,000 Martini-Henry rifles; whether he is aware that at the date of the grant of such concession Sir Sydney Shippard, Her Majesty's Administrator in Bechuanaland, was present in Lobengula's kraal; whether, on 14th May, 1888, Her Majesty's Government declared it would give no countenance to any concession unless made with the knowledge of and approved by the High Commissioner; whether such concession was approved by the High Commissioner, and has been sanctioned by Her Majesty's Government; and, whether he will lay upon the Table the Correspondence and Documents relating to such concession?

THE UNDER SECRETARY FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. DE WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): Her Majesty's Government have received the text of a concession alleged to have been granted to Mr. Rudd. It purports to include all Lobengula's dominions, except the Tati district; and the money consideration appears to be an annuity of £1,260 a year, besides a present of 1,000 rifles and of 100,000 rounds of ammunition. Sir Sydney Shippard was 100 miles away from the chief's kraal on the day the concession was signed, and had no knowledge of the negotiations. Mr. Moffat, the Assistant Commissioner, was also absent from the chief's kraal at the time. Such a letter as is referred to in the fourth paragraph of the Question was written from the Colonial Office on the 14th of May, and will be found in Blue Book C, 5,524, page 23. It is believed that the High Commissioner views Mr. Rudd's concession as an advantageous arrangement on grounds of public policy; but he has had no occasion to approve or disapprove it, and Her Majesty's Government do not consider it necessary to express any opinion, either as to its validity or merits. Papers on the subject will be included in the next Bechuanaland Blue Book.

MR. BRADLAUGH: Will the hon. Gentleman say whether, on the 14th of May last, Her Majesty's Government declined to give any countenance to a concession unless such concession was approved of by the High Commissioner; and whether it has since given countenance to this concession?

BARON HENRY DE WORMS: I think I have already answered the Question.

MR. BRADLAUGH: The hon. Gentleman said that the High Commissioner had had no occasion to express approval or disapproval. My question now is whether, Her Majesty's Government having, on the 14th of May, declined to give any countenance to a concession unless it was approved of by the High Commissioner, they have since given consent to this concession?

BARON HENRY DE WORMS: Her Majesty's Government have not thought it necessary to express any opinion as to its validity or merits.

MR. BRADLAUGH: Have they, then, changed their opinion since the 14th of May last?

BARON HENRY DE WORMS: No.

THE PRISONS IN CAPE COLONY.

MR. BRADLAUGH asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been drawn to the shocking state of the prisons in Cape Colony, as shown by the report made last year to the Cape Parliament, and to the ill-treatment and insufficient and bad food of the prisoners undergoing sentence; whether it is true that female prisoners have been subjected to criminal assaults by the gaolers; that some of the gaols are, as reported, "never free from vermin," and that untried prisoners were found in the most wretched condition from bad food, "aggravated by the utter impossibility of their taking any exercise in the cramped space allowed them;" and whether the Government has taken, or will take, any action in the matter?

BARON HENRY DE WORMS: I have seen the report in question. A very searching inquiry was made, and was immediately followed by the passing (in August last), of a stringent Act for the removal of the abuses which had been brought to light. As the hon. Member is aware, these matters in Colonies which have responsible government are entirely within the jurisdiction of the Colonial Government.

MR. BRADLAUGH: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that up to the present time, except the passing of an Act, no thing has been done to improve the condition of the prisons, and that they still remain in the same horrible state?

BARON HENRY DE WORMS: I am not aware of the fact, but I will make inquiry.

IRELAND—MR. HODDER, R.M., AND THE ENNIS NATIONAL LEAGUE.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe), asked whether Mr. Hodder, R.M., informed certain persons at Ennis that his instructions were to suppress by force a meeting proposed to be held at that place on the 3rd February to express sympathy with Mr. O'Brien, if any resolutions condemning high Government officials were proposed; but if otherwise, he would not interfere with it; and whether Mr. Hodder, R.M., entered the room, the proceedings having subsequently commenced, and dispersed the meeting by the aid of a force of Royal Irish Constabulary he brought with him?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, Dublin University): I am informed that the facts are not accurately represented in the Question. The meeting was being organized by the reputed officials of the local National League, which was suppressed in that district as an unlawful association. The Resident Magistrate did not state that he would not interfere with the meeting on the condition indicated in the Question. He did say that a meeting held for the purpose of promoting sedition and bringing the Government into contempt, and for the denunciation of Government officials, would be an unlawful assembly. The meeting was not dispersed by the police, the assembly having separated on being called upon to do so by the Resident Magistrate.

MR. J. E. ELLIS: May I ask if the Solicitor General for Ireland has received his information from the Resident Magistrate himself?

MR. MADDEN: I received the information through the usual source.

THE COAL MINES ACT.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the case mentioned by him on 10th May 1888, as throwing doubt on the application of Clause 10 of "The Coal Mines, &c. Act, 1887," has yet been decided; and, does the Home Department now hold that the clause in question is universally and unconditionally operative except as specified in the Act of 1887?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): The Justices have only a few days ago stated and signed the special case, which was entered for hearing on Saturday last. Everything will be done to secure a speedy decision, but until that is given it would not be proper for me to give a reply to the second paragraph of the hon. Member's Question.

MR. BRADLAUGH: May I ask what delayed the decision of this special case for 12 months?

MR. MATTHEWS: The Justices have been pressed more than once, but only signed the special case on Saturday.

MR. BRADLAUGH: In ordinary cases the Justices have yielded to pressure, but it does not appear to have been exercised in this case.

ZULULAND.—REBELLIOUS CHIEFS.

MR. ALEXANDER M'ARTHUR (Leicester) asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the sentence of imprisonment with hard labour, reported to have been passed by the Special Court, now sitting at Ekshowe in Zululand, on Somkeli and other Zulu chiefs charged with rebellion, is now being enforced; whether the Government has been informed as to the action taken by the Court in the case of Ndabuko, who is reported to have reserved his defence on the plea that he had not been able to obtain legal assistance; whether the proposed trial of Dinizulu at Ekshowe will be proceeded with after the leave to appeal against the proceedings of that Court which has been granted by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council; and whether the course to be taken by the authorities in Natal as regards the other Zulu chiefs will be guided by the precedent established in the case of Dinizulu?

BARON HENRY DE WORMS: In answer to the first paragraph of the hon. Member's Question, I have to say that the sentence is not now being enforced. These chiefs will be detained, as they were before trial, pending the consideration by Her Majesty's Government of the proceedings in each case. The report of Ndabuko's case has not yet been received by Her Majesty's Government. It is understood that the trial of Dinizulu will be proceeded with. He has not appealed against the proceedings of the Court before which he is to be tried. These proceedings have not commenced as far as we know. His appeal was against a judgment of the Supreme Court of Natal, upholding a warrant signed by the Governor, for the removal of Dinizulu into Zululand from Natal. This warrant purported to be issued under a colonial law, and the applicability of that law is the question in dispute. The Secretary of State is advised that the result of the appeal to the Judicial Committee would in no way affect the competence of the Special Commission to deal with the case, or the validity of its proceedings therein. I do not quite understand the meaning of the last paragraph of the Question; but, as Dinizulu will be tried last, his case cannot form a precedent for the cases of the other chiefs.

SWAZILAND.

MR. ALEXANDER M'ARTHUR, asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he has received information to the effect that the Governor of Natal, on behalf of Her Majesty's Government, has rejected the offer of the King of Swaziland to place himself under British protection; and, whether Her Majesty's Government is aware of negotiations said to be in progress with a view to the annexation of that district by the South African Republic?

BARON HENRY DE WORMS: I do not understand what communication from the Governor of Natal to Chief Umbandine the hon. Member refers to; but Her Majesty's Government are precluded by the provisions of the London Convention of 1884 from declaring a protectorate over Swaziland, and they have no information of negotiations for the annexation of Swaziland to the South African Republic, which, they are advised, would be a breach of that Convention, although they have heard that the President expressed a wish to conclude a Treaty with Swaziland.

Baron Henry De Worms

THE ROYAL BARRACKS, DUBLIN.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.) asked the Secretary of State for War whether the Report of Mr. Rogers Field on the sanitary condition of the Royal Barracks, Dublin, will be laid upon the Table of the House; and whether the result of the inspection of the Dublin Barracks by the Secretary of State, the Quartermaster General, and the Director General of the Army Medical Department will be communicated to the House?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (MR. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): The first Report of Mr. Rogers Field on the drainage of the Royal Barracks will be laid on the Table immediately. In answer to the Question whether the result of my recent inspection of all the Dublin Barracks will be communicated to the House, I shall be glad to state, when opportunity occurs, the general objects we are aiming at.

THE NORTH BRITISH BORNEO COMPANY.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether there is any precedent for treating a British Company, administering territory under a Charter from the Crown, as "an independent State," as in case of the British North Borneo Company; whether the East India Company, or any other chartered Company, was ever recognized as "an independent State;" whether Article II. of the Agreement between the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, on behalf of Her Majesty, and the British North Borneo Company, limiting the right of Her Majesty's Government to interfere with the internal administrations of the North Borneo State, places any obstacle in the way of any interference which Parliament may at any time see fit to exercise; whether, in view of the protection afforded to the North Borneo State by Her Majesty's Military and Naval Forces, the Company is to pay anything; whether it is true that the Company lately enlisted 120 Sikhs or other Asiatic subjects of Her Majesty at Singapore in order to carry on hostilities against the Pangaran Shabandu; and, if so, whether such recruiting is subject to any regulations either in India or in the Straits Settlements; and, whether the territory in which these hostilities are carried on, and which is now in the possession of a native chief, is among the territories recognized as belonging to the Company by Article I. of the Agreement?

THE UNDER SECRETARY FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir JAMES FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): As regards the first two paragraphs of the Question, the hon. Member will find the precise status of the British North Borneo Company explained in the Parliamentary Paper, Spain No. 1 (1882), Borneo and Sulu, p. 202. The Company is not recognized as an "independent State," but as administering the Government of the independent State of Sabah, under powers and authorities derived from the Sultan of Sulu and the Sultan of Brunei, in consideration of an annual tribute. The Charter of the Company merely confers the ordinary incidents of incorporation, in return for which the Company have submitted to the control of Her Majesty's Government, in the exercise of the powers of government conferred on them by the Sultans. As regards the third paragraph, there is nothing in the Charter, or in the Agreement, between Her Majesty's Government and the Company there referred to which can interfere with any action which Parliament may see fit to take. As regards the fourth paragraph, the protection afforded to the Company does not differ in character from that which is extended to British life and property in all parts of the world, and the Company is not called upon to make any payment in respect of it. As regards the fifth paragraph, Her Majesty's Government have no information as to the enlistment of Sikhs and other Asiatic subjects of Her Majesty at Singapore, but recruiting is subject to regulations in India and in the Straits Settlements. As regards the sixth paragraph, the hostilities carried on by the Company against the Pangaran Shabandu are believed to have taken place on the border of the territory administered by them on the South West Coast (called Padas Damit), and to have arisen in consequence of raids, murders, and other acts of violence committed by the Pangaran in that territory.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: Am I to understand that any papers have been presented to Parliament since the North Borneo Company were made an independent State?

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: The hon. Member will find in the papers an explanation of the status of the Company.

IRELAND—CAPTAIN SEAGRAVE, R.M.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe) asked the Solicitor-General for Ireland whether any investigation has yet been made into the statements made in this House on the 19th December, 1888, by the hon. Member for Mid-Cork, respecting the arrest and dismissal from the Cape Mounted Infantry by the Government of Cape Colony of Captain Seagrave, R.M., for financial irregularities; and, if so, what has been the result of such investigation?

MR. MADDEN: The matter referred to is still under investigation, and a reply to a communication addressed to the Cape authorities on the subject is now awaited.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I wish to ask how it is that two months have not been found long enough for an investigation of the case; and whether the Government will give an assurance that Captain Seagrave has not been allowed to try cases under the Crimes Act since December? Also, if he will give an assurance that this magistrate will not be allowed to try cases until the charges against him have been determined?

MR. MADDEN: The gentleman in question has not been exercising jurisdiction recently, but he has been allowed leave of absence while the investigation was proceeding. In respect of the investigation itself, not a moment of time has been lost; but the irregularities are alleged to have taken place in South Africa, and, therefore, it is obvious that some time must elapse before a decision can be arrived at?

MR. SEXTON: Will the leave of absence be allowed to terminate before a decision has been arrived at?

MR. MADDEN: I have nothing to add to my answer.

THE ACTION OF THE NATIONAL LEAGUE.

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.) asked the Solicitor General for Ireland if his attention to this subject, and of moving an Address to Her Majesty that the same principles with respect to combination may be applied to the rich as are now applied to the poor.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I wish to ask whether the British Government has combined with other Governments in order to raise the price of sugar?

MR. W. H. SMITH: There is no foundation for that statement.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the attention of the Law Officers of the Crown has been drawn to a case in Lord Kenyon's Reports, in which the Lord Chief Justice treated a combination to raise the price of an article as a criminal offence?

MR. W. H. SMITH: So far as the information laid before the Government is concerned, they have come to the conclusion that there is no case for their interference. If the hon. Member is in possession of any information which would enable us to form a different judgment we would be exceedingly glad to receive it.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: Have the Government instructed their Law Officers to look into the matter?

MR. W. H. SMITH: I have already stated that, so far as the information received goes, we are advised there is no ground upon which they could proceed against these parties. The Government would be glad if the hon. Member could furnish them with any further information in his possession.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: I ask whether any inquiry has been made into the matter; and whether the Government have sought to obtain information?

MR. W. H. SMITH: We took all the steps in our power when the matter was referred to us, and we cannot find that there is any legal authority for interfering. The hon. Member may rely on competition to bring down the price of the article, and to effect a great and general reduction. It is impossible for any combination of this kind to last.

SIR LYON PLAYFAIR (Leeds, S.) asked the First Lord of the Treasury whether he can assure the House that the "legislative provision" in regard to the sugar bounties will be of such a kind as will enable the House to consider the whole policy for the Convention into which Her Majesty has entered for the suppression of bounties?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I have no hesitation in assuring the right hon. Member that any legislative provision in regard to the sugar bounties which the Government may bring before the House will afford full opportunity for the consideration of the whole policy of the Convention.

IRELAND—IMPRISONMENT OF MEMBERS.

MR. ANDERSON (Elgin, &c.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what is the number of Members of the House of Commons who have been prosecuted under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act; what is the number of Members who have been convicted under the Act; and how many hon. Members are now in prison?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND: Prosecutions under the Statute mentioned have been instituted against 24 Members, of whom 23 have been convicted, and the other case is still pending. The number of hon. Members now in prison is three.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.) asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland whether his attention has been directed to the circumstance that yesterday the visiting justices of Kilkenny Gaol made a report protesting in the strongest manner against the prison treatment of Mr. Carew, and requesting that his clothes may be restored to him; and whether the right hon. Gentleman proposes to take any action in the matter?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR): I have received no information on the subject. I have no doubt Mr. Carew will be dealt with in the ordinary course by the Prisons Board. That is all the information that has reached me.

PRIVILEGE.—STRANGERS IN THE LOBBY.

MR. SEXTON: I request to ask you, Sir, a Question relating to a matter of privilege. I desire to know whether you can inform the House by what right or authority a part of this building reserved to the use of Members of this House is open to one Edward Caulfield Houston, a witness in a certain case; and whether steps can be taken to prevent Members of this House from being brought into contact with the authors of false and calumnious statements? I wish to know whether we cannot be protected from being exposed to the provocation of meeting this man in a part of the House reserved to the use of Members?

THE SPEAKER: I am not aware of the facts narrated by the hon. Gentleman.

MR. SEXTON: I will put a further question to-morrow.

NEW MEMBER SWORN.

Sir John George Smith Kinloch, baronet, for Perthshire (Eastern Division).

MOTIONS.

CRIMINAL EVIDENCE BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Attorney General, Bill to amend the Law of Evidence in Criminal Cases, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Secretary Matthews, and Mr. Solicitor-General.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 96.]

OFFICIAL SECRETS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Attorney General, Bill to prevent the disclosure of Official documents and information, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Secretary Stanhope, and Lord George Hamilton.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 97.]

MR. SEXTON: I wish to ask a Question concerning the Bill, and with regard to the scope of the Bill—namely, whether it will prevent the disclosure of documents and information in the possession of the Government to either of the litigants in any case in which a Law Officer of the Crown—the Attorney General—holds a brief for one of the parties.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: At the proper time I will make an explanation.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HER MAJESTY'S MOST GRACIOUS SPEECH.

[ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [21st February.]—[See page 41.]

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

*MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-on-Tyne) moved as an amendment to the Address the insertion of the following words:—

"But we humbly represent to Your Majesty that the present system of administration in Ireland is harsh, oppressive, and unjust; that it violates the rights and alienates the affections of Your Majesty's Irish subjects, and is viewed with reprobation and aversion by the people of Great Britain. And we humbly represent to your Majesty that such measures of conciliation should be adopted as may bring about the contentment of the Irish people and establish a real union between Great Britain and Ireland."

The right hon. Gentleman said—MR. SPEAKER, my right hon. Friend the member for Mid Lothian remarked the other night that one reason, if there had been no other, why we should have been obliged to challenge this paragraph in the Address, was that the Government had taken a very unusual course in the wording of that paragraph. Instead of making it neutral in its expression, such as, according to my right hon. Friend's judgment, has always been the case hitherto, the Government have chosen to make that a paragraph to draw the whole House of Parliament on to express a satisfaction which we, at any rate, on this side of the House do not by any means entertain. But, even quite apart from the wording of this paragraph in the Address, I think it will be felt in all parts of the House that, with our views on this side, we should have been bound, in the light of recent contemporary incidents in Ireland, to call the attention of the House to what is now going on, and to ask the House seriously to consider whether it justifies or does not justify the description of "salutary results" as the outcome of the present policy of Her Majesty's Government. It is, I think, about eight months ago since I had the honour of submitting to the House a Motion which, though not quite identical in its wording, was no doubt identical in its purport and its drift with the present Motion. Nothing that has happened during those eight months has weakened the convictions of those of us who voted for that Motion that it was well-timed then, and nothing has happened which can weaken our conviction that it is still more urgently called for now. Sir, the propositions in the Amendment that I have put upon the paper are, in effect, founded upon two allegations. The first is that the Administration in Ireland has during the last few months, and during the last two or three months more especially, been singularly wanting in that prudence, that foresight, and that care, which are the cardinal virtues of all administration, but which are particularly required in the administration of the exceptional and repressive law which you passed, and which you are carrying out, against the opinion of the country upon which you have imposed it. The second allegation is that in one case, at least, a piece of legal iniquity has been perpetrated which in my judgment is tainted by every bad quality that can mark a judicial act, and which is worthy of some of the worst exploits of that ruffian judge in Scotland 100 years ago, who said "Give me a prisoner and I will find you the law." The Chief Secretary the other day—not in this House, but elsewhere—said he was glad to inform his audience that the relations between the people and the police in Ireland were more satisfactory now than they had been for a very long time past. Now, I for one should always—whatever might be the condition of parties, and however wide our views of policy—be glad to hear that; because, whether the Chief Secretary is a Liberal, or a Tory, or a Nationalist, we must all feel that nothing is more essential for anything like peace and order in Ireland than that the relations between the guardians of order and the people at large should be tolerably pacific and tolerably harmonious. As far, however, as has transpired in the public prints during the last few months, I can find no trace of anything of that kind. Indeed, I find traces of a very lamentably contrary state of things. What happened at Gweedore? The murder at Gweedore is one of those matters as to which there can be no difference of opinion in any part of this House, and the House needs no assurance that we here deplore and condemn that murder exactly as much as I am sure the hon. Member for Belfast and the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh condemned the murder of the cooper in the streets of Belfast in 1886.

Mr. John Morley

But, in saying that, I cannot, nor does the country, I think, absolve the Government of gross carelessness and rashness in the way in which the arrest was carried out. Four or five constables were sent to arrest a popular priest in the presence of his flock at a moment when their feelings of attachment and reverence were naturally at their height. To do that was an act of rashness which has never been surpassed in police administration, and in this connection I will venture to use an illustration which I have used before. Supposing that when I was Chief Secretary it had been necessary to arrest Dr. Kane or Dr. Hanna, two popular divines in Belfast. If I had sent a small number of police to arrest either of those clergymen coming out of their places of worship in the presence of a great crowd of Orangemen, I am perfectly certain that the Members for North Armagh and Belfast would have come down to this House and moved a Vote of Censure on me, and they would have been right. But contrast this extraordinary carelessness with the precautions taken when removing Father M'Fadden to gaol. Then the authorities, who thought it sufficient to send a small body of police—I am aware there was a larger body in reserve—to arrest him—

"Surrounded him with a heavy escort of the 60th Rifles and police, mounted and on foot. Carriages containing the police formed a line stretching 30 yards along the road. In front was a detachment of Royal Engineers to examine the bridges, while skirmishers went along the hills to prevent boulders being rolled down on the men below."

Surely this is very like a state of civil war. Contrast these precautions with the want of precaution shown at the beginning of this unfortunate catastrophe. I want to ask the House how they can have confidence in police administration which allows a handful of police to be brought into contact with mobs under such circumstances, and which affords such an exhibition of perversity and folly as was made on this occasion. And you will find that all over Ireland, except in the north-east corner, there are at this moment constant collisions, not always on a large scale, but irritating and vexatious, between the police and the people. Some of the cases are almost incredible. I admit that it is not very easy to get accurate information as to what passes in Ireland. But at Tralee in February, on the occasion of Mr. O'Brien's removal, a number of men were brought up for cheering. One of them, for instance, was heard to cheer for Mr. O'Brien when being driven from the station. Will the House believe that for this offence, and this only, the prisoner was ordered to find bail, himself in £5, and two sureties in £2 each, or go to goal for a month? Another cried "Bravo, O'Brien." Mr. Roche, the magistrate, said the prisoner must clearly understand that conduct of this kind—cheering a prisoner while being conveyed to gaol—was illegal, and would not be tolerated. I submit to the House that that is not the law in England, and that no Home Secretary or magistrate would venture to act as if it were the law. Another case was brought up in connection with the same business, and the prisoner was charged with hissing Mr. Cecil Roche. He was bound over to the peace for three months in gaol. At Killarney, also connected with Mr. O'Brien, the crowd were treated with the greatest violence. Prisoners whose conduct appeared to be perfectly harmless were taken to the barracks, and some brought before the magistrates. At the platform where the train reverses there were about 40 boys collected, and while the train was reversing they raised a cheer. Colonel Turner from the carriage ordered the police to charge them. The police, using their rifles as clubs, most mercilessly used them. That was a sample of what was going on. Wherever they had the chance the police were ordered to behave in this brutal manner. There is one case in which I hope the Chief Secretary will give us further information, for the circumstances as stated are so extraordinary that I cannot believe it. But he, perhaps, can tell us whether it is true or not. Two young men were charged with obstructing a constable at Ennis on the 10th of February. The obstruction consisted in the defendants, while engaged in conversation, laughing at the constable. The defendants denied that they were laughing. The magistrate sentenced them to three months' each in default of finding bail for good behaviour.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: What are you reading from?

MR. J. MORLEY: The Freeman's Journal. [Ministerial laughter.] If I read it from the Times, you would, I suppose, believe it. I said it was not easy to get accurate information from Ireland. The man who has the worst chance of getting accurate information as to what is going on, is the man who is dependent for his information on officials who are never in contact with the people. I say, Sir, this case may not be true, but it requires investigation. There are other cases, but I will push on to more important matters. There was in January a case where there was an extension of the law of riot and unlawful assembly of the most serious kind. Here two men were found guilty of unlawful assembly and imprisoned for one month, and the whole offence proved against them was that they were said to have been in a crowd, some members of which raised a cheer for the Plan of Campaign. If you are in a crowd which cheers for the Plan of Campaign, then you are guilty of an unlawful assembly. That is not the kind of justice which we desire to see administered in Ireland. It is that sort of thing which justifies me in saying that the present administration of the law in Ireland is harsh, oppressive, and unjust. I will now proceed to the sentences of Members of Parliament. I will begin with the most recent of them—the case of the hon. Member for North Kildare, Mr. Carew. I think, Mr. Speaker, as these gentlemen are excluded from this House, I may venture to call them by their names. Now, Sir, I am not going largely into the details of Mr. Carew's case. He stated himself before the magistrates the circumstances out which his arrest arose. Mr. Carew stated the facts as to the tenant O'Byrne, who had been evicted for arrears—arrears with which we have always said you ought to have dealt—and Mr. Carew said that under the circumstances he was bound, as representative of the county, to go over and expose what he considered was nothing better than an act of highway robbery. "I admit," he says, "that I said that." He further admitted that he said if any one was imported into the district such a person should be left severely alone—Boycotted. "If that was a crime," Mr. Carew said, "I admit it. If it be a crime to say that the tenants of Lord Drogheda are under no obligation to provide amusement for Lord Drogheda, by allowing him to run over their land, then I admit I am a criminal to the fullest extent." Now, I am not discussing for a moment the point whether Mr. Carew's speech was legal or illegal. I will take it the magistrate was justified in finding that he had broken the law. But I ask the House to consider what a state of law you have got which enables the Marquess of Drogheda and his agent, and as many other people as like, to oppress the tenants under the screw of arrears of an excessive rent, and yet which does not allow the tenants to combine, and does not allow anyone to advise them to combine, under the penalty of being brought before a coercion magistrate, and being sentenced to four months' imprisonment. The Chief Secretary said on Friday night that there was no distinction between giving advice of this kind and shooting a land-grabber. I do not believe there is a man in the House who will say that Mr. Carew's offence is to be put on the same footing as a crime of violence. Then I come to the case of Mr. Finucane.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It is under appeal.

MR. J. MORLEY: I am aware of that. I have not forgotten what the right hon. Gentleman said, and I am going strictly to confine myself to the coldest and baldest statement of the case. Mr. Finucane was charged with conspiracy and intimidation. He made a speech at Castleconnell on the 28th October, 1888, at which he denounced crime, but the Crown brought in evidence of another speech made on the 4th November, and afterwards his attendance at a meeting on the 19th May. At the meeting in May, language of extreme and indefensible violence was used by one of the speakers, but not by Mr. Finucane. The magistrates said—and with these words I will leave the case, but I am bound to refer to it because it is one of the illustrations of the proposition I wish the House to affirm, namely, that the administration of the law is not calculated to win the affection of the people of Ireland—the magistrates, in pronouncing sentence, said Mr. Finucane was at this meeting and he never opened his mouth to condemn such violent language, and the Court could come to no other conclusion than that Mr. Finucane lent the sanction of his presence and influence to the urging of this cruel system, and the bench therefore had no option but to find him guilty, and he would be sentenced to four months' imprisonment. Another participator in the meeting who had not been present at the meeting in May, was sentenced to one month's imprisonment. Therefore we may infer that the difference in the punishment was owing to Mr. Finucane not feeling disposed to protest against language used by another person at a previous meeting. Now, Sir, I come to what I consider by far the worst case of all that has happened in the administration of English law for a very long time past—I mean the case of Mr. E. Harrington. [An hon. MEMBER, "Infamous."]. Mr. Harrington was brought up on three charges. Of these one was dropped and another dismissed, and he was convicted and punished for the offence of publication. The charges were—first, being at an unlawful meeting; second, unlawful publication; third, incitement. He was not punished for being present at the meeting; he was not punished for the words used, for the magistrate said, though the language was strong, it was not guilty language; he was, therefore, punished solely and purely for the publication of the proceedings of a suppressed branch of the League, the meetings of which very branch he had for 12 months every week or fortnight reported in the same paper without a word of protest being raised on the part of the Crown. It is quite true that a year ago he had suffered one month's imprisonment for the offence of publication, but he had never desisted, and other proprietors of newspapers in other parts of Ireland went on publishing, and no notice was taken. Yet for doing what he had been doing for 12 months, and what all the other people had been for 12 months all over Ireland and are doing now, he is at this moment enduring the punishment of six months' imprisonment with hard labour. The Chief Secretary spoke the other night of the shocking crimes for which men are imprisoned under this Act—and six months' imprisonment is the severest punishment that can be inflicted under it. Will the right hon. Gentleman get up and say that this offence—the publication of proceedings of suppressed branches of the National League—deserves to be called a shocking crime and deserves to be punished by the punishment that is due to a shocking crime? If it is a shocking crime, why was not he proceeded against before? If it is a shocking crime, why are not others proceeded against? If it is a shocking crime, how was it the magistrate said if he would promise not to repeat it, he would let him off? Is there a Judge or a magistrate in England who, if he deemed an offence actually committed such as to deserve six months' imprisonment, would content himself with ordering the prisoner to be bound over to come up when called upon? The Chief Secretary will, no doubt, get up and say I am attacking the administration of the law. No, Sir, I am attacking the prostitution of the law. There is a circumstance about Mr. Harrington's case which I cannot entirely pass over. You show no quarter in imputing motives to Gentlemen below the Gangway. I do not know why they should show quarter to you. What may have been the motive of the authorities in this case? The Special Commission, which you invested with its powers with such exultation and triumph, although I suspect now you look at it with rather more mixed emotions—the Special Commission was sitting. Mr. Harrington was taking part with the counsel for what I may call the defendants, in that he was advising them with his local knowledge on the Kerry cases then before the Commission. Not only so, but in this speech—not the incriminating portion of it, but in what was, by far, the most important portion of it—he said—

“ I have come down from London to Kerry to warn you men of Kerry that if you go into public-houses to take a drop of drink you had better be careful whom you talk to, because there are spies here who are collecting evidence against Kerry for the Special Commission. I advise you to be careful, and to be kind enough to help me and my brother with any proof that you can find that outrages have been due, in seven cases out of ten, to private disputes, and not to agrarian causes in their proper sense.”

What authorities, with one spark of tact, with one spark of sense or of management, with one spark of common fairness, after allowing the practice, for which Mr. Harrington was punished, to go on for 12 months, would step forward and say, “ We will stop this man; we will prevent his friends from having the benefit of his services; and we will deter the Kerry tenants from following the advice he very sensibly gives them.” I now pass from the mode in which prisoners are made to the mode in which prisoners are treated. The Chief Secretary has made some very remarkable statements upon the nature of his own responsibility in this matter. He made a speech at Dublin last Saturday week—a speech, which I am bound to say, does more credit to his capacity for being merry under difficulties than it does to his right feeling. In that speech the Chief Secretary said, “ The Prisons Board is not in my department;” and, in his letter to Mr. Armitage the right hon. Gentleman said, “ I do not make the prison rules, and I do not administer them.” [Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: Hear, hear!] The right hon. Gentleman cheers that statement. Well, I do not like to use the language he has introduced into political controversy, as, for example, when he says a statement of my right hon. Friend is “ absolutely false.” I prefer to stick to the old phrase and to say, “ The right hon. Gentleman is greatly mistaken.” The Prisons Act, 1877, says:—“ The said Board shall, in the exercise of their powers and jurisdiction under this Act, conform to any directions which may from time to time be given to them by the Lord Lieutenant.” Now, the Lord Lieutenant is, of course, the same thing for official purposes as the Chief Secretary. “ The Board shall exercise their jurisdiction subject to such direction as they may receive from the Lord Lieutenant under the provisions of this Act as to the control and management of all prisons and prisoners therein.” I am unable to construe the English language if that does not invest the Chief Secretary with full responsibility for prison treatment. What has struck me very much, and what I cannot understand, and what I hope the Chief Secretary will be able to explain, is how it is that, though in the Chief Secretary's opinion the state of Ireland is improving, the treatment of prisoners is becoming more severe, that proceedings against Members of Parliament are becoming more frequent, and that there is every appearance on the part of the Government of alarm and dismay rather than

of confidence and complacency? Now, I am going to refer to a matter to which I am almost ashamed to refer—but after all the shame is not ours, the shame is there (pointing to the Ministerial bench)—and that is the matter of hair cutting. This is a comparatively new device. I believe that the first prisoner who has been subjected to this operation is an hon. Friend now sitting below the Gangway, who was imprisoned in November. Mr. Wilfrid Blunt was not subjected to it, nor was my hon. Friend the Member for Mayo (Mr. Dillon), and it was never resorted to till the case of my hon. Friend below the Gangway, next upon Mr. Harrington, and now upon Mr. O'Brien. It is not only new, but I submit it is a complete violation of the spirit of the prison rules. What is the prison rule? The prison rule is this—unless it has been altered quite recently:—"Each male prisoner shall have his beard clipped or shall be shaved at least once a week, unless specially exempted by the governor." Therefore the governor has a full right of exemption; but, more than that, "the prisoner's beard shall not be cut closer than may be necessary for the purpose of health or cleanliness." Then surely the Chief Secretary is responsible, and the spirit of this prison rule, which comes under the head, by the way, of "personal cleanliness," has been violated by this odious practice. I wonder the Chief Secretary does not reflect that it is these small indignities that sting most sharply—these stupid, useless humiliations. They may seem very slight for us to be talking about, but they are neither slight nor meaningless in the eyes of those of whom Mr. O'Brien is the very idol. What is the meaning, then, of Mr. O'Brien's resistance, and, I suppose, of Mr. Carew's resistance, if it be true he has resisted? I will tell you what the meaning is, and it is one with which I sympathize. It is a repudiation by the only means, so far as I know, in his power that the offence for which he has been punished was on the same level with, or of the same complexion as, many of the vile, selfish, or brutal offences of common ordinary criminals. My hon. Friend below the Gangway, when he was in prison, I believe, refused not to wear the prison garb, but to take exercise with criminals. I do not know if the House understands what that kind of thing means. I rather think that, in the case of the Member for Fermanagh (Mr. W. Redmond), he had to take his exercise with a couple of soldiers who had been guilty of an abominable kind of burglary. Would any of you (indicating the Members on the Ministerial side) consent to take your exercise—would the hon. Member for North Armagh (Colonel Saunderson), when his time comes, because he constantly says that in a certain event he will defy in arms the law, will he consent—I hope he will not—to take his exercise with ordinary and vile criminals?

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: Certainly I should.

*MR. JOHN MORLEY: Then all I have to say is that I hope I shall be in the House to protest against it. I desire now to make a few general remarks on prison treatment, but I want to begin by saying there is a precedent for the treatment, which, in my opinion, is due to men committed under this Act so long as their offences are confined to incitement by writing or speech. For a precedent I should look into the General Prisons (Ireland) Act, 1877. According to a well-known section of that Act, every prisoner convicted of sedition or seditious libel is directed to be treated as a misdemeanant of the first division. Now, what is sedition? Sedition is defined as "consisting of practices, whether by deed or writing, which have for their object to excite discontent or dissatisfaction, to create public disturbance, or lead to civil war, to bring into hatred or contempt the Sovereign or the Government, the laws or Constitution of the Realm, and generally all endeavours to promote public disorder." Now, will anybody in the House say that offences of this magnitude do not lead to far more widespread peril than can possibly come from incitement to boycotting? I am not defending boycotting or incitement to boycotting, but I ask can it be contended the Acts treated as sedition in their definition are not far more serious to the public peace than the incitement to boycotting? Why should not offenders whose offences under the Crimes Act consist of writing and speech be treated as misdemeanants of the first division? Remember that the protection of a jury is withdrawn, and mark this—that two County Court

Judges in four cases have ordered prisoners under this Act to be treated as first-class misdemeanants, and I believe the Resident Magistrates have it fully in their power to do the same. But why are there only four cases in the long record? The answer is quite simple. It is because the Chief Secretary himself, in every speech he ever makes on this subject—I do not say he intends to do it—but the effect is to give his Resident Magistrates and the County Court Judges the cue. The right hon. Gentleman seems impatient at that remark, but it is a perfectly true one. Does the right hon. Gentleman suppose that a Minister in his great position and of his great authority can assure this House and great audiences in the country that there is no distinction between a criminal under this Act and a criminal under any other Act without that having weight with magistrates and County Court Judges? He must be held responsible. But let me say another word in the case of Mr. O'Brien. The Chief Secretary thought that some of us did not properly describe to the public what Mr. O'Brien's offence was. He will presently say that Mr. O'Brien's offence was one of the utmost gravity, because it was a serious incitement to boycott in a neighbourhood where there were evicted farms. Mr. O'Brien's words—and I have never attempted to shirk this—were these—

“I am afraid land-grabbers are living and thriving in the midst of you. If all our labours for the last ten years have not been in vain, you ought to know how to deal with a land-grabber.”

Those were the words quoted by the Chief Secretary as being the most important. Now, what did the Chief Secretary say?—

“If we had passed over those words so serious and so guilty we should have been making ourselves, and the Government would have been making itself accessory to assassination.”

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Hear, hear!

*MR. JOHN MORLEY: He abides by that. Accessory to assassination! Mark this. This guilty speech was made in September, and Mr. O'Brien was brought to justice in January. Therefore, for four months you were accessory to assassination. On Friday night the right hon. Gentleman said, in reference to Mr. Carew's case:—

“I will not draw a distinction in practice between a man who shoots a land-grabber and a man who deliberately makes speeches having distinct reference to taking evicted farms in the neighbourhood where he speaks.”

He says he admits no distinction in practice.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Hear, hear!

*MR. JOHN MORLEY: You say you admit no distinction in practice; but you do. Do you mean to tell me that if you found a man shooting a land-grabber you would let him remain for four months without arrest? I know what the right hon. Gentleman will say. [“Oh!”] Mr. O'Brien was punished at this time, no doubt, for inciting to boycotting, but he was afterwards punished for the Plan of Campaign. But is advocating the Plan of Campaign as bad as shooting a land-grabber? I should be surprised to hear that, because for advocating the Plan of Campaign Mr. O'Brien got the other day at Tralee six months only, without hard labour, on account of his health; but Mr. Carew's offence, which the right hon. Gentleman thought ought to be treated like shooting a land-grabber, only received four months' imprisonment. Therefore, the law, at all events, treats these two offences in a way which shows that all this talk of putting offences of this kind on a footing with crime like murder is really idle and ridiculous and shameful talk. The Chief Secretary pretends—and I do not think it is a pretension he ought to lay so much stress upon; I do not think it is manly to lay stress upon it—that it was by pleading ill-health that Mr. O'Brien got more relaxation than any other class of prisoner. The truth is, it is the right hon. Gentleman who seeks refuge behind doctors' certificates. [MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No.] Yes; and that was the meaning of the right hon. Gentleman's despatch of Dr. O'Farrell to Clonmel; and the right hon. Gentleman said so practically. He said he did not send Dr. O'Farrell from motives of humanity or from apprehensions of Mr. O'Brien's health, but lest anything should happen to injure the Government.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, no! I am not aware of having used those words.

*MR. JOHN MORLEY: I quote from the Times, and here it is—

“I do not think we ought to permit Mr. O'Brien to ruin his constitution for the purpose of injuring Her Majesty's Government.”

It is because you did not think Her Majesty's Government ought to be injured that you sent down Dr. O'Farrell. I do not profess to be so subtle a logician as the right hon. Gentleman, but I don't believe that will hold water. Now, Sir, I pass on to another class of inconsistencies of the right hon. Gentleman. He said on Friday night—

"Every man, so far as I am concerned, who may be imprisoned in Ireland under the law prevailing in Ireland shall be treated as an ordinary prisoner. Any relaxation of the rules must be made, in my opinion, on the authority of the medical officer of the prison."

That is not in the least correct. A relaxation of the rules has been made in the case of priests by the right hon. Gentleman on his own authority. The right hon. Gentleman said, on the 26th of June last year—

"I decided that priests should be subjected to the same treatment as the other prisoners. In the matter of dress alone I would make a distinction."

Even that is not correct. It is not in the matter of dress alone that the right hon. Gentleman has made a distinction. Will the right hon. Gentleman tell me that in one single instance a priest has been ordered to clean out his cell? Not in one single instance. We know that the Canon Law which he pleaded prescribes rules de habitu clericali, but I am not aware that it lays down any rule de cellis purificandis. Now, do we blame the right hon. Gentleman for extending special treatment to the priests? Not at all; on the contrary, we all thoroughly applaud and approve of it. Even the hon. Member for South Belfast (Mr. Johnston), I believe, approves it. The essential point is this—that the Catholic Church is an entirely voluntary association, and that its disciplinary regulations are of no avail whatever, as the right hon. Gentleman well knows, against the law of the land. That is perfectly clear. Why, then, does he make these exemptions in favour of the Catholic clergy? By making them he admits the existence of the dispensing power, and thus makes himself responsible in every case. But why does he exercise it in the case of the priests? Because to carry out this system of odious humiliation upon the clergy of the Catholic Church, would be to wound and insult the popular sentiment. This is the basis of the exemption, and a perfectly adequate and satisfactory basis it is. Why, then, does he not extend it? If this humiliating treatment of popular Representatives wounds the popular sentiment, why should it not be regarded as a basis for the exceptional treatment of the Representatives of the people? I do not want to go into any metaphysical distinctions as to what punishment is or ought to be, or to discuss whether, as the right hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) says, degradation depends upon the offence. All that I regard as idle. But I do insist that the Chief Secretary has a discretion, and if he asks me for a guide in the use of that discretion, I would say that, not speaking of a distant planet—not speaking of England or Scotland, but of a country like Ireland—I would say, let him ask himself this question—"What will be the effect of the treatment I am going to inflict, upon the public opinion of the country whose affairs I am administering? Is this harsh, this stupid infliction of personal indignities calculated to lessen the difficulties of government, or to revolt opinion and to sow the seeds of bitter hatred?" If my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Bury (Sir Henry James) were here, I should read a paragraph from Bentham on this matter which would meet an argument of his. But perhaps the House will not object to hear a very few lines from that very wise man upon the infliction of ignominious punishment. He says—

"The infliction of ignominious punishments is an appeal to the tribunal of the public—an invitation to the people to treat the offender with contempt, to withdraw from him their esteem. It is a bill drawn upon the people for so much of their ill-will as they shall think proper to bestow. If they look upon him in a less favourable light than they would otherwise, the draft is honoured; if they do not it is protested, and the charge is very apt to fall upon the drawer. Ignominious punishments are like those engines which are apt to recoil and wound the hand that unadroitly uses them."

Are these prisoners regarded with moral reprobation in consequence of these humiliating punishments? What did the right hon. Gentleman say in his speech in Dublin? He did not say that the Irish Leaders, these men who are being sent one after another to prison, are paid agitators—he did not say that they are a "kept party." No, Sir; the Chief Secretary has seen some things in the country, at all events, as they are. He said that the Irish Members of Parliament boasted—these are his words—that—

“They had a majority of their countrymen with them. They are leaders whom their countrymen are content constantly to follow. They wield a mighty influence.”

Now, in all seriousness, what do you gain by trying to wound the self-respect of men in such a position? You say they wield a mighty influence, and that they are the real leaders of their countrymen. Surely it is our business to raise their self-respect, and to treat them both in this House and within the doors of the prison as well as you can, and not as ill as you can. There is Mr. Harrington, who, on the occasion of his former imprisonment, was sent out among his own constituents to give evidence in a Court of Justice in a prison dress. Yet the other day, when they brought Delaney, the murderer, over here to give evidence, he was brought up in private clothes. Ah! but there is a great difference in the two cases. Delaney was brought up in England; Mr. Harrington was only brought up in Ireland. Sir, it is this kind of proceeding, the infliction of these small, irritating indignities, is the method by which in the past, as all who know Fenian history are aware, you manufactured rebels. and you are going the right way about manufacturing rebels in the future by all this vexatious, unworthy, unmanly treatment. As I quoted one philosopher, I will quote another, who ascended as far into the heights of political wisdom as, I am sorry to say, the right hon. Gentleman has gone down into the depths of political unwisdom. He says that it is the duty of a ruler not to provoke beyond the necessities of the case; not to leave stings in men's minds which must rankle after the appearances of tranquillity are restored. My charge is that the Chief Secretary has systematically provoked, and is provoking, beyond the necessities of the case. The other propositions of my Amendment do not call for many words from me; but I do ask the House to bear with me a little while longer while I speak rather more generally. The dissatisfaction with which your opponents regard the present harsh, oppressive, and unjust administration in Ireland is almost matched by the impatience of your own friends. These scenes are not what the Unionists bargained for; and it is not only in England that there is great impatience, even on your own side. I should like to read a passage from a newspaper in Belfast, one of the strongest and most earnest supporters of the Government in a quarter where they have not very many, but in which they have the greatest body of supporters. This is a very able journal, very hostile to Home Rule, and very fervent for the Union. What did it say last Thursday?—

“It has been our duty to defend Mr. Balfour from the very unjust attacks of which he has been the object on the part of the Irish Nationalist Press. But we may state candidly that we believe a great many people who are not unfriendly to the Irish Chief Secretary think he is not so well served by his subordinates in Dublin Castle as he ought to be. They get him into all kinds of difficulties which might, with a little temper and management, very easily be avoided. In administering such a measure as the Crimes Act, as little as possible ought to be left to the discretion of subordinates. When Lord Spencer was Lord Lieutenant, he carefully superintended the working of the whole administrative machinery of Dublin Castle. Now, in everything done in giving effect to the present Crimes Act, there appears to be no effort made to prevent needless friction, or, we may say, needless irritation. The Irish police are an excellent body of men, of whom the country may well be proud. But we may, however, say that their system is not very elastic; it is rough and ready. Mr. Balfour may not be directly responsible for this; but he ought to see it, and do what he can to prevent it. Some persons are very seriously to blame. If they really wished to discredit the coercive system by making it appear to ignorant and prejudiced people as odious as possible, they could scarcely act otherwise than they do. It is the cause of the Union which is thus brought into obloquy, and which is thus misrepresented to the humbler classes, who have only recently been enfranchised. Some of the errors committed by the Castle officials, or those who are presumed to be under their control, seem so extraordinary that it is difficult to believe they could be the effect of mere wrong-headedness or imbecility. We are sometimes almost inclined to suspect that there must be treachery, and that Mr. Balfour is not receiving fair play from some of his official subordinates.”

The writer goes on to strengthen his case, and he finds the stupidity, want of tact, and want of management in the Executive authority so astounding that he can only account for it on the hypothesis that Mr. Balfour has traitors in Dublin Castle.

MR. JOHNSTON: What paper is the right hon. Gentleman quoting from?

*MR. JOHN MORLEY: The Northern Whig of last Thursday. That is a piece of very impartial and good evidence in favour of my Amendment. You are reducing Irish Government to a mockery and a farce. There never was a time when so many Irish Members of Parliament were in prison. You have got away Mr. O'Brien for six months; you have so disabled the hon. Member for Mayo that he will have to be away for some months. And you have tried another move—you have tried a more serious stroke—you hoped you were going to destroy their Leader. I am not sure their Leader will not destroy you. There never was a time when any Government—not a military despotism, not a Government by right of conquest—was so eager to take every opportunity in every direction, of openly, ostentatiously, and defiantly exhibiting their contempt, not merely for the legal rights of the people of Ireland, but for all their most honourable sympathies, feelings, and affections. We are told there is a policy of conciliation, and it is to be looked for in a development of material resources. The Chief Secretary is to come bearing balm upon his healing wings in the shape of a Drainage Bill. He is going to minister to a mind diseased by light railways. What position will this Parliament be in when you have got rid of a section of important Irishmen for criticizing, for supervising, for sanctioning these measures, which, more than all others, particularly demand special local Irish knowledge? The tide of opinion—you must know it—against the inanity of one part of your policy, meeting the tide of feeling against the barbarity of another part of your policy—the confluence of these tides is rising and will sweep you away. Sir, I am not fond of holding the opinion of the constituencies in terrorem over a lawfully constituted Parliament. I know it is the duty of a lawfully constituted Parliament honestly, courageously, and independently to shape its course, and not to waver because there may be transient changes in the current of public opinion. But it would be very wonderful if this change were transient, unless the people of England and Scotland have completely changed all their habits of thought and feelings which have made their country what it is. But, although I hold this view, there are peculiar circumstances in the present Parliament. Yes, the history of your Parliamentary majority is one long fraud upon the constituencies. There is not one in ten of you, on both sides of the House, who did not at the elections repudiate coercion. There is not one in 50 of you who did not promise local government extension in Ireland. What has become of your promise of local government? The hon. and gallant Gentleman (Sir John Colomb) who seconded the Address said what you all say—the time is not opportune; the country is not quiet. That is a very remarkable argument, because the Chief Secretary for Ireland is presently going to tell us that outrages have gone down from 1,100 in 1886 to 660 in 1888; that boycotting has gone down 75 per cent. If in 1886 Ireland was quiet enough to have local government promised to it, why on earth is it not quiet enough now? I hope my hon. Friend the Chairman of Committees (Mr. Courtney), who said in the House, if not out of it, that he will never stand indefinite postponement of local self-government—[MR. COURTNEY: Hear, hear!] I am glad that he cheers—I hope he will ask the Government why they do not fulfil the promises he and others made on their behalf. The President of the Board of Trade (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach), whom I do not see in his place, spoke very strongly on the necessity of giving Ireland an extension of local government, if it is quiet. If it is not quiet enough, and you do not think it is quiet enough, what does that show? It shows that you do not in your hearts believe in your own salutary results; it shows that you do not believe your own figures; that you do not accept the very tests of returning order which you try to press upon the House. Well, how long is this farce of Parliamentary misrepresentation to go on? Is this the best, after three years, that you are capable of doing for Ireland? Is this all you can do towards the solution of the Irish question? Are we for three or four years more to endure the scandal and disgrace of scenes which your own friends condemn—the scandal and disgrace of a policy which is founded in error, which is persisted in with a blind obstinacy to the lessons of experience, and which is carried on from day to day with a flagrant disregard of forethought, common sense, and policy? No, Sir, I do not think we are; I think the time is swiftly coming, I think the hour is almost now on the point of striking, when an irresistible voice will come up from the nation in the words of a great statesman of the last century, in a resolution to pray Her Majesty that she will be graciously pleased again to recur to the sense of her people, and to let her people decide the great issues, great for the peace of Ireland, great for the honour of England, which divide you from us. Mr. Speaker, there is one word more before I sit down which I feel bound to say. There is one chapter in the history of the administration during the last three or four months into which we shall, when the proper time comes—and I have no intention of anticipating that time—have to make a sharp and searching inquisition. We shall want to know whether it is true, and if it be true, on what principle it is, that officers of the Royal Irish Constabulary in receipt of public pay, have acted as collectors of evidence in the interests of one party in a great process now going on. We shall want to know whether it is true that Resident Magistrates in receipt of public pay assisted, or were present, at the taking of evidence in this great process, either in Ireland or in London. We shall want to know whether any one in the position of a Crown Solicitor has acted as a paid agent in an inquiry relating to crime in his own county, and whether such action is compatible with his position. We shall want to know whether Government officials have handed over secret and important documents, the property of the Government, to enable individuals to make a case against certain persons. We shall want to know all these things, and all else that you have done in furtherance of what may prove to have been a fabric of imposture and of plot, of which you have infatuatedly made yourselves the dupes and the accessories. I beg to move the Amendment which stands in my name.

Amendment proposed,

In paragraph 8, line 4, to leave out all the words after the word "Country." to the end of the paragraph, in order to insert the words,

VOL. CCCXXXIII. [THIRD SERIES.]

"But we humbly present to your Majesty that the present system of administration in Ireland is harsh, oppressive, and unjust: that it violates the rights and alienates the affections of your Majesty's Irish subjects, and is viewed with reprobation and aversion by the people of Great Britain.

And we humbly represent to your Majesty that such measures of conciliation should be adopted as may bring about the contentment of the Irish people, and establish a real union between Great Britain and Ireland.—(Mr. John Morley.)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

*THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down certainly did not require to make apologies to the House for this Motion. If we consider the attitude which the Opposition have taken up during the last three weeks of the Recess, if we consider the speeches they have made, and the accusations they have hurled against the Irish Government—accusations to the savage bitterness of which I think you will search in vain through history to find a parallel—we shall be of opinion that had they had not taken the earliest opportunity of bringing these charges against the Government in the House, where they can be replied to face to face, they would have shown themselves utterly unworthy of their Parliamentary position. I am therefore not surprised that the right hon. Gentleman should have brought forward this Motion, but I am surprised at something that he has put into the speech, and at something that he has kept out of the speech. I am surprised that he in the last few words of his peroration should have taken advantage of his position, and urged charges against the Government at a time when he knew that his words would pass current in the country, but that we could not by any possibility take up the challenge which he threw down. I am surprised at the right hon. Gentleman's having alluded to that question at all, but I am still more surprised that he has omitted to allude to another part of the controversy which has raged during the Recess. Why, Sir, the party whom on this ocme and disagrees with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby. And this seems the more probable when I recollect the statement made by the Member for Mid Lothian himself only last summer. At that time it was the cue of hon. Gentlemen opposite to say that I had everything to do with the prisons, in order that they might prove that I was responsible for the death of Mr. Mandeville. When they were in that frame of mind, what said the Member for Mid Lothian? "Who are the Prisons Board in Ireland? The Executive Government. I do not believe it is so in England, and I hope not, and I believe not." Now, apparently, contrary to the belief of the right hon. Gentlemen on his right and left hand, it turns out that this state of things which the right hon. Gentleman did not believe, or, if it existed, would deplore, is, according to the last liberal doctrine, not only the actual state of things in Ireland but in England also. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian is right, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby is wrong. I have taken the pains to go into it. The interpretation which I understand is received at the Home Office in England is that the Home Secretary has no direct control over the destiny of prisoners. It is his business, no doubt, in conjunction with Parliament, to frame laws for prison discipline; but it is not the business of the Home Secretary nor of his department to control the separate destinies of individual prisoners. I have never denied that I have relations with the Prisons Board. Of course not. I have not only denied it, but I have proclaimed it on the house-top. I have not, however, that control over individual prisoners which Members opposite would attribute to me.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Who is the supreme prison authority?

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Then comes down the right hon. Gentleman, and, not for the first time, says, "How comes it, then, that you have relaxed the rules in favour of priests?" I have never concealed from the House that it was, in my opinion, a doubtful point whether that relaxation was not a straining of the Act. I have said so before, and I am perfectly ready to say so again. But I have made inquiry, and I find that in England precisely the same kind of relaxation is made when questions of religious feeling or religious prejudice come into account. I find, for example, in England there have been regulations made and acted upon by which Jews have certain privileges as regards food prescribed by the Jewish creed. I also find that, as far as possible, the prejudices of Hindoos with regard to caste are respected in English prisons. I maintain, therefore, that in making the relaxation to which I have alluded I have—unconsciously, I admit—followed the analogy of the English practice. How is that case to be distinguished from the action which right hon. Gentlemen desire me to take in dealing with the particular destinies of individual prisoners in the way of relaxation of prison rules? I maintain that the two cases are absolutely different. In one case I deal with a perfectly defined class. I deal with that class not by way of making their punishment less than that of their fellows, but by making that punishment equal, because I hold—and I am sure the House will agree with me—that it is an additional punishment to compel a priest to do that which the rules of the Roman Catholic Church either forbid or discourage him from doing. You will observe that there are two wide distinctions between the action I have taken and the action I am asked to take. On these two distinctions I have partly based—though I have another and stronger reason to give—my justification for what I have done, and my justification for refusing to do what I have been asked to do. There is this further reason—the right hon. Gentleman twitted me with considering Irish prejudices in what I did.

MR. JOHN MORLEY: Irish sentiment.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Irish sentiment is making the relaxation in favour of priests. Properly stated, I have no objection to that indictment. The House is aware that, speaking broadly, we may say that every member of the disestablished Church in Ireland, every member of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland, every member of the Wesleyan body, and every Quaker is a man not only attached to the Union between Ireland and this country, but who fervently approves the administration of the Crimes Act as carried on in that country. I admit it is true, that almost every leading Roman Catholic of position, whether at the Bar or on the Bench—well, I do not know about the Bench—whether in commerce, or in whatever line of life he may be—almost every leading Roman Catholic also shares the same view—but, nevertheless, the fact remains that undoubtedly the great mass of support which the Government receive in Ireland is Protestant. Was there not, under these circumstances, great danger that the issues we were fighting in Ireland—the issue between law and disorder—would be confounded with those ancient and perennial religious quarrels which have added so much to the unhappiness of a country whose political history has been far from fortunate? Was not that a reason, in addition to all other reasons, why I should take every pains in my power to make it clear to every Roman Catholic in Ireland and out of it, that, while I was determined, irrespective of creed or station, to enforce the law, I was most anxious in every respect to consider the legitimate feelings of the Roman Catholic priesthood? Then the right hon. Gentleman proceeded to make some observations upon the subject of hair-cutting in gaol, and he appears to assume that the practice of clipping hair began for the first time last October. That I believe to be an absolutely unfounded statement. A question has been put down on the Paper on this subject, but postponed, for I have not yet been able to get the information from Ireland, but if my recollection serves me right, as I think it does, no man has been excepted.

MR. JOHN DILLON: I can correct the right hon. Gentleman.

*MR. BALFOUR: Will the hon. Member allow me—except on a doctor's certificate. Speaking from recollection, that was so in the case of the hon. Member for East Mayo, and in the case of Mr. Blunt.

MR. DILLON: Will the right hon. Gentleman be kind enough to state the nature of the disease which prevented my hair being cut?

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: My recollection of the diseases of the hon. Member is not very complete, although I have read a great deal about them. I think hon. Gentlemen are a little unreasonable. If I am asked a question I may be permitted to answer it. There is no doubt—there never has been any doubt—that the hon. Member for East Mayo is a gentleman of delicate constitution. He was in hospital during the whole time of his confinement in gaol, and naturally, under these circumstances, I had to read various reports concerning the state of his health. I have said nothing offensive either to him or to the House. I feel sure the hon. Member will accept my assurance that nothing personal to him was meant. But to continue my argument. Now the right hon. Gentleman appears to think that this is a specially Irish form of brutality in prison treatment. But there is the case of the Member for N.W. Lanark (Mr. C. Graham), and if any man in England was sent to prison for a political offence—assuredly he was. He had his hair cut, he had to sleep on a plank bed, he had to put on the prison dress, and yet without protest, without agitation, he went all through that so-called degrading punishment which now moves hon. Gentlemen to horror and tears.

MR. T. M. HEALY: He was convicted by a jury of his own country.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The distinction, therefore, of the learned Gentleman is this—a man convicted by a jury may have these indignities placed on him, but a man who is not so convicted may not. There is an end of your prison case if that is your argument. I do not think I need go further into that question at the present moment. I have fully dealt with every point brought forward, but if hon. Gentlemen are anxious for me to say more, do not then suppose that I have not a great deal more to say. I said to the House on Friday night that the fears of the Member for Cork that no Irish Nationalist would henceforth condescend to take advantage of a doctor's certificate were wholly unfounded. I stated that the statistics I had collected proved that there had been a great deal more relaxation in the case of persons committed under the Crimes Act than in the case of persons committed under the ordinary law. According to the statistics for last month, the percentage is 4 per cent in cases of ordinary crime and 18 per cent in cases under the Crimes Act. The right hon. Gentleman then replies: "You are sheltering yourself under doctors' certificates." "You employ your doctors to alter exceptional treatment? Until you can draw a distinction between him and the Gentlemen below the Gangway. Your argument stands self-condemned. You take the case of the man who deliberately breaks the law in Ireland. I say that he is indirectly responsible for the crime which he knows often has followed and probably may again follow from the action he has taken. I think it would be a monstrous thing to distinguish between those who come down to preach against the landgrabber and the moonlighter who goes, in consequence of that incitement, and fires bullets through the landgrabber's windows. But, if there is to be different treatment, do you think the Government ought to decide that question? I say that a Court of Law, and a Court of Law only, is entitled to say what sentence the man shall undergo. The right hon. Gentleman thinks I ought to determine what sentences these men should undergo. I think that is a monstrous doctrine, which, if carried to its fullest extent, would utterly destroy all equality of punishment, all responsibility of Courts of Law, and throw on the Executive Government a responsibility which no Executive could bear without discrediting itself. You require me to modify arbitrarily the punishment of persons like the Member for North-East Cork, Mr. Sheehan, and Mr. Finucane. Am I to modify the punishment of their associates? Am I to distinguish between the inciter to crime and the committer of the crime? Does he found that doctrine upon any principle of jurisprudence? If so, does he limit it to Irish prisoners? Why, Sir, if this principle were carried out, we should have to remodel, not only the whole prison discipline from the top to the bottom, but the whole principles upon which the laws of the country have hitherto rested. I may say that I shall not object myself to have the general question adequately discussed; but what I shall object to is the carrying out of this principle for a first time in connection with a particular class of prisoners under a particular law. I shall require that you make any alteration general in its application, and that the measure you mete out to the Crimes Act prisoners in Ireland shall be meted out to prisoners in England and Scotland and the unproclaimed districts of Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman missed out, as I told the House, all reference to the accusations levelled against me with regard to the maltreatment of prisoners. And he did well, for those stories are false. He has also left out all reference to stories which, unhappily, are true of the monstrous system of intimidation to which prison officials in Ireland are subjected whenever it suits the political game of hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway. The story is a melancholy and disgraceful one—I will not weary the House with it, but I could show you in case after case how warders are insulted and sometimes assaulted in the streets. A Governor had disgraceful charges trumped up against him, I believe, simply and solely because he was engaged in one of those transactions. I would remind the House of the terrible tragedy of Dr. Ridley, how his windows were broken, how he was spit at in the streets, how he lost his practice, and was reduced to fear of want, all because it pleased hon. Gentlemen opposite, in pursuance of a political design, to set that agitation on foot against him. Now consider the last case—the case of Clonmel prison. The moment Mr. O'Brien was put into gaol the persecution began. It began with a most monstrous article published in a local print, called, I think, the Nationalist. I will not read the whole of that article, which suggests, among other amiable things, that I am a proper subject for assassination. Then it goes on to say that the callous and brutal conduct of the prison doctor was simply outrageous." The result was what you might expect—volleys of stones were thrown, his windows were broken, his shutters were broken. The unfortunate man had to turn out armed with a rifle, he had to seek the protection of the police, and since then he has not been a moment without that protection. Three societies employing him as their doctor at once gave him up, many of the Roman Catholics of the town rapidly left him, and every effort was made to ruin his practice or tamper with his honesty. The fate of the Governor is not much better. He and his wife and children cannot leave the prison without protection. Threatening letters—not like those foolish missives which are sent to me and to other right hon. Gen. when they are in power, and are the outcome of a disordered brain—but threatening letters which mean something are sent to him, and this outrageous persecution is simply and solely the result of the fact that he has attempted to administer the rules imposed upon him by his superiors and by Parliament, and that in doing so he happens to have excited the wrath of hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway and their friends in Ireland. I am glad to have this opportunity of calling attention to what I think one of the meanest and most disgraceful episodes of an agitation which has been stained by many mean and many disgraceful episodes. I now turn to the not less important—perhaps even more important question—of the grounds on which these men have been convicted. I would point out to the House that all these recent events in Ireland must be taken as parts of a whole. They are parts of one great conspiracy to make the administration of the law an impossibility. The hon. Member for North-East Cork advocated, to the best of his ability, in a letter which has been made public, a great movement in favour of starting the Plan of Campaign and making the administration of the law impossible all over Ireland. Please notice that it was not merely the Plan of Campaign which was to form the weapon of hon. Gentlemen. All those prison scenes—all those scenes in Court—are part of the same great drama. For they know that while disorder and outrage are the proper instruments for influencing Ireland, sensational scenes and inaccurate statements are the corresponding means of appealing to the English public. I call attention to an interview stated to have taken place between the hon. Member for North-East Cork and the representative of the Pall Mall Gazette, in which it was stated that one of the main objects of the drama as to the prison clothes was to make the administration of a Coercion Government impossible. The same statement has been made by other persons. The date of the paper is February 18, 1888. He said:—"My means are governed by great principles. First, it is absolutely necessary to avail yourselves of every possible opportunity you can to put every conceivable obstacle in the way of the easy working of a Coercionist Government." I am not arguing whether that is a good or a bad object; I am pointing out that it was the object, and these scenes were the first steps towards the attainment of it. The hon. Member for North-East Cork has five times come before a Court of Law. The first time was at Mitchelstown, the second at Middleton, the third at Loughrea, the fourth at Carrick-on-Suir, and the fifth at Tralee. At Mitchelstown his counsel described the opposing counsel as a liar, he was asked to withdraw and refused, and went out of Court with a great flourish of trumpets. At Middleton, Mr. O'Brien attempted to escape in the middle of the trial, and a bogus telegram intended to facilitate that escape was sent to the police. At Loughrea, in the course of the trial there, the depositions were stolen. [An hon. MEMBER: By whom?] At Carrick-on-Suir, Mr. O'Brien and his counsel, the learned Gentleman the Member for Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy), engaged in a transaction which I can only interpret as a deliberate attempt to get up a riot. That attempt was finally successful, and in the middle of the disorder, out goes the Member for North-East Cork, rides across country, turns up at Manchester, does exactly what he intended to do—namely, makes a scene, goes back to prison, and makes another scene. Then he is tried again at Tralee, and at Tralee the same drama, with slight variations, is played again. Again, the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Longford insults the Court.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): How did I insult the Court? Will the right hon. Gentleman quote my speech?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. and learned Gentleman knows perfectly well how he insulted the Court.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The right hon. Gentleman has insinuated that I called somebody a liar; next that I tried to get up a riot, and, lastly, that I insulted the Court at Tralee. Will the right hon. Gentleman justify his accusations?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. and learned Gentleman is mistaken. I did not charge him with calling anyone a liar. He was not the counsel in the Mitchelstown case; when, however, he was counsel at Tralee, I believe, he used language of a very improper kind.

[A VOICE: Quote.] I shall not read, and I shall not quote.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I rise to order. I wish to ask whether a statement can be made that I, in the course of my professional duties, insulted a tribunal without advancing some reason for that allegation?

MR. SPEAKER: It is not for me to order any reason to be given; it rests entirely with the right hon. Gentleman.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have not the least desire to hurt the feelings of the hon. Gentleman. [An hon. MEMBER: Quote the words!] I have not the words here, but I recollect them perfectly well, wherein he described Colonel Turner as a sneak. I do not know whether that is language that meets with the approval of the front Opposition bench. The Court held that that was not a decent proceeding, and the hon. and learned Gentleman left the Court.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I did not leave the Court. The right hon. Gentleman will do me the justice to say that I did not leave the Court. I was dragged from the Court. I did not insult the Court. Colonel Turner was not a member of the Court, and it is right that I should state that I said what I did of Colonel Turner under provocation given to me by him the previous night, when I arrived in the town and he shouted out I was a blackguard.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not make any comment upon the explanation the hon. Gentleman has given. At all events the fact remains that he was carried out of Court, and that he produced that kind of sensational scene which invariably accompanies these proceedings. Now, Sir, all these scenes represent the smaller and meaner side of the Irish agitation; the more tragic side is connected with the objects which these Gentlemen, the hon. Member for North-East Cork and his Friends, have had in view in supporting this agitation. When they found to their dismay and disgust that Ireland was quietening down, that crime was diminishing, that boycotted farms were being taken, they determined to do all that in them lay to put an end to a state of things so disastrous to them and so beneficial to the country. Their instrument was the Plan of Campaign. Now, has the House realized what the Plan of Campaign is? We all know that it is an illegal action, and that high authorities pronounced it to be an immoral action. Has the House realized not only that it is illegal and immoral, but that it is productive of the most disastrous and tragic consequences in every district where it is set up? The Plan of Campaign means something more than an illegal combination among tenants; it means boycotting, it means evictions, it means outrage; it often means, or may often mean, murder. It promotes those scenes at the time of evictions which have been more than once on the very verge of producing bloodshed; and I say that the man who deliberately goes down to a district in order to further the Plan of Campaign and the invariable accompaniment of the Plan of Campaign, boycotting, who preaches it in a district where the Plan does not exist, and where land-grabbers do exist, and where they are known by name—I say that that man makes himself responsible for the crimes that follow from his action. I will take as an example of what I say what occurred at Kerry. In no district in Ireland have the beneficent effects of the Crimes Act been more apparent than in County Kerry. The recrudescence of the agitation of which the hon. Member for North-East Cork is the leading Representative began at the end of September. In the County Kerry, from the 1st of August to the middle of October, the only agrarian crime was one threatening letter. The fiat goes out from the Member for North-East Cork, the whole machinery of agitation is set to work; meetings are held, the Plan of Campaign is preached, the land-grabber is denounced. What is the result? Why, Sir, the result is that from the 14th of October till towards the end of December eleven cases of crime, mostly serious crime, occurred. Killing cattle, maiming cattle, arson in various forms—all these occurred, and undoubtedly were in a large measure owing to the action of these gentlemen.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): Will the right hon. Gentleman give the districts where they occurred?

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: They all occurred in County Kerry.

MR. DILLON: Kerry is an immense county.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

* MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If the hon. Gentleman doubts that there is some connection between the Plan of Campaign and crime, let me remind him that on the 1st of January this year moonlighters went round Lord Kenmare's estate and threatened the tenants that if they did not join the Plan—that peaceful method of adjusting differences between landlords and tenants—they would have to take the consequences. And let the House notice, when they talk of combinations among tenants, that these combinations are never, or hardly ever, the result of the spontaneous action of the tenants themselves. They are hounded on to these proceedings by Gentlemen below the Gangway. Of the four or five gentlemen who were specially engaged in this transaction, not one was a tenant-farmer. One was a journalist, one was an hotel-keeper, one was a shopkeeper in Killarney, and one a draper in Bantry. On the Olphert Estate, the name of which has become faithfully familiar to the ears of hon. Gentlemen, I believe the houses were fortified under the instructions of a stranger, and, in one case at least, they were defended not by the families to be evicted, not by people fighting for their hearths and homes, but by outsiders, brought in for the purpose of carrying on that which is to all intents and purposes an episode in civil war. [An hon. MEMBER: In three cases!] Yes, in three cases. I am obliged to the hon. Gentleman for his reminder. With these facts, what is the use of talking about conciliation? What is the use of stating in your Resolution that what you desire is conciliation, when you (pointing to the Members below the Gangway on the Opposition side of the House) are the people who stop conciliation? You foul the stream and you ask us to give you clear water. Where your baneful influence does not spread there will you find the relations between the people and the police, between landlord and tenant, daily improving. But let some of these successors of the rebels of '98, '48, and '68 come down, and speedily there is a change. Just because their object is not peace, but disorder, they produce war between classes; they produce outrage, riot, boycotting, and that which invariably, in the long run, accompanies boycotting—they produce assassination; and under these circumstances surely it is little better than a mockery for the right hon. Gentleman to come down to this House and tell us we are the people who are to attempt conciliation, when it is the forces of the law, and the law only, which, under difficulties of an unprecedented character, made by you, are still nevertheless, in spite of all you can do, carrying out the beneficent work of conciliation in the most disturbed parts of Ireland. Although I am sorry to say that I have not finished yet, I do not think I need go any more into the case of the hon. Member for North-East Cork, but I must say a word with regard to the version of the imprisonment of Mr. Harrington, the Member for Kerry, which formed so large a part of the right hon. Gentleman's indictment in the country. The right hon. Gentleman has now dropped some of his charges. He boasted in the country that he would support in Parliament the case he then made; but he has not done so. He made a charge of a serious character against the magistrates; he said they had refused to state a case, although the Court of Exchequer declared the point on which a case was stated to be worthy of solemn argument. The right hon. Gentleman is entirely wrong. The matter which the Court of Exchequer declared was one for argument was not the matter brought before the inferior tribunal at all. The right hon. Gentleman owes an apology to Mr. Cecil Roche for making him the object of an accusation which will not bear a single moment's examination.

*MR. JOHN MORLEY: Since the right hon. Gentleman challenges me, I am perfectly prepared to meet him; but I omitted the argument on that point because I thought that it might be much more effectively presented by the hon. and learned Member for Longford. I am prepared to stand by every word I said on that subject, and I am supported by as competent legal authorities as those who advise him.

* MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The right hon. Gentleman is a gentleman of amazing courage. He wishes me to wait and see what is the result of an argument between the hon. and learned Member for Longford and my hon. and learned Friend near me. I cannot deal

[A VOICE: Quote.] I shall not read, and I shall not quote.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I rise to order. I wish to ask whether a statement can be made that I, in the course of my professional duties, insulted a tribunal without advancing some reason for that allegation?

MR. SPEAKER: It is not for me to order any reason to be given; it rests entirely with the right hon. Gentleman.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have not the least desire to hurt the feelings of the hon. Gentleman. [An hon. MEMBER: Quote the words!] I have not the words here, but I recollect them perfectly well, wherein he described Colonel Turner as a sneak. I do not know whether that is language that meets with the approval of the front Opposition bench. The Court held that that was not a decent proceeding, and the hon. and learned Gentleman left the Court.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I did not leave the Court. The right hon. Gentleman will do me the justice to say that I did not leave the Court. I was dragged from the Court. I did not insult the Court. Colonel Turner was not a member of the Court, and it is right that I should state that I said what I did of Colonel Turner under provocation given to me by him the previous night, when I arrived in the town and he shouted out I was a blackguard.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not make any comment upon the explanation the hon. Gentleman has given. At all events the fact remains that he was carried out of Court, and that he produced that kind of sensational scene which invariably accompanies these proceedings. Now, Sir, all these scenes represent the smaller and meaner side of the Irish agitation; the more tragic side is connected with the objects which these Gentlemen, the hon. Member for North-East Cork and his Friends, have had in view in supporting this agitation. When they found to their dismay and disgust that Ireland was quietening down, that crime was diminishing, that boycotted farms were being taken, they determined to do all that in them lay to put an end to a state of things so disastrous to them and so beneficial to the country. Their instrument was the Plan of Campaign. Now, has the Hon. realized what the Plan of Campaign is? We all know that it is an illegal action, and that high authorities pronounced it to be an immoral action. Has the House realized not only that it is illegal and immoral, but that it is productive of the most disastrous and tragic consequences in every district where it is set up? The Plan of Campaign means something more than an illegal combination among tenants; it means boycotting, it means evictions, it means outrage; it often means, or may often mean, murder. It promotes those scenes at the time of evictions which have been more than once on the very verge of producing bloodshed; and I say that the man who deliberately goes down to a district in order to further the Plan of Campaign and the invariable accompaniment of the Plan of Campaign, boycotting, who preaches it in a district where the Plan does not exist, and where land-grabbers do exist, and where they are known by name—I say that that man makes himself responsible for the crimes that follow from his action. I will take as an example of what I say what occurred at Kerry. In no district in Ireland have the beneficent effects of the Crimes Act been more apparent than in County Kerry. The recrudescence of the agitation of which the hon. Member for North-East Cork is the leading Representative began at the end of September. In the County Kerry, from the 1st of August to the middle of October, the only agrarian crime was one threatening letter. The fiat goes out from the Member for North-East Cork, the whole machinery of agitation is set to work; meetings are held, the Plan of Campaign is preached, the land-grabber is denounced. What is the result? Why, Sir, the result is that from the 14th of October till towards the end of December eleven cases of crime, mostly serious crime, occurred. Killing cattle, maiming cattle, arson in various forms—all these occurred, and undoubtedly were in a large measure owing to the action of these gentlemen.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): Will the right hon. Gentleman give the districts where they occurred?

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: They all occurred in County Kerry.

MR. DILLON: Kerry is an immense county.

Mr. A. J. Balf

* MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If the hon. Gentleman doubts that there is some connection between the Plan of Campaign and crime, let me remind him that on the 1st of January this year moonlighters went round Lord Kenmare's estate and threatened the tenants that if they did not join the Plan—that peaceful method of adjusting differences between landlords and tenants—they would have to take the consequences. And let the House notice, when they talk of combinations among tenants, that these combinations are never, or hardly ever, the result of the spontaneous action of the tenants themselves. They are hounded on to these proceedings by Gentlemen below the Gangway. Of the four or five gentlemen who were specially engaged in this transaction, not one was a tenant-farmer. One was a journalist, one was an hotel-keeper, one was a shopkeeper in Killarney, and one a draper in Bantry. On the Olphert Estate, the name of which has become faithfully familiar to the ears of hon. Gentlemen, I believe the houses were fortified under the instructions of a stranger, and, in one case at least, they were defended not by the families to be evicted, not by people fighting for their hearths and homes, but by outsiders, brought in for the purpose of carrying on that which is to all intents and purposes an episode in civil war. [An hon. MEMBER: In three cases!] Yes, in three cases. I am obliged to the hon. Gentleman for his reminder. With these facts, what is the use of talking about conciliation? What is the use of stating in your Resolution that what you desire is conciliation, when you (pointing to the Members below the Gangway on the Opposition side of the House) are the people who stop conciliation? You foul the stream and you ask us to give you clear water. Where your baneful influence does not spread there will you find the relations between the people and the police, between landlord and tenant, daily improving. But let some of these successors of the rebels of '98, '48, and '68 come down, and speedily there is a change. Just because their object is not peace, but disorder, they produce war between classes; they produce outrage, riot, boycotting, and that which invariably, in the long run, accompanies boycotting—they produce assassination; and under these circumstances surely it is little better than a mockery for the right hon. Gentleman to come down to this House and tell us we are the people who are to attempt conciliation, when it is the forces of the law, and the law only, which, under difficulties of an unprecedented character, made by you, are still nevertheless, in spite of all you can do, carrying out the beneficent work of conciliation in the most disturbed parts of Ireland. Although I am sorry to say that I have not finished yet, I do not think I need go any more into the case of the hon. Member for North-East Cork, but I must say a word with regard to the version of the imprisonment of Mr. Harrington, the Member for Kerry, which formed so large a part of the right hon. Gentleman's indictment in the country. The right hon. Gentleman has now dropped some of his charges. He boasted in the country that he would support in Parliament the case he then made; but he has not done so. He made a charge of a serious character against the magistrates; he said they had refused to state a case, although the Court of Exchequer declared the point on which a case was stated to be worthy of solemn argument. The right hon. Gentleman is entirely wrong. The matter which the Court of Exchequer declared was one for argument was not the matter brought before the inferior tribunal at all. The right hon. Gentleman owes an apology to Mr. Cecil Roche for making him the object of an accusation which will not bear a single moment's examination.

* MR. JOHN MORLEY: Since the right hon. Gentleman challenges me, I am perfectly prepared to meet him; but I omitted the argument on that point because I thought that it might be much more effectively presented by the hon. and learned Member for Longford. I am prepared to stand by every word I said on that subject, and I am supported by as competent legal authorities as those who advise him.

* MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The right hon. Gentleman is a gentleman of amazing courage. He wishes me to wait and see what is the result of an argument between the hon. and learned Member for Longford and my hon. and learned Friend near me. I cannot deal with a case which has not been presented. I have stated my argument, and let the hon. Member for Longford refute it when it comes to his turn. The right hon. Gentleman described the action of the magistrates in sentencing Mr. Harrington to six months' imprisonment as monstrously vindictive, but at the same time he abuses the magistrates because they engaged that if Mr. Harrington would promise not to repeat the offence he should not be punished. Those two complaints are not consistent. If the magistrates were as vindictive as the right hon. Gentleman would have us believe, they would not have taken the course of offering to withhold punishment if a pledge were given. Let him choose which accusation he wishes to go upon, and not in the same breath complain of a vindictive sentence and of the offer of a too lenient alternative, if the hon. Member promised not to repeat the offence again. He states that Mr. Harrington was imprisoned on account of the Times' case, and that the sentence was vindictive; but Mr. Harrington had a right of appeal. If he had appealed he would at all events have been at liberty pending the appeal. And if the sentence were vindictive, why did not Mr. Harrington appeal? I hear something said about a County Court Judge, but County Court Judges in Ireland are not open to the charge that they have any connection with the Executive Government. They are as independent as any Judge on the bench in England or Ireland, and they hold by the same sort of tenure. As Mr. Harrington did not appeal, depend upon it the reason was that he knew very well he had committed an offence which the County Court Judge would not have looked on more leniently than did the Court of First Instance. What was that offence? The right hon. Gentleman said that he made a speech at Portsmouth, in which he said that the League and the law were in conflict, and he was in favour of the League. The right hon. Gentleman quoted a part of the Magistrate's speech, but unfortunately only part of it. I notice that the right hon. Gentleman's quotations generally begin too late or end too early; but he has been far exceeded in inaccuracy by the right hon. Member for the Bridgeton Division of Glasgow (Sir G. Trevelyan), who sits near him, for the right hon. Gentleman has stated that Mr. Harrington was condemned for a speech which was declared by the magistrates to be an innocent speech. That is absolutely incorrect, and totally without any kind of foundation. The magistrates never said, and never could have said, anything of the kind.

SIR GEORGE TREVELYAN: I said he was found not guilty.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That is quite a different statement. The right hon. Gentleman stated that the speech of Mr. Harrington was an innocent speech—innocent information given to his constituents. ["No, no!" and "Quote the words!"] I will quote. The right hon. Gentleman said Mr. Harrington had made a speech which the Court pronounced to be a perfectly innocent speech. I say the Court did not pronounce it to be so. On the contrary, the Court distinctly said that such language often led to crime. It is perfectly true the Court did not convict him on that speech. But why? Because the only evidence they had of the speech was a newspaper report, and you require evidence other than that of a newspaper report to convict upon. Mr. Harrington admitted that he made the speech, but the magistrates did not convict him upon the speech itself, not because it did not deserve punishment, but because they did not happen to have the technical and legal proof they required. They convicted him upon the charge of illegal conspiracy.

SIR GEORGE TREVELYAN: Will the right hon. Gentleman allow me to explain what it was I did say? What I stated was that Mr. Harrington was charged with having made a speech in defence of the Plan of Campaign, and the magistrates stated that the evidence did not bear out the charge.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That is not what the right hon. Gentleman stated.

SIR GEORGE TREVELYAN: I may have used the words that they declared him innocent.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The right hon. Gentleman distinctly stated in his letter that Mr. Harrington had been sentenced to six months' hard labour for publishing an innocent speech for the information of his constituents, and that the Court acquitted him of having recommended the Plan of Campaign. I say that this was a wholly erroneous presentation of the facts. The facts are that Mr. Harrington published this speech, which undoubtedly was his, that this speech preached boycotting and the law of the League. It suggested every species of intimidation, and it was made at a meeting of a suppressed branch of the League. He was convicted on that charge. Were the magistrates right or wrong in convicting him? Let me remind you that the object in suppressing the Land League, especially in Kerry, was that it was an instrument of illegal action; it was the instrument of the Plan of Campaign; it was the instrument of boycotting and intimidation. In furtherance of that suppressed organization Mr. Harrington made that speech, in which he powerfully advocated all the objects for which the National League has been suppressed, and that in a suppressed district—in a district where agitation was being carried on by his Colleagues for the same objects, which had been quiet, but which was becoming disturbed, and which undoubtedly, if the Land League had been allowed to revive and carry out the programme which in this very speech Mr. Harrington recommended, would have become as bad in 1889 as it had been before. Is not that a sufficient reason for putting in force the existing law with regard to suppressed branches? Recollect that where Mr. Harrington made this speech, where he tried to revive this suppressed association, was a county where not long ago, at the instance of this very association, Horan and Fitzmaurice had been murdered. If any hon. Gentleman will look at the policy of the Government as a whole, he will see it struggling all through the winter months with a conspiracy, the object of which was to revive all these frightful forms of outrage and intimidation, and he will feel that the Government could have done no less than proceed against Mr. Harrington when he did that which it was openly avowed and boasted of was against the law. When the right hon. Gentleman reproaches us with having suggested that Mr. Harrington should not be punished if he would promise not to offend again, does he not see that the object of law is to prevent crime rather than to punish it, and that there could be no more effectual method of preventing it than by getting Mr. Harrington to promise that he would not again offend? If we could have got that promise, we should have obtained all the advantages which I hope may accrue from his imprisonment without the necessity of having recourse to that unfortunate alternative. I now come to the inaccuracies of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Bridgeton Division, and I call attention to those inaccuracies because inaccuracy of statement is the great difficulty we have to encounter in England. Of course we are accustomed to the amazing exercise of imagination on the part of hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway; but we have some right, I think, to expect a little more accuracy than from one who is an ex-Chief Secretaries to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. In this very letter to which I have alluded, the right hon. Gentleman, in reference to the case of the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Patrick O'Brien), made some of the most astonishing mis-statements. The right hon. Gentleman said—

“ This very month the Member for Monaghan was charged with advising tenants not to buy their holdings under Lord Ashbourne's Act, and was convicted.”

That is the first proposition. That proposition is absolutely erroneous.

SIR GEORGE TREVELYAN: I admit the date is wrong.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: But the right hon. Gentleman mentioned the case with a view to showing what is going on now, and he actually alludes to a case that happened a year ago, and speaks of an hon. Member who is at the present moment in the actual exercise of his liberty.

An hon. MEMBER: For a while only.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Then the right hon. Gentleman went on to say that the hon. Member was sentenced to three months' hard labour. He was not.

SIR GEORGE TREVELYAN: I said distinctly I was informed that the sentence was one of hard labour, but that I had been unable to verify it.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN rose—

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If the hon. Gentleman wishes to interrupt me with regard to part of my argument, let him by all means do so; but I hope the House will notice that I am subjected to an amount of interruption to which hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House never are. I have no objection to the hon. Member making an explanation, if it is relevant; but these interruptions break the thread of my argument.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I only desired to say that I was sentenced to four months' hard labour; but my case, on appeal, came before the only independent County Court Judge in Ireland, and he reduced the sentence to three months as a first-class misdemeanant.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The explanation of the hon. Member is not relevant to my argument. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Bridgeton Division went on to say that the offence of which the hon. Member who has just interrupted me was convicted—and he made this statement twice, in a letter and in a speech—was that he advised the tenants not to purchase under Lord Ashbourne's Act. That statement of the right hon. Gentleman has since been made the subject of severe accusations against the Government. It is not correct. The charge in connection with Lord Ashbourne's Act was withdrawn, and the hon. Member was therefore not convicted of that.

SIR GEORGE TREVELYAN: I say he was found guilty on it.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: He was not found guilty on it.

SIR GEORGE TREVELYAN: I repeat that he was.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That charge was withdrawn, and he was sentenced, not for preaching against Lord Ashbourne's Act at all, but for preaching the Plan of Campaign.

SIR GEORGE TREVELYAN: Will the right hon. Gentleman deny that Mr. Patrick O'Brien was sentenced by the Resident Magistrate on the charge of having made a speech to Lord Monck's tenants, in which he advised them not to purchase under Lord Ashbourne's Act?

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am always glad when the right hon. Gentleman makes an interruption, because—

SIR GEORGE TREVELYAN: Does the right hon. Gentleman deny that the hon. Member was convicted on the charge of having made a speech in which he advised tenants not to purchase under Lord Ashbourne's Act?

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am glad that the right hon. Gentleman has made this interruption, for it reminds me of a favourite method of his and of his Friends. A speech in respect of which a prosecution is brought often contains a variety of matter—some of it is guilty, some innocent, some more guilty, some less guilty. The conviction takes place on the most guilty part of the speech, and then the right hon. Gentleman and his Friends think they are making a fair accusation against the Government when they pick out some part of the speech which is innocent, and allege that the person charged was convicted on account of that part, and that, therefore, it was an unfair conviction. Such is the logic and fairness of hon. Gentlemen opposite. I maintain that the hon. Member for Monaghan was not convicted of having advised tenants not to purchase under Lord Ashbourne's Act. He was convicted of preaching the Plan of Campaign. When I reflect that the right hon. Gentleman must have in his own recollection the kind of misrepresentation to which Irish Secretaries are subjected, when he knows from his own experience the difficulties with which we have to contend, it is melancholy to see the right hon. Gentleman sinking to such depths in order to atone, if possible, for the unpardonable offence of having attempted for two years to administer the government of Ireland with honesty and courage. I have now surveyed all the important points in the indictment the right hon. Gentleman has brought against the Government to-night, and I think we have now the material before us for making some kind of comparison between our policy and that of right hon. Gentlemen opposite. I have stated that in England, Scotland, and Ireland there are 20,000 persons in prison. In Ireland there are only 100 persons in prison under the Crimes Act; and I say that if the object of imprisonment be to prevent crime, never before have such splendid results been achieved at so little cost. You may dislike the Act and the whole system of its administration, but the results can scarcely be denied. Only 100 men are in prison, and not one of these is innocent—indeed, it is made a matter of boast that they are guilty, and have been found guilty by the tribunals of the country. And not one of these men is in prison for a political offence. Not one is in prison for the expression of his opinions, or for agitating for any general change in the government of his country, or for attacks, however violent and unprincipled, against any Member of the Government. Crime and incitement to crime are the only offences that are punished under this Act, and the punishment of crime and incitement to crime has always produced, as far as I know, good effects in every country. And the good effects of the Act are manifest and clear. In spite of the conspiracy—[An hon. MEMBER: Pigott.]—I say, in spite of the conspiracy of which I have said something to-night, Ireland shows every sign of improvement. I will not go over the figures again, which have been already referred to by the right hon. Gentleman, but I hope that every man in the House and in the country will realize that the statistics of agrarian crime and agrarian intimidation show the most marvellous improvement since the Crimes Act has been put in operation. Trade has improved, railway traffic has improved, agriculture has improved. Men are settling down to the business of life, and are beginning to find that there is something more profitable than agitation and turmoil. Good feeling is springing up between different classes of the community wherever hon. Gentlemen opposite will let it, and I think every competent observer will echo the resolution passed by the Dublin Chamber of Commerce—not a body of landlords, or a body specially connected with the agrarian interests of the country—in which they say they attribute a large part of the improvement in the country to the energetic action taken by the Government under the powers given them by the Crimes Act. This is what we have done and are doing, and we are in a position to contrast this with that golden age which will come in when right hon. Gentlemen opposite, instead of being critics of Irish Administration, will have the control of Irish affairs. Then, I suppose, the work of '98, '48, and '68 will be accomplished. I refer to these things because they are always being referred to by hon. Gentlemen, not in their English, but in their Irish speeches. But I feel certain that the men who were engaged in the movements of '98 and '48 would have shrunk from the methods which are being adopted to-day. The right hon. Gentleman has referred to Mr. O'Connell. Mr. O'Connell was not a rebel, and I also believe that if he were living now, patriot as he was, he would have shrunk with horror from the methods adopted by hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway, and approved and condoned by right hon. Gentlemen opposite. Those methods are methods under which no civilized Government can last. They would destroy any State to which they were applied. Under them no man can serve the master he will, no man take the land he will, no man can make the speech he will. I observe that one of the colleagues of the right hon. Gentleman has used every effort in his power to ruin every single individual who came to the Liberal Unionist banquet which was given to me in Dublin a fortnight ago. [An hon. MEMBER: Who gave it?] That is the value which hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway, and, I presume, above the Gangway, really attach to free speech in Ireland. Now, Sir, I call this slavery. To you (pointing to the Opposition) I understand it seems like freedom, and I admit that freedom of a kind is given by it. There is the freedom of every debtor to compound on his own terms with his creditors; there is the freedom of every citizen to decide what portion of the law he may think it worth his while to obey, and what portion of that law he is, in the elegant language of hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway, to trample and to spit upon—it is the liberty of every criminal to decide what sentence he shall suffer when the tribunals of the country have declared him to be guilty. Well, Sir, if these are principles now preached by hon. Gentlemen above the Gangway and practised by hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway, I ask what is to be the future of Ireland when the happy day comes in which the constituencies will reverse their decision, and the right hon. Gentleman, instead of criticizing the Government of Ireland, has to conduct it? I do not know what the full consequence of that action will be, but I know that never yet in the history of the world have agriculture and commerce flourished under a system so absolutely subversive says he was not jesting. I find the right hon. Gentleman addressing a very favourable audience, provoking laughter by his references to the historic breeches of Mr. O'Brien. He, amidst roars of laughter, described Mr. O'Brien as having been for 36 hours naked in his cell. Unless this denial had been made, and unless it had been accepted, I should have asserted that this incident of provoking laughter at the expense of a prisoner was one of the most deplorable incidents in a most deplorable business. Let us imagine any Judge of the High Court of Justice, who in the discharge of his duty had found it necessary to imprison any person brought before him, not only forgetting the dignity due to himself, but so utterly forgetting what is due to the dignity of his position and his office, as to stand up and provoke laughter by his description of the privations and hardships of the men for whose imprisonment he was responsible. I think such an incident, to use the words of the Amendment of my right hon. Friend, can only be viewed with "reprobation and with aversion," and I venture to think it is in that spirit that this policy of Her Majesty's Government is being viewed by the majority of the people; and, you may depend upon it, it will continue to be so viewed. It is no answer for the right hon. Gentleman to scoff at another policy, which we think a wiser policy; which we think a more peaceful policy, and which we think, in the words of the Amendment, "much more likely to bring about a true union between the people of this country."

MR. A. BLANE (Armagh, S.): I cannot allow this occasion to pass without saying something in contradiction of the statements made by the Chief Secretary. He seems to suggest to this House that the Irish Members who are put in prison are treated just as are any other men who have broken the law. Now this is not the case. He does not speak from experience, and I do speak from experience. I remember being 23 weeks in a cell, 9 feet by 8 feet, at a period of the year when the weather was as cold as it is now, and many of my hon. colleagues occupied cells of similar size. When it is cold in London and snowing very hard, you who are outside the prison walls feel it considerably, but you have very little sympathy with those men in prison who have been guilty of nothing except that they sought too well to defend their constituents. We who are sitting on these benches endeavour to defend our people, perhaps too roughly and too rudely, but still we do so honestly, if we have not the polish of University men such as some of those hon. Gentlemen who sit opposite may have, and who come to this House for ornamental and not for useful purposes. Now, I remember being taken before two magistrates with reference to an estate in Donegal owned by a man named Olphert, the same estate as that on which District Inspector Martin has lost his life. I deplore that loss of life as much as anybody. I suppose it injures our Party quite as much as any other, but we are not accountable for it, and I think it necessary that in this House some explanation should be given of our conduct. I was invited to go down to the Olphert Estate from my own constituency as a arbitrator, and I endeavoured to adjust the differences between the landlord and his tenants. At that time the Land Commissioners were giving reductions of 5s. 6d. and 6s. 6d. in the pound. I offered an adjustment on the basis of a 4s. 6d. reduction, and I think it was a most reasonable offer. This estate has from time to time been before Commissions and Committees of this House. It is the very estate for which I got six months' imprisonment; it is the estate for which Father M'Fadden got six months' imprisonment; it is the estate for which Father Stephens got three months; and it is for matters connected with the same estate that Father Stephens was re-arrested yesterday on coming out of church. The Solicitor General for Ireland last Session said this was a model estate, and that Mr. Olphert was a good landlord, who resided on his estate. But what is the description of a good landlord as gathered from the Report of one of the Select Committees, which some years ago inquired into the grievances of these tenants? One of the witnesses stated that he himself resided on this estate, and he knew that the people were not sufficiently clothed; that they had not sufficient dress for the purposes of decency; the dresses of the women were so short that they did not reach down to their knees, and their necks, arms, and breasts were bare. A question was put to this witness, "Was it such clothing as modest women would wish to wear?" and he replied, "No; it was not." "These people," he added, "were ashamed to go out of their houses." This, Sir, is a description of the destitute condition into which these people were driven. Another witness was asked, "Do your people use seaweed as an article of food?" The answer was, "Yes, with Indian meal." The majority of the people have only one meal a day. In addition to all these hardships, the people are subjected to a sort of slavery which is called "duty work." A witness was asked what duty days meant, and his reply was that the people were pledged to do duty days—that was, to give three days' work at certain periods of the year, or to pay half-a-crown in money in lieu thereof. Another witness was asked if he saw people, and he replied that he made a house-to-house visitation. He was asked if the clothing of the inhabitants was sufficient for the purposes of decency, and he gave it as his opinion that it was not.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir E. CLARKE): What is the date?

MR. BLANE: Thirty years ago; but it is the same now. I recently made a house-to-house visitation, and found exactly the same state of affairs prevailing. Charity was dispensed by Relief Committees, but the money was scarcely in their hands before the landlord pulled it out again. To be sure, the duty work has to some extent come to an end, but the result of the grinding system still exists. I and others have been imprisoned for the action we have taken in the hope of ameliorating the condition of these people, but it by no means follows that on that account we shall cease to defend the people. Father M'Fadden did his best to adjust the differences between landlord and tenants. He was always a valuable man to the landlord, as long as he could get charitable people to hand in money for relief. It was only when it was seen that he would not apply for any more, because he saw the robbery which was going on, that he was arrested and sentenced to six months' imprisonment. Part of the evidence given against me was a speech made by Father M'Fadden. The rev. gentleman enjoined patience, but advised the people to stick to their combination. To do that I hold he had a perfect right. My case, however, really turned upon the meaning of the Celtic word "Chiferma," the equivalent of which in English is, "I hope" or "I expect." It was argued that the word was used by me as a person in command to persons supposed to obey, and that it amounted to an inducement under the Coercion Act. Neither of the magistrates understood a word of the Celtic language, and yet they convicted me. I only mention this circumstance for the purpose of showing how absurdly the Crimes Act tribunals work. What happened in the case of the arrest of Father M'Fadden? There were plenty of police in the district who might have been used, but one police officer was anxious to distinguish himself. He drew his sword, and proceeded to the arrest of Father M'Fadden, whose offence, if offence it was at all, was a misdemeanour and not a felony. That was not a proper way to proceed against a man such as Father M'Fadden. The mere drawing of the sword and wielding it over the priest's head was a threat. I deplore the death of the constable, but surely it cannot be laid at the door of Father M'Fadden. What do the Government intend to do in respect to the case? They intend to change the venue. The Solicitor General for Ireland has already made an application to the Judges of the Superior Courts for the change of the venue to Fermanagh, in which county the prisoners will not have the slightest chance of obtaining justice. Every Catholic who steps forward to the jury box will be challenged and told to stand aside. You will empanel 12 Orangemen. You will beat the drum ecclesiastic against Father M'Fadden and his fellow-prisoners. All the dishonourable ways of government in Ireland will be resorted to, and Father M'Fadden will assuredly be deprived of every opportunity of showing what he has done in defence of his people. I cannot conceive anything more disreputable than the treatment Father M'Fadden has received at the hands of the present Government.

MR. SYDNEY GEDGE (Stockport): I am sorry to have such a limited audience, but it is quite clear the debate must proceed, and I will address my remarks and opposition to the Amendment. Complaint was made by the hon. and learned Member opposite that the Chief Secretary has said very little indeed on the subject of the Amendment, but I do not think the hon. and learned Member himself said anything more or did more than to pick out and endeavour to answer small points in the Chief Secretary's speech. A great many small complaints have been made of the administration of the law by the Chief Secretary, but it seems to me most of these complaints should rather be made against the law than against the Administration. They are out of date; they would have been all very well two years ago, but they are out of date after the Act has been passed by large majorities in this Assembly, and with only one division in the House of Lords. It seems to me it would be very little use indeed to give votes to the large majority of Her Majesty's male subjects, and then ignore their Representatives here, who declare, by emphatic majorities, it is necessary to pass a law and do pass a law to effect certain objects. It is little use, I say, conferring these votes at all, if the minority is not only to be disgusted with their position, as indeed minorities generally are, but are to go about in a manner Parliamentary minorities never did before in the history of this country to render the working and enforcement of the law passed by the majority well-nigh impossible. In former times, when it was thought necessary by the majority who sustained the Ministry—majorities too, not so large as support the present Government, and not returned on anything like such a popular basis—when it was thought necessary to pass certain legislation, it was the honour, duty, and glory of Her Majesty's Opposition to support the Government in the maintenance of the law even though they disapproved of the law itself. But it has been reserved for the Opposition led by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian to do their utmost to make the administration of the law impossible. All we hear—all these dramatic scenes we have had performed—have had this object. All this has been done by leaders of the Liberal party, whose experience should have taught them their line of duty, who may at some future time—long distant, I hope—be again in office and entrusted with the administration of law. We have been told by the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite that no reforms have taken place except by first breaking the law, but he and I have read history very differently. I could point to reform after reform brought about not by breaking the law, but because the sense of the nation acknowledged the necessity. I will not deny that there may be circumstances when it would be politic to break the law in order to call attention to its badness, but then let it be done with real courage, in a dignified manner, in a way to call public attention to what you are doing, and show you are acting from principle and not from petulance, and take your punishment like a man, and not like a woman in a quarrel. According to the new doctrine promulgated, the motives of a man are to be considered in apportioning his punishment, together with his position in life, and knowledge. After all, what do we mean by enforcing the law? We have heard a good deal about coercion. I was not fortunate enough to hear the whole of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, but I heard him say that not one man in fifty on our side of the House had gained his seat without giving pledges to his constituents against coercion. Well, though I may be the only man in the whole number, I can speak with a clear conscience, for the first time I went among my constituents I told them I was in favour of coercing anybody and any set of people who break the law; and I cannot conceive how law can exist without it. Law and coercion are correlative terms; coercion is simply an enforcement of the law in England or in Ireland, and the only question is whether the law is unfairly or unjustly enforced in Ireland. A great authority on the subject has told us in a letter written ten days ago—a letter read at the great meeting at Edinburgh, where Lord Rosebery was the principal speaker—I allude to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian—in answering the question "Why are these gentlemen, Irish Members and others who have been committed to prison for breaking the laws, political prisoners," that it was—

"Because the Tories and Dissident Liberals thought fit, under the pretence of legislating against crime, to pass a law making that which previously had no concern with any crime, except this which the Act itself creates, in making Irishmen liable to jail—"

I don't know quite what this means but the right hon. Gentleman is a master of the English language and can explain—

"for acts of exclusive dealing or for encouraging the same in others, which exclusive dealing is practised at will by Tories in England. What is a crime in Ireland is no crime in England."

Later on the same letter says "that what Mr. O'Brien threatened to do in Ireland the Primrose dames can do in England." The statement is that ten years ago a law was passed making that a crime in Ireland which is not a crime in England. There is a noble Lord, an ex-Lord Chancellor, who has been Attorney General under the right hon. Gentleman—Lord Selborne—who fortunately spoke in the debate on Thursday night, and it would have been well if the right hon. Gentleman who, with all his knowledge and talents, is no lawyer, had consulted Lord Selborne as to the meaning and effect of the Act commonly called the Crimes Act, 1887. That noble and learned Lord showed very distinctly indeed that no new crime whatever was created by that Act, and that what is unlawful in Ireland is unlawful in England. What this Act did was this—it applied to acts already illegal both in Ireland and England a new procedure, under which two magistrates should try certain cases, instead of such offences being sent before a jury. No doubt, certain offences are described as crimes against this Act. That is only for matters of procedure. No new crime was created. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will, in the interest of truth, consult his tried and sometime trusted colleague before he commits himself to such another statement, and will be prepared to recant what he has said about crimes being created by this Act. Then he says the offence called boycotting is something quite innocent: it is only exclusive dealing as practised by Tories and Primrose dames in England! That is a remarkable statement, coming from the right hon. Gentleman; for do we not remember that at one time, when it was his duty to administer the law, he spoke in the severest terms against boycotting as ultimately resting upon and sanctioning murder? Its character has not changed; it still means murder, unless the strong arm of the law intervenes. What at the very outside is the exclusive dealing of Primrose dames? It is practised equally by Radicals. A man naturally makes his purchases, if the articles are good and cheap ceteris paribus, of the dealer who has the same views with himself on religious and political matters. That is human nature. But can you point to any case where through exclusive dealing of Tories or Primrose dames any one was unable to buy the necessaries of life, having the means to do so? The fact of A buying from X instead of Y is a very different thing from a combination of A, B, C, D, and so on, to prevent a man buying, and shopkeepers from selling to that man, under a system of boycotting enforced by dread of murder. We know perfectly well how it has been carried out to the extent of preventing food being bought for a child or a coffin to bury one. The right hon. Gentleman having all the facts before him, tries to persuade an incredulous and mocking country that this is no more than the exclusive dealing practised by Primrose dames! If Primrose dames or Tories did the same thing there are plenty of people ready to prosecute them for it. I never knew Radicals unwilling to make an outcry against a Tory who did anything of which they did not approve. If Lord Salisbury is suspected of not giving a site for the erection of a building by a Dissenting body, there is at once a clamour in the Radical papers. If such things have been going on all this time, why have they not been exposed to an indignant public? I am sure Tories or members of the Primrose League would be the first to throw stones at anyone who brought disgrace on their cause by such conduct. Boycotting is such an innocent thing, says the right hon. Gentleman, although in olden times it was so horrible, it led up to murder. I am reminded of Sheridan's "Rivals." It will be remembered that Lydia Languish gets literature from the circulating library, not of the most select character, and hastily puts the books out of view on the approach of Mrs. Malaprop, Sir Anthony Absolute directing her maid to "Put the 'Innocent Adultery' into the 'Whole Duty of Man.'" The right hon. Gentleman includes "Innocent Boycotting" into the "Whole duty of Irishmen;" but I disagree with him. We are informed in the Queen's Speech that the operation of the law has had a salutary effect, and it appears boycotting is likely to be put down; and, considering this as a challenge, the Opposition advance this Amendment. Well, I do not think this is a very strong remark to put into a Queen's Speech. I can remember the time when the right hon. Gentleman opposite boasted of the salutary effect of his legislation on Ireland, but I am afraid the results have not realised expectations. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle is moved to wrath, and does not think it right the Speech should claim any salutary effect for the Act, and challenges us to declare that the administration of the Act has been harsh and unjust, that it violates the rights, and alienates the affections, of Her Majesty's Irish subjects, and is viewed with reprobation and aversion by the people of Great Britain. I did not hear the whole of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, but I do not understand that he showed what rights had been violated, though he said much of affections alienated. But what part of Her Majesty's Irish subjects have been alienated in affection? Not, certainly, those Protestants and Catholics so ably represented at that large meeting to which the Chief Secretary has alluded; not, certainly, the affections of loyal men in different parts of the Island. Those are alienated who were alienated long ago, who had no affection whatever left when the Government came into office, and went about protesting their intention to effect a final separation. I will not use the quotations I have here, but it is well known there were no affections to alienate on the part of those who had determined to do away with every link of connection between the countries but that of nominal sovereignty. Nevertheless, we are told that Irishmen, who three years ago had no affection for this country, who then used the most unmeasured terms of abuse towards Her Majesty's Ministers, terms I think not equalled by those to which the present Government have been subjected—we are told by the right hon. Gentleman, who, with Christian forgiveness, forgot all this abuse, that in consequence of what they have been doing these men are coming round to love and admiration for England. That is a little inconsistent with the Amendment, which further declares that the administration of the Act is received with reprobation by the people of Great Britain. Nine tailors of Tooley Street once had an idea that they represented the people of England, and I do not know that nine or ten ex-Members have a better founded claim to represent the people of Great Britain. I find when I go down to my constituency that nine-tenths of the working men who collect in large audiences to hear what I and my colleagues have to say, sympathise entirely with Her Majesty's Government. I am quite aware there is a small number outside whose sympathies are the other way, but I am not able to discover that three years ago they held any other view, or have been moved to reprobation and aversion by the administration of Her Majesty's Government. The Amendment asks that such measures of conciliation may be adopted as will bring about the contentment of the Irish people and a real union between Great Britain and Ireland. Well, to my mind a deed of separation is not the best way to produce a union between a couple who have not loved one another before. If the Government have been unable to carry measures of conciliation that will improve the material condition of the people of Ireland, the obstruction of hon. Gentlemen opposite accounts for the fact. If hon. Members will look at the complaints made against the Irish Executive they will find that they all arise from the laudable desire of the Government to combine as far as possible with the exercise of their necessary and stern duty a regard for the views of hon. Gentlemen on the Opposition benches. Hon. Gentlemen opposite are jealous of the success of the Government and do all they can to defeat their attempts at conciliation. We have been asked to express our dissatisfaction with the Government because of the manner in which they have administered the law; we have been told of the delay in prosecutions; we have been told of the folly of arresting Father M'Fadden on Sunday just after his service; we have been told that, although the Chief Secretary gave no order for the arrest of this priest, on the doctrine of constructive liability he must be held answerable; we have been told that Mr. Carew ought to have been arrested a great deal sooner if he was to be arrested at all; we have been told that Father M'Fadden, or the other priest arrested before him, ought not to have been allowed to wear his own clothes, or, at all events, if he was allowed to do so, Mr. O'Brien ought to have been allowed to wear his. As I say, all these troubles of the Government arise from the fact that they have endeavoured to satisfy hon. Gentlemen opposite. Why was there delay in the arrest of Mr. O'Brien? It was because the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House announced last Session that he would do his utmost not to interfere with the power of hon. Members to attend the House; and then, as the House will remember, the question of contempt of court arose in connection with the Commission of Inquiry, and it was necessary that Mr. O'Brien should attend the Court, and consequently it was not possible to arrest him. That was the reason of the long delay. The action that was taken last Session, involving the loss of two nights with regard to the Breach of Privilege question, entirely arose from the desire of the Government to give notice to hon. Gentlemen who were proceeded against by way of summons instead of issuing a warrant form. All these things have resulted from the endeavour of the Government to grant concessions and to meet the views of the Irish Members. If they had gone on doing their duty sternly and plainly without attempting to meet the views of hon. Gentlemen opposite, they would not have been so much found fault with. The hon. Gentleman who spoke last but one was rather severe on the Chief Secretary, on the ground that he had taken up, as he said, two inconsistent positions with regard to his powers as to the management of the Irish Prisons, and the hon. Member quoted two Acts of Parliament to show that the Home Secretary in England and the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant in Ireland have the power of controlling and managing the prisons, but he did not show, as he ought to have done, that all these powers are subject to a general controlling Act of 1865, and that that Act constitutes Prisons Boards and lays down distinct regulations, within which the Home Secretary and the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant are bound to act. I confess that the Chief Secretary strained the law almost to the point of breaking when he allowed Roman Catholic priests to wear their clothes in gaol. But he did that with a good motive, and it ill lies in the mouths of Roman Catholic Gentlemen opposite to say that because the right hon. Gentleman strained the law in regard to those particular persons, therefore he ought to strain the law in order that the same thing may be done in the case of Mr. O'Brien. I desire to give that hon. Member credit for not playing the part of a child. I suppose he really has an idea that he is standing up for a principle when he will not get into a second class carriage, and insists upon not wearing prison clothes. I am not disposed to think that these prisoners ought to be treated differently from other people who commit the same crimes; because we are not dealing here with merely political offences, with sedition, and offences of that kind. We are dealing with acts that are offences against the law, quite irrespective of the motive with which they are committed, and the only thing that makes these Gentlemen political prisoners, or gives them the semblance of being political prisoners, is that their ultimate motive is said to be a desire to change the law. But, as the greatest crime against a State is the attempt to subvert it, the punishment of these Gentlemen ought to be heavier rather than lighter; for their conduct is provoked by no accidental ebullition of temper, but with the avowed desire of bringing the law into contempt. And why should so much sympathy be extended to the hon. Member for North East Cork? Surely a high-souled patriot who talks as the hon. Member does might submit even to the indignities of which he complains without making so much fuss. The hon. Member would go further if he dared. He is like the boy with the wooden sword, who is boasting of the great deeds he will do, when, while flourishing his weapon, he scratches his hand on a nail, and then begins to whimper. The hon. Member is quite willing, if he dared, to lead thousands in the field, but to have his hair cut short is a brutal indignity about the "Whole duty of Irishmen;" but I disagree with him. We are informed in the Queen's Speech that the operation of the law has had a salutary effect, and it appears boycotting is likely to be put down; and, considering this as a challenge, the Opposition advance this Amendment. Member is quite willing, if he dared, to lead thousands in the field, but to have his hair cut short is a brutal indignity about this law, the mode in which it has been administered has deprived it of all title to respect. What I complain of is that the Government, in the action they have taken, have loaded the dice, and have placed in the hands of the owners of land the power of suppressing lawful combinations among the tenants, with the object of forcing the price of land above its natural level, under ordinary circumstances. And what is the conduct and character of the men with whom the administration of the law rests in Ireland? In my judgment the administration is open to the gravest animadversion and censure. All of us are familiar with the way in which it is administered. In February last I troubled the House with an account of the way in which the Executive Officers in close relation with the Government have selected particular magistrates to try particular cases. The Chief Secretary on that occasion refused to give the information I asked for, but through the kindness of a friend I obtained the particulars, and if any hon. Member will do the same he will find that the cases tried by Mr. Cecil Roche, Mr. Hodder, Captain Segrave and others, have been out of proportion to those which have been tried by other resident magistrates. No doubt there is a reason for that. In regard to Captain Segrave, the Solicitor General for Ireland has stated that an investigation, promised by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in this House, on December 22, is now going on. Well, but the statements made by the honourable Member for Mid Cork (Dr. Tanner), if they are correct—I do not for a moment assume that they are—but if they be correct they prove that this man at the time he was administering the law was nothing more nor less than a common thief. If any such charges as those which had been made by the hon. Member for Mid Cork against Captain Segrave had been made against a stipendiary or any unpaid magistrate in this country, the Lord Chancellor would not have allowed him to exercise his functions for a single day until he had cleared himself from them. I maintain that immediately these charges were made against Captain Segrave, the Chief Secretary ought to have telegraphed to Ireland to relieve him of his judicial functions, pending a full investigation. By the first mail home from South Africa the case ought to have been complete. It is monstrous that a man over whose head such serious charges were hanging should be allowed to continue the administration of justice.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): Let me remind the hon. Member that in reply to his question this afternoon I stated that, pending the investigation and since its commencement, Captain Segrave has not been exercising the functions of a magistrate.

*MR. J. E. ELLIS: The hon. and learned Gentleman says—"Since the investigation commenced." Am I to understand that Captain Segrave has not exercised the functions of Resident Magistrate in any respect since the 22nd of December last?

MR. MADDEN: I am unable to state the particular date, but the investigation commenced immediately after attention was called to the matter in the House by the Lord Mayor of Dublin (Mr. Sexton). It is still proceeding, and during its prosecution Captain Segrave has not been exercising the functions of a magistrate.

*MR. J. E. ELLIS: I accept the hon. and learned Gentleman's explanation; but my information goes to show he has been exercising his functions since the charges were made in this House. I do not now want to pin the right hon. Gentleman to any particular date, but I shall wait with anxiety to see the investigation concluded, as it no doubt will be before long, the charges having been made over two months ago in this House. I take Captain Segrave as an illustration of the character of the men who have been entrusted with the administration of the Crimes Act in Ireland. I will now turn for a moment to another incident upon which I asked a question this evening; and as it is illustrative of the state of Ireland, it is necessary that I should trouble the House with full particulars. The House will remember that I asked a question with respect to the action of a certain Mr. Hodder, a Resident Magistrate in the town of Ennis, in connection with the meeting there to protest against the prison treatment of Mr. O'Brien, and the reply of the Solicitor General was to the effect that the circumstances and details of the question were by no means correct. I interposed, and asked the hon. and learned Gentleman whether he had obtained his information from the incriminated person, and his only reply was that he had obtained his information from the usual sources. I entirely agree with the right hon. Member for Newcastle that in these matters the last person to learn the truth is the Chief Secretary, especially when he goes to what he calls the usual sources of information. I hold in my hand a communication from the Chairman of the meeting stating that he and others who went to hire the Temperance Hall for the purpose of holding a meeting to express the feeling of the people there as to the treatment of Mr. O'Brien were followed and obstructed by the police, and on their going to the barracks to complain of the conduct of the police, Mr. Hodder said he would not allow a meeting to be held to denounce the conduct of any high officials of the Government, and that those were his instructions. According to this account, the instructions of the Chief Secretary were that no meeting should be held at which speeches were made or resolutions proposed condemning high Government officials. The writer of the letter replied to Mr. Hodder that it would be impossible to hold any meeting and comply with the instructions he had received. At this Mr. Hodder expressed his intention to be present at the meeting, and that if anything occurred which he deemed improper he would call on it to disperse. The meeting assembled; a body of police, 20 in number, entered the hall with Mr. Hodder, who demanded to see the resolutions that were to be proposed. They were handed to him, and, having glanced at them, he said that the resolutions were illegal, and constituted the meeting an unlawful assembly, and therefore he gave five minutes for its dispersal, and ordered the police to clear the hall. The Derbyshire Regiment was in the square outside, drawn up ready for action. The resolution that Mr. Hodder would not allow to be proposed was a protest against the inhuman treatment of Mr. O'Brien, and it did not challenge the conduct of any high officials by name. The fact that Mr. Hodder would not allow the resolution to be put to the meeting is not denied by the Solicitor General. All he said was that the account given in any question of the conversation was inaccurate. Now, the resolutions are these—

“First, that we, the Nationalists of Ennis, in public meeting assembled, protest with all our hearts against the inhuman treatment practised on Mr. William O'Brien, M.P., in Clonmel prison. Our feelings are so strongly agitated that we find it difficult to express what is surging within us at the barbarities to which Mr. O'Brien has been subjected have, to our mind, no parallel in the history of civilized Government. If this system of torture is continued we fear for the ensuing consequences in our country—a country scourged as it has been for centuries with the lash of oppression.

“Second, that if the professed sympathy of the English Democracy is sincere, we think the time has now come for united and determined and settled action on their part. That course is made perfectly clear by the treatment of Mr. O'Brien in Clonmel Gaol, and we call upon them at once to put into practice their professions of friendship to the Irish people.”

I am informed that these were the only resolutions proposed, and I ask the House what is the sort of Government of a country when the respectable people of Ennis cannot meet together in their temperance hall without an armed force of police constabulary traversing the town and putting an end to meetings in an arbitrary manner? It is a good illustration of the manner in which Ireland is being governed at the present time. The right hon. Gentleman did not think it beneath his dignity or his high office when at Dublin to deliver an extraordinary harangue to the Irish constabulary—a force of armed men—representing as if they were engaged in warfare with their fellow countrymen. That speech was unworthy to be addressed to an armed force of the kind by a Minister of the Crown. What is the effect of that course? I will give one illustration. We have heard a great deal about the expenses of the Special Commission, which will, of course, be enormous. Subscriptions were set on foot for hon. Members involved in the Charges and Allegations, and this has been interfered with by the Government. The facts are these, supplied to me by one of Her Majesty's Queen's Counsel, an authority altogether beyond dispute:—“The occurrence took place at Tiboline, French-park, Co. Roscommon, on Sunday, 19th December last. Subscriptions to the National Indemnity Fund were invited by a number of the most respectable men in the parish, who met in the chapel yard of Tiboline, and appointed a man out of each townland to apprise the people of their own townstead that subscriptions would be received at the chapel gate. No posters or handbills were issued, so that nothing appears to have been published of an exciting or inflammatory character. The National League had been suppressed in the locality, but the subscriptions were invited quite independently of the League or its organization. The only element they had in common was that Mr. Thomas Morris Roe, who acted as secretary to the fund on the occasion, happened to be also assistant secretary of the branch of the League established in the parish. The meetings of the League were never held at the Chapel of Tiboline, but at the village away from it. On the 9th of December a table was placed outside the gate of the chapel yard, against one of the pillars of the gate, and Thomas Morris Roe attended there to receive subscriptions, having the lists ready to fill up, and containing the names of some who had already subscribed, including the parish priest and the curate. Two constables from Frenchpark, named McGlaughlin and Burns, came up and demanded to know what the collection was for, and being told that it was for the Mutual Indemnity Fund, replied that the money should not be collected in a proclaimed district for any purpose. They got the lists from Roe, and kept them, and he refused to return them, the only satisfaction they would give being that when asked for them they said they would send them to Roe 'from the right quarter.' Roe at first refused to desist from collecting, but after a time left the table and went into the chapel to attend Mass. When he came out the constables were still there, and when he resumed the collection they took the names of those who subscribed, and ultimately Burns called out to McGlaughlin that the people were holding a meeting and that they had a right to disperse them. At this point the people were showing signs of irritation, and Roe told them to go home, which they did. One of my informants states that the constables collared and jostled the people who were coming up with their subscriptions, and finally threatened to use their batons, and that one of them actually drew his baton.

Mr. J. E. Ellis

These are substantially the facts so far as they have come to my knowledge." I ask, again, what can be the state of a country where constables can prevent subscriptions for any purpose whatever in a proclaimed district? I say nothing of the incredible meanness of this kind of thing. While you are asking the House for sums of money for this conspiracy which is being unmasked, your myrmidons in Ireland are preventing the collections which the poor peasantry of Ireland, out of their scanty earnings, are sending over to help their countrymen to fight their battles against you. It is like a strong man fighting a cripple; it is meanness to the depth of which one should have supposed no English Government would ever have descended. This is the system of which the Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney) said that in Ireland we find, "working from end to end a great system of justice and equality." The Prime Minister, in "another place," said that the people of Ireland were coming round to the side of the Government. Why, he knows very well that if a General Election occurred in Ireland to-morrow, the system of the Government would be condemned. The hon. Member for North Tyrone has acknowledged more than once that he would lose his seat.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (from below the Ministerial Gangway): I never made any such acknowledgment, and that fact is as reliable as most of the facts I have heard to-night.

*MR. ELLIS: I am very glad to see the hon. Gentleman taking his seat on the other side of the House, and some other hon. Gentlemen and right hon. Gentlemen might with advantage follow him. I believe I am perfectly right in saying that the hon. Gentleman admitted Mr. O'Brien would win his seat.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: No.

*MR. ELLIS: Of course, I accept the hon. Gentleman's statement. The Government has no mandate to govern Ireland as they are doing, as certain hon. Members have found in addressing their constituents recently. I will not refer to "Vote for Weymouth and no Coercion," nor to "Colomb and no Coercion." I will not refer even to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who promised a great deal of decentralization in Ireland;

I will not even dwell upon the President of the Board of Trade, who goes to his constituents and utters, more or less, platitudes about reform of the Government of Ireland, though evidently he is not able to carry them in the Cabinet; nor would I refer to the hon. Lord (Hartington) who, as the hon. Member for West Leeds said on the 15th February last, when face to face with his constituents, promised reforms of the Government of Ireland. I turn, Mr. Speaker, to the hon. Gentleman who occupies the distinguished position of the Chairman of this House. I hope I shall speak with that courtesy and respect which is due to one who fulfils so high a position, though it is not in that capacity I shall speak of him. I have carefully examined the speeches of the right hon. Gentleman on platforms to his constituents, and elsewhere, and I find they are in sharp contrast with his position in this House,—conduct which goes to the root of the representative character of this House. In his Election Address, dated 12th June, 1886, he says:—

“It is for the people to decide, and the judgment of the people will soon be declared at the polls. I trust it will be unequivocal in its resolution to maintain our Parliament, under which English, Scotch, and Irish may, without discrimination enjoy equal guarantees of liberty and justice. In Ireland, as in Great Britain, local self-government should and must be established.”

I ask the right hon. Gentleman, in all seriousness, what steps he has taken in this House to make good those words. He had an opportunity on the 25th April last year, on the Bill of the hon. Member whose absence we all regret, when the noble Lord, in a straightforward and manly way, washed his hands of all responsibility, and declared for simultaneity and similarity of Local Government for the two countries, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Courtney) did not speak on that occasion; I will not say he ran away from the division, but he did not record his vote. I now turn to another illustration of the same thing. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney) made some rather strong assertions in a speech addressed to his constituents on the 14th October, 1887, in regard to the Mitchelstown affray. I will read to the House an extract from that speech. The right hon. Gentleman said on that occasion, after detailing the circumstances of the case:—

“The circumstances are very grave, and must be examined into and examined into in a very different way, and under different guarantees and securities from the way in which they were examined into at the Coroner's inquest. You must have a regular inquiry, and I await that inquiry, and I intend to suspend my judgment until that inquiry is fully and fairly held. It is impossible that justice can be satisfied without a full and impartial inquiry. The mind—I won't say of Ireland alone, but the mind of England and Scotland—the mind of Great Britain will not be satisfied without a complete and thorough inquiry. The Government would not be justified in attempting to prevent such an inquiry. It must be held, and I think we may go to the length of saying that it shall be held, because otherwise the Government will be accepting every accusation which, in the absence of an inquiry, would be levelled against them; but until that is done I am content in this matter to lay down the principle under which I think the thing should be judged. You must determine the action of the police to be innocent or culpable, according to the circumstances of each case. [A VOICE: The Government don't want to know more.] But we must make the Government know more. [A VOICE: But you won't.] Yes, but we will. [“No you won't.”] Well, we shall see. It is a very hazardous thing to pronounce upon what people will do in the future. I think my Friend had better abstain from saying what I will do until he sees what I have done.”

These words were uttered on the 14th October, 1887, and I think that not only the constituents of the right hon. Gentleman, but we who sit in this House, are entitled to see what the right hon. Gentleman has since done in the matter. These are only illustrations of what I consider, with all respect to the right hon. Gentleman's great and glaring divergencies between his utterances on the platform and his conduct in this House; and here I may state that this is not a personal matter. I should be ashamed to make it one. I have always been treated by the right hon. Gentleman with uniform courtesy; but this is a point which, in my judgment, touches the character of this House as a representative assembly. It was said more than a century ago, by the first William Pitt, before he became Lord Chatham:—

“If the country cannot place confidence in the promises and pledges of their representatives the power and authority of this House must fall.”

I agree with this, and also with that very strong sentence which fell from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle (Mr. Morley), when he said the whole history of your Administration of Ireland—the way in which you obtained power, and the way in which you are keeping it—is a gross Parliamentary fraud. My mind and the minds of those I represent are made up on this subject. They and I fully agree with one other sentence which fell from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Liskeard, in which he said the settlement of the question of the Government of Ireland was the great question of the present century. I have always thought it might be a long struggle, and have felt certain it would be a great one. Upon one other matter I desire to speak the minds of those I am sent here to represent. They desire me to oppose with vigour and persistence and by every legitimate means this ridiculous competition into which Her Majesty's Government has invited us, in the Queen's Speech, to enter against the great military nations of Europe; at the end of which, in my judgment, lies the Wolseley-cum-Chamberlain scheme of universal conscription. My constituents care nothing about the catalogue of sham proposals put forward by the Government. They believe that the settlement of this Question of the Government of Ireland is a vital and pressing matter. Relying not only on our principles, but on our mandate from the country, we feel perfectly sure that a clear and resolute policy such as ours is certain of ultimate success. People are too apt to look at the incidents of a great struggle, and to dwell on each particular, rather than mark the whole stream and tendency of things, and this great stream we say is in the direction which we, the Liberal Party, believe to be right. During the first 30 years of this century, both Houses of Parliament were breaking the Act of Union by taking from the Irish people the securities they had possessed. During the next 35 years there were some fitful gleams of light, for in the five years from 1835 to 1840, there was in Ireland under the administration of one of the most extraordinary men ever sent over to that country by us—the late Mr. Thomas Drummond—there was something like a time of just and fair government. During the last 30 years, mainly under the guidance of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid-Lothian (Mr. Gladstone), we have been making great strides in the direction of justice. At the present moment there is a temporary reaction. The rump of the old Ascendancy Party, so well represented now by the hon. Member for North Armagh (Colonel Saunderson) and the hon. Member for South Tyrone (T. W. Russell) think they have found their man. Well, I would say that, if great dialectical skill, literary culture, and absolute indifference to the sufferings of humanity, so far as appears from his public conduct, go for anything, the right hon. Gentleman is eminently qualified to fill the position of the leader and defender of that particular section. We have no desire to enter into competition with the Party opposite in the system they are applying to the administration of Ireland. The Government need no longer fear any rivalry from the Liberal Party in the matter of coercion. We have abandoned all that and have found a more excellent way, which is by reposing that faith in the people which alone can give a sure foundation or strength to the Executive. We believe that power and responsibility must be joined. We look with sympathy on the efforts made by the great Leader of the Irish Nationalist Party to win the Irish people from unconstitutional methods. We sympathize with the sufferings of our Irish fellow-subjects, and we wish the hon. Member for Cork Godspeed in his endeavours. As far as we ourselves are concerned, we will never cease in the exertions we are making to secure a settlement of this question until we have helped him and the other hon. Gentlemen who have come across the Irish Sea with him to bring about what we ask in the words of the prayer used when we assemble together, namely, that which will tend to the uniting and knitting together of the hearts of the people of these realms, so that at the end of the nineteenth century we may see accomplished a true and real and lasting union between the people of Great Britain and Ireland.

Gentleman who has just sat down. I cannot think I have been so wholly wanting in my duties as a representative as the hon. Member has endeavoured to make out. The hon. Gentleman has referred to three illustrations, which he doubtless supposed were the most striking he could bring forward with regard to what he represents as my political tergiversation. He has referred to what I said in 1887 in regard to the Mitchelstown occurrence. On that occasion, speaking to my constituents, I stated that that was a very grave matter, and I thought it ought to be made the subject of an inquiry, and I was then certainly under the very strong impression that, considering what had been said in regard to that matter, the Leaders of the Opposition would have taken the course of moving for the issue of a Royal Commission, or some sort of independent Commission, to inquire into the whole business. Had such a Motion been made at that time, or in the following Session, I should have given it my support. I will further say I still regret that no such Motion was made, and that I expressed my astonishment and surprise that none of the leading members of the Liberal Party had thought fit to adopt such a course. I think that this Motion for an independent inquiry ought to have been pressed. I regret that it was not, and, although it has been overlayed by subsequent events, I still express my regret it was not moved for. Whenever the administration of the Government of Ireland is discussed in this House two totally adverse statements are made. Hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway on the Opposition side of the House make statements which are too frequently marked by palpable exaggeration so as not to command our confidence, and on the other side, statements are often made by the Chief Secretary and other members of the Government based upon the reports of persons who are incriminated. Why, then, when you have got a case of a serious character, which requires impartial investigation, do you not follow up the declarations which are made in the country by coming to the House and taking the Parliamentary course of moving for an inquiry?

MR. J. E. ELLIS: We will.

MR. COURTNEY: The hon. Member says "We will."

MR. J. E. ELLIS: I adopt the right hon. Gentleman's words.

MR. COURTNEY: Oh, yes. When I said "We will," I spoke with complete confidence, not I admit justified by what has since happened, that the responsible leaders of the Opposition would make the motion, which I for one would have supported. I do not see why we should not arrive at some method of getting more exactly at the facts, and abandon the process, which is extremely exciting to the popular imagination, of holding adverse meetings in huge halls, giving rise to great declamation on one side and great declamation on the other. Have you not got a prima facie case on which to found a Motion for such an inquiry?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Where are we to get the facts?

MR. COURTNEY: If my right hon. Friend pleads inability to make any such Motion, I think he underrates his own powers. The next accusation made against me was with reference to declarations in my Election Address at the last General Election, that I thought local self-government must be given to Ireland. I have been for years in favour of extending local self-government to that country. I stated in my Election Address that I was of opinion that this was even more called for than was an extension of local government for England. I think so still, but I know the limits of Parliamentary power. I am very well aware, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Lothian must be, that it was impossible to carry a Local Government Bill for the three countries during one Session. I was quite confident last year that it would be impossible to carry a complete Local Government Bill for England, and the result proved that I was right. It is all very well for those who have no responsibility to say that the Bill should have been wider in its scope. The Opposition always says so, while those on the Government bench, knowing the limits of their own power, always reply, "We go as far as we can." I think that the impartial judgment of the future with respect to last Session of Parliament will be that the Local Government Bill for England and Wales did go as far as the capacity of Parliament would allow. My right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle has said often and often that the Bill is imperfect because it does not deal with district councils, and with local and and parochial matters. But he has answered himself. Very recently he commented on the slight attention that was paid to the London Government clauses. Is not this a confession that the Bill, even in its restricted and limited form, was too much to receive the close attention of the House of Commons? I would remind the hon. Member for the Rushcliffe Division of Nottingham that in the discussion on the second reading of the Local Government Bill for England, I protested against an indefinite postponement of the Irish Local Government Bill; and I will now say that if an attempt be made to indefinitely postpone that measure, I for one will not be silent. Perhaps, as I am referring to this subject, I may repeat something I said in the country. It had been said that a Local Government Bill could not be introduced so long as Ireland is in a disturbed condition. My answer to that is that Ireland as a whole is not disturbed. Why should we refuse local government to those parts which are quiet? I would suggest that a Bill should be introduced and made directly applicable to those parts which are at rest; or else that it should be applied to the whole of Ireland. power being taken to suspend its operation in any particular spot where its provisions are abused, just as Boards of Guardians are suspended. A Bill safeguarded in this way is asked for by the loyal and Unionist population [a laugh]. The hon. Member may laugh, but I would refer him to the "Northern Whig" which makes the demand.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, East): Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will allow me to explain that I laughed at the suggestion that only Unionists in Ireland were to be allowed to carry on Local Government.

MR. COURTNEY: If the hon. Member gathered that view then, indeed, I expressed myself very imperfectly. The third point made by the hon. Member for the Rushcliff Division was a reference to what I said the other day at Oxford, and I am glad he referred to it for it enables me to restate it correctly. I have not the exact words, but the substance is that I recognized in Ireland a great system working of equity and justice; and it is supposed that I was satisfied therewith. This is an error. I recapitulated in detail the many drawbacks and shortcomings of the situation; and then I added that looking at Ireland as a whole I saw there, I believed that there prevailed in that country a great system working for equity and justice. I did not confound the Church Militant with the Church Triumphant; and I never suggested that Ireland showed us the Church Triumphant. But the system is waiting for right, and I uphold the present Government in its policy in Ireland, because, in spite of the imperfections of their agents—the Ministers who are responsible for the Administration of the country are perfectly conscious of those imperfections—in spite of the imperfections of the agents through whom it is necessary to work, and in spite of enormous difficulties, much aggravated by the attitude taken up by political parties in England, I believe that there is in Ireland a system working for equity and freedom, and an ever increasing attempt to give Ireland the same guarantee of independence as England possesses. Hon. Members below the Gangway do not show their capacity for establishing a Parliament in Ireland, nor their self-command by the manner in which they receive this expression of opinion. As far as I am concerned, I shall continue to do all I can to promote a system working for those ends, which I believe can only be secured by the maintenance of the one Parliament for the United Kingdom.

SIR HORACE DAVEY (Stockton): I am sure that no one who knows my right hon. Friend the Member for Liskeard can suppose for one moment that he is not capable of having the courage of his opinions. I am very glad to hear that the right hon. Gentleman still holds that an inquiry into what occurred at Mitchelstown was necessary, and I only hope that we may have his assistance and that of his Friends on future Divisions when questions of a similar kind come before the House. Now I should like to ask what was meant by salutary effects? If I could detect any improvement, such as was alleged, in the pacification of Ireland, I should be the first to congratulate Her Majesty's Government, but it is exactly because the Administration of Ireland has, in our opinion, been of quite the contrary effect, because we believe it has been irritating and exasperating, and tending to widen the alienation between the people of this country and the people of Ireland, that we could not allow the passage in question in the Address in answer to the gracious Speech from the Throne to pass without a word of protest from our side. The House ought to have had some information, documents, papers, statistics, from which it could form some opinion before it was asked to join in an expression of opinion such as that proposed. Able and interesting as was the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, it appeared to me that in many respects he failed to meet the point made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, and that in some points he actually conceded the indictment against him. I ask the Government whether they think the storm of indignation which has been aroused by the personal indignities which have been inflicted upon certain Members is a salutary result of the administration of Irish affairs by them. At the bottom of this agitation I cannot help suspecting that there is a vague but a growing sense among the people that some of these Gentlemen, at least, have not been fairly treated, and that they are the subjects even of persecution, if not by, at least, with the assistance of, the Government; and in my opinion that vague but growing sense, which is gradually forming itself and seeking expression, is a factor in the political situation which the Government will have to deal with. I accept the statement, as I would accept any statement made by the Chief Secretary in the House, that the care and management of prisons is not within his department, but I ask the right hon. Gentleman, as the representative of the Executive Government in this House, to exercise the powers which are vested in the Lord Lieutenant under the 4th section of the Prisons Act of 1877. Why, it might be asked should the Government interfere in this case, and why should directions be given? It is because, it appears to me, that this is a matter of policy. I will assume, for the purpose of argument, that Mr. O'Brien, Mr. E. Harrington, and Mr. Oarew have been rightly convicted of offences under the Crimes Act. Sir, I do not care to discuss the question whether prisoners thus convicted can be properly termed political offenders. That is to my mind a question of a more or less academic character. But it cannot be questioned that the offences of which they have been convicted have directly arisen out of the political controversies of the day conducted in this House and outside this House, and that the Gentlemen against whom the powers of the Crimes Act are set in force are the political and Parliamentary opponents of the Government. I agree, Sir, with the right hon. Gentleman that the law should be no respecter of persons. I would never say anything to the contrary. But it seems to me, Sir, that this question should be dealt with as a question of expediency—a question of policy. What would be the course of a wise Government in a case such as this? I venture to submit, Sir, that a wise Government in administering the law would have regard to the ends for which the punishment is inflicted and to its effect, not only upon the offender himself, but on the people amongst whom the law is to be administered. Is it wise, prudent, or statesmanlike to attach the personal indignities which have been spoken of to these particular offenders? Is it not calculated rather to weaken respect for the law than to strengthen it? Will it not rather retard and postpone any permanent establishment of order? Is it desirable to encourage this state of things? This seems to me to be the real issue of this question, the issue which, I understand, my right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle tenders to the House. If, as I believe, the Executive Government of Ireland has the most ample power of relieving these Gentlemen from these indignities, I beg of them to assure the House that the power will be exercised with some regard to public opinion, not, Sir, because public opinion is entitled to override the law—I do not wish it to be understood that I would say anything of the kind—but because, in my opinion, the effect of punishment is marred, and the true end of punishment is missed if punishment is accompanied with incidents which shock the public conscience. If you inflict punishment with incidents which shock public opinion and the public conscience, you are more likely to create a sympathy with those who break the law than with the law itself. If the Chief Secretary desires some justification or desires some reason for exercising the discretion which, in my opinion, the Government has in this matter, I will take the liberty of referring him again to the 49th section of the Prisons Act, 1879, which prescribes "That every prisoner under sentence inflicted on conviction for sedition or seditious libel shall be treated as a misdemeanant of the first division." A great many of the prisoners who have been convicted would, if there were no Crimes Act, and if they were tried in the ordinary way—in a constitutional way, and in the way in which they ought to be tried, namely, by judge and jury, be tried for sedition or seditious libel, and if they were so tried and convicted, they would be entitled to be treated as misdemeanants of the first class. I will not incur the right hon. Gentleman's criticism by saying anything about what he has called the distinguished man or the popular man argument. Although it is entitled to very considerable weight, it is an argument which is not conclusive. It is entitled to very considerable weight for the reason which I have just mentioned, namely, that the infliction of these personal indignities upon men who are so much respected, and so much beloved by a large majority of their countrymen, and have earned the respectful admiration of a great many people in England and Scotland, is calculated to increase the alienation of the people from the law. There are at present 22 Members of the House who are either in prison [An hon. MEMBER: 25]—25 Members either in prison or out on bail awaiting the result of appeals. Who are they? They are men who have been sent up to this House in obedience to Her Majesty's writ, to serve in Parliament as representatives of counties and boroughs in Ireland. They are men whose votes in this House might at any time determine the fate of a Ministry on the most momentous issues of Imperial policy, even the issues of war and peace. Do hon. Members opposite think that when these Gentlemen come out of prison they will be less respected or admired by the majority of their countrymen? Do you not rather think that the infliction of these personal indignities will be an additional title on their part to the confidence, respect, and affection of the people; and, if so, I venture to say, as a mere matter of policy or expediency, it is neither wise nor statesmanlike to unnecessarily inflict these indignities

upon these Gentlemen. The only object of inflicting personal indignities upon prisoners is to mark the moral degradation to which they have sunk. But if it ceases to have that effect then it becomes inexpedient and impolitic. The right hon. Gentleman spoke of the success which has attended the Crimes Act. I was very much surprised to hear the right hon. Gentleman quote in this House the Report of some anonymous barrister of what has been said by some Judge on some occasion in some case without any context whatever. I hardly think the House will be disposed to accept the Report of the anonymous barrister even on the right hon. Gentleman's guarantee. But the right hon. Gentleman went beyond that; he gave some statistics which seem more fallacious than figures usually are. He told us that of the ordinary Civil cases which come before Courts of Appeal 26½ per cent. succeed. Well, I know something about appeals, and I was surprised to hear that the average was not higher. I would have expected that it would be about 50 per cent. Under the Crimes Act it appears that the successful appeals are only 8 per cent.; but having regard to the nature of these cases, which turn not so much on questions of law, but on questions of fact, I wonder that the percentage is even so high. The House must remember that it is in the smaller cases, in which sentences of one month only are inflicted that the greatest injustice is done under the Crimes Act, these being cases in which there is no appeal. The right hon. Gentleman said that juries convicted in a larger number of cases than magistrates. I have no doubt that is so, and simply because those who have charge of prosecutions are not quite so ready to bring cases before the test of a jury as they are to bring them before the resident magistrates, from whom it is presumably more easy to obtain convictions. The right hon. Gentleman also stated that no one alleges that the prisoners convicted are not all rightly convicted. But that is an entire misapprehension. Owing to the difficulty of obtaining any certain information from the inadequate reports in the newspapers, and the great difficulty of obtaining the detailed facts of any case, it is not easy to point to any individual case and assert that in that case there has been a wrongful conviction. I would be no party to attacking any decision of a tribunal unless I was quite sure of my facts. Nevertheless, I cannot acquiesce in the optimistic view of the Chief Secretary that all the convictions are legally justified. I will tell the House where the cases under the Crimes Act seem to me to be most faulty. I had not the honour of a seat in the House when the Act was passed, but the great defect, the great blot in the system introduced by the Act seemed to me to be that it left to persons of insufficient training and legal experience the adjudication on two branches of law of so elastic and ill-defined a character as the law of conspiracy and the law relating to unlawful assembly. Cases of this kind are peculiarly fitted to be tried by juries, and I do not think that any jury would find shopkeepers who combined together guilty of conspiracy because they refused to supply a person with goods which, in fact, he did not require, and only asked for so as to make a case for prosecution. There was one circumstance about the Milltown Malbay cases which threw a lurid light upon the administration of the Crimes Act, and that was that the police were employed by the Divisional Magistrate for the purpose of creating offences. I admit that since the decision in the Killeagh case there has been a great improvement in the way in which Resident Magistrates have dealt with this question. This is no doubt a salutary result; but it is due, not to the action of the Government in administering the Statutes, but to the course adopted by the hon. Member for Longford, in bringing the case before the superior Courts. The right hon. Gentleman asks the House to believe that all the convictions under the Crimes Act are right. Let me say a word or two with reference to the crime of unlawful assembly. It appears to me that in Ireland, whenever two or three people meet together, they form an unlawful assembly. In one case some people who had collected round a bonfire were dispersed by the police as an unlawful assembly. Perhaps the most remarkable case which has come under my notice occurred at Waterford, and was reported in the Freeman's Journal. A charge of intimidation was preferred against 14 persons in a Court held under the provisions of the Crimes Act. Evidence was given that the defendants and a crowd stopped opposite the house of a man named Power, and shouted "Grabber." Power declined to give evidence, declaring that he had suffered more from the police than the people. Thirteen of the defendants were acquitted; but the fourteenth was convicted, and sentenced to one month's imprisonment. It is new to me that one man out of 14 can constitute an unlawful assembly or a riot. Perhaps some explanation may be given of the extraordinary cases mentioned by the hon. Member for the Rushcliffe Division (Mr. J. E. Ellis). Certainly if such cases occurred in Ireland, they are a gross abuse of the law. In my opinion, the constant irritating interference of the police is calculated to weaken, rather than to strengthen, respect for the law and respect for the people who administer it. I do not hesitate to say that Ireland is one of the most—perhaps the most—police-ridden countries in Europe; and, therefore, I ask whether we are justified in addressing Her Majesty in language of gratulation respecting the state of the country. In his observations upon the Gweedore case and the murder of District Inspector Martin, the Chief Secretary seemed a little to miss the point of my right hon. Friend's remarks. The Chief Secretary said there was a grievous error of judgment committed by those who had charge of the police in the locality in not having a sufficient body of men present at the arrest of Father M'Fadden. But that was not the point of my right hon. Friend's observations. The Chief Secretary did not answer the question "Who gave the order to arrest Father M'Fadden on Sunday as he came from the celebration of Mass?" The point of the case, the light it shows on the tact and judgment of those who have the administration of the law in Ireland seems to me to lie in this, the mistake made—to put it at its least—in arresting a popular, a beloved priest just when he had taken off his vestments on leaving the altar, in the midst of an excited congregation leaving chapel. It is unnecessary for me to say that I do not excuse or palliate for a moment the brutal murder of District Inspector Martin; and I am quite sure the Leaders of the Nationalist Party in Ireland can only regard a deplorable incident of this kind as calculated to do grave injury to the cause they are agitating for. But I do say that whoever it was who was

strong sentence which fell from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle (Mr. Morley), when he said the whole history of your Administration of Ireland—the way in which you obtained power, and the way in which you are keeping it—is a gross Parliamentary fraud. My mind and the minds of those I represent are made up on this subject. They and I fully agree with one other sentence which fell from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Liskeard, in which he said the settlement of the question of the Government of Ireland was the great question of the present century. I have always thought it might be a long struggle, and have felt certain it would be a great one. Upon one other matter I desire to speak the minds of those I am sent here to represent. They desire me to oppose with vigour and persistence and by every legitimate means this ridiculous competition into which Her Majesty's Government has invited us, in the Queen's Speech, to enter against the great military nations of Europe; at the end of which, in my judgment, lies the Wolseley-cum-Chamberlain scheme of universal conscription. My constituents care nothing about the catalogue of sham proposals put forward by the Government. They believe that the settlement of this Question of the Government of Ireland is a vital and pressing matter. Relying not only on our principles, but on our mandate from the country, we feel perfectly sure that a clear and resolute policy such as ours is certain of ultimate success. People are too apt to look at the incidents of a great struggle, and to dwell on each particular, rather than mark the whole stream and tendency of things, and this great stream we say is in the direction which we, the Liberal Party, believe to be right. During the first 30 years of this century, both Houses of Parliament were breaking the Act of Union by taking from the Irish people the securities they had possessed. During the next 35 years there were some fitful gleams of light, for in the five years from 1835 to 1840, there was in Ireland under the administration of one of the most extraordinary men ever sent over to that country by us—the late Mr. Thomas Drummond—there was something like a time of just and fair government. During the last 30 years, mainly under the guidance of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid-Lothian (Mr. Gladstone), we have been making great strides in the direction of justice. At the present moment there is a temporary reaction. The rump of the old Ascendancy Party, so well represented now by the hon. Member for North Armagh (Colonel Saunderson) and the hon. Member for South Tyrone (T. W. Russell) think they have found their man. Well, I would say that, if great dialectical skill, literary culture, and absolute indifference to the sufferings of humanity, so far as appears from his public conduct, go for anything, the right hon. Gentleman is eminently qualified to fill the position of the leader and defender of that particular section. We have no desire to enter into competition with the Party opposite in the system they are applying to the administration of Ireland. The Government need no longer fear any rivalry from the Liberal Party in the matter of coercion. We have abandoned all that and have found a more excellent way, which is by reposing that faith in the people which alone can give a sure foundation or strength to the Executive. We believe that power and responsibility must be joined. We look with sympathy on the efforts made by the great Leader of the Irish Nationalist Party to win the Irish people from unconstitutional methods. We sympathize with the sufferings of our Irish fellow-subjects, and we wish the hon. Member for Cork Godspeed in his endeavours. As far as we ourselves are concerned, we will never cease in the exertions we are making to secure a settlement of this question until we have helped him and the other hon. Gentlemen who have come across the Irish Sea with him to bring about what we ask in the words of the prayer used when we assemble together, namely, that which will tend to the uniting and knitting together of the hearts of the people of these realms, so that at the end of the nineteenth century we may see accomplished a true and real and lasting union between the people of Great Britain and Ireland.

Gentleman who has just sat down. I cannot think I have been so wholly wanting in my duties as a representative as the hon. Member has endeavoured to make out. The hon. Gentleman has referred to three illustrations, which he doubtless supposed were the most striking he could bring forward with regard to what he represents as my political tergiversation. He has referred to what I said in 1887 in regard to the Mitchelstown occurrence. On that occasion, speaking to my constituents, I stated that that was a very grave matter, and I thought it ought to be made the subject of an inquiry, and I was then certainly under the very strong impression that, considering what had been said in regard to that matter, the Leaders of the Opposition would have taken the course of moving for the issue of a Royal Commission, or some sort of independent Commission, to inquire into the whole business. Had such a Motion been made at that time, or in the following Session, I should have given it my support. I will further say I still regret that no such Motion was made, and that I expressed my astonishment and surprise that none of the leading members of the Liberal Party had thought fit to adopt such a course. I think that this Motion for an independent inquiry ought to have been pressed. I regret that it was not, and, although it has been overlayed by subsequent events, I still express my regret it was not moved for. Whenever the administration of the Government of Ireland is discussed in this House two totally adverse statements are made. Hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway on the Opposition side of the House make statements which are too frequently marked by palpable exaggeration so as not to command our confidence, and on the other side, statements are often made by the Chief Secretary and other members of the Government based upon the reports of persons who are incriminated. Why, then, when you have got a case of a serious character, which requires impartial investigation, do you not follow up the declarations which are made in the country by coming to the House and taking the Parliamentary course of moving for an inquiry?

MR. J. E. ELLIS: We will.

MR. COURTNEY: The hon. Member says "We will."

MR. J. E. ELLIS: I adopt the right hon. Gentleman's words.

MR. COURTNEY: Oh, yes. When I said "We will," I spoke with complete confidence, not I admit justified by what has since happened, that the responsible leaders of the Opposition would make the motion, which I for one would have supported. I do not see why we should not arrive at some method of getting more exactly at the facts, and abandon the process, which is extremely exciting to the popular imagination, of holding adverse meetings in huge halls, giving rise to great declamation on one side and great declamation on the other. Have you not got a prima facie case on which to found a Motion for such an inquiry?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Where are we to get the facts?

MR. COURTNEY: If my right hon. Friend pleads inability to make any such Motion, I think he underrates his own powers. The next accusation made against me was with reference to declarations in my Election Address at the last General Election, that I thought local self-government must be given to Ireland. I have been for years in favour of extending local self-government to that country. I stated in my Election Address that I was of opinion that this was even more called for than was an extension of local government for England. I think so still, but I know the limits of Parliamentary power. I am very well aware, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Lothian must be, that it was impossible to carry a Local Government Bill for the three countries during one Session. I was quite confident last year that it would be impossible to carry a complete Local Government Bill for England, and the result proved that I was right. It is all very well for those who have no responsibility to say that the Bill should have been wider in its scope. The Opposition always says so, while those on the Government bench, knowing the limits of their own power, always reply, "We go as far as we can." I think that the impartial judgment of the future with respect to last Session of Parliament will be that the Local Government Bill for England and Wales did go as far as the capacity of Parliament would allow. My right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle has said often and often that the Bill is my opinion, the Government has in this matter, I will take the liberty of referring him again to the 49th section of the Prisons Act, 1879, which prescribes "That every prisoner under sentence inflicted on conviction for sedition or seditious libel shall be treated as a misdemeanant of the first division." A great many of the prisoners who have been convicted would, if there were no Crimes Act, and if they were tried in the ordinary way—in a constitutional way, and in the way in which they ought to be tried, namely, by judge and jury, be tried for sedition or seditious libel, and if they were so tried and convicted, they would be entitled to be treated as misdemeanants of the first class. I will not incur the right hon. Gentleman's criticism by saying anything about what he has called the distinguished man or the popular man argument. Although it is entitled to very considerable weight, it is an argument which is not conclusive. It is entitled to very considerable weight for the reason which I have just mentioned, namely, that the infliction of these personal indignities upon men who are so much respected, and so much beloved by a large majority of their countrymen, and have earned the respectful admiration of a great many people in England and Scotland, is calculated to increase the alienation of the people from the law. There are at present 22 Members of the House who are either in prison [An hon. MEMBER: 25]—25 Members either in prison or out on bail awaiting the result of appeals. Who are they? They are men who have been sent up to this House in obedience to Her Majesty's writ, to serve in Parliament as representatives of counties and boroughs in Ireland. They are men whose votes in this House might at any time determine the fate of a Ministry on the most momentous issues of Imperial policy, even the issues of war and peace. Do hon. Members opposite think that when these Gentlemen come out of prison they will be less respected or admired by the majority of their countrymen? Do you not rather think that the infliction of these personal indignities will be an additional title on their part to the confidence, respect, and affection of the people; and, if so, I venture to say, as a mere matter of policy or expediency, it is neither wise nor statesmanlike to unnecessarily inflict these indignities

upon these Gentlemen. The only object of inflicting personal indignities upon prisoners is to mark the moral degradation to which they have sunk. But if it ceases to have that effect then it becomes inexpedient and impolitic. The right hon. Gentleman spoke of the success which has attended the Crimes Act. I was very much surprised to hear the right hon. Gentleman quote in this House the Report of some anonymous barrister of what has been said by some Judge on some occasion in some case without any context whatever. I hardly think the House will be disposed to accept the Report of the anonymous barrister even on the right hon. Gentleman's guarantee. But the right hon. Gentleman went beyond that; he gave some statistics which seem more fallacious than figures usually are. He told us that of the ordinary Civil cases which come before Courts of Appeal 26½ per cent. succeed. Well, I know something about appeals, and I was surprised to hear that the average was not higher. I would have expected that it would be about 50 per cent. Under the Crimes Act it appears that the successful appeals are only 8 per cent.; but having regard to the nature of these cases, which turn not so much on questions of law, but on questions of fact, I wonder that the percentage is even so high. The House must remember that it is in the smaller cases, in which sentences of one month only are inflicted that the greatest injustice is done under the Crimes Act, these being cases in which there is no appeal. The right hon. Gentleman said that juries convicted in a larger number of cases than magistrates. I have no doubt that is so, and simply because those who have charge of prosecutions are not quite so ready to bring cases before the test of a jury as they are to bring them before the resident magistrates, from whom it is presumably more easy to obtain convictions. The right hon. Gentleman also stated that no one alleges that the prisoners convicted are not all rightly convicted. But that is an entire misapprehension. Owing to the difficulty of obtaining any certain information from the inadequate reports in the newspapers, and the great difficulty of obtaining the detailed facts of any case, it is not easy to point to any individual case and assert that in that case there has been a wrongful conviction. I would be no party to attacking any decision of a tribunal unless I was quite sure of my facts. Nevertheless, I cannot acquiesce in the optimistic view of the Chief Secretary that all the convictions are legally justified. I will tell the House where the cases under the Crimes Act seem to me to be most faulty. I had not the honour of a seat in the House when the Act was passed, but the great defect, the great blot in the system introduced by the Act seemed to me to be that it left to persons of insufficient training and legal experience the adjudication on two branches of law of so elastic and ill-defined a character as the law of conspiracy and the law relating to unlawful assembly. Cases of this kind are peculiarly fitted to be tried by juries, and I do not think that any jury would find shopkeepers who combined together guilty of conspiracy because they refused to supply a person with goods which, in fact, he did not require, and only asked for so as to make a case for prosecution. There was one circumstance about the Milltown Malbay cases which threw a lurid light upon the administration of the Crimes Act, and that was that the police were employed by the Divisional Magistrate for the purpose of creating offences. I admit that since the decision in the Killeagh case there has been a great improvement in the way in which Resident Magistrates have dealt with this question. This is no doubt a salutary result; but it is due, not to the action of the Government in administering the Statutes, but to the course adopted by the hon. Member for Longford, in bringing the case before the superior Courts. The right hon. Gentleman asks the House to believe that all the convictions under the Crimes Act are right. Let me say a word or two with reference to the crime of unlawful assembly. It appears to me that in Ireland, whenever two or three people meet together, they form an unlawful assembly. In one case some people who had collected round a bonfire were dispersed by the police as an unlawful assembly. Perhaps the most remarkable case which has come under my notice occurred at Waterford, and was reported in the Freeman's Journal. A charge of intimidation was preferred against 14 persons in a Court held under the provisions of the Crimes Act. Evidence was given that the defendants and a crowd stopped opposite the house of a man named Power, and shouted "Grabber." Power declined to give evidence, declaring that he had suffered more from the police than the people. Thirteen of the defendants were acquitted; but the fourteenth was convicted, and sentenced to one month's imprisonment. It is new to me that one man out of 14 can constitute an unlawful assembly or a riot. Perhaps some explanation may be given of the extraordinary cases mentioned by the hon. Member for the Rushcliffe Division (Mr. J. E. Ellis). Certainly if such cases occurred in Ireland, they are a gross abuse of the law. In my opinion, the constant irritating interference of the police is calculated to weaken, rather than to strengthen, respect for the law and respect for the people who administer it. I do not hesitate to say that Ireland is one of the most—perhaps the most—police-ridden countries in Europe; and, therefore, I ask whether we are justified in addressing Her Majesty in language of gratulation respecting the state of the country. In his observations upon the Gweedore case and the murder of District Inspector Martin, the Chief Secretary seemed a little to miss the point of my right hon. Friend's remarks. The Chief Secretary said there was a grievous error of judgment committed by those who had charge of the police in the locality in not having a sufficient body of men present at the arrest of Father M'Fadden. But that was not the point of my right hon. Friend's observations. The Chief Secretary did not answer the question "Who gave the order to arrest Father M'Fadden on Sunday as he came from the celebration of Mass?" The point of the case, the light it shows on the tact and judgment of those who have the administration of the law in Ireland seems to me to lie in this, the mistake made—to put it at its least—in arresting a popular, a beloved priest just when he had taken off his vestments on leaving the altar, in the midst of an excited congregation leaving chapel. It is unnecessary for me to say that I do not excuse or palliate for a moment the brutal murder of District Inspector Martin; and I am quite sure the Leaders of the Nationalist Party in Ireland can only regard a deplorable incident of this kind as calculated to do grave injury to the cause they are agitating for. But I do say that whoever it was who was assure the noble Lord that there will be no delay whatever in bringing it forward; it will be presented to the House the moment it is out of the draftsman's office. I fear it is impossible for me to name any exact day under the circumstances, but I hope that by the week after next the Bill will be in a proper state to be brought forward in your Lordships' House.

House adjourned at a quarter before Five o'clock, to Thursday next, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 26th February, 1889.

POLICE AND SANITARY REGULATIONS.

Ordered, That the Committee of Selection do appoint a Committee, not exceeding nine Members, to whom shall be referred all Private Bills promoted by Municipal and other Local Authorities, by which it is proposed to create powers relating to police and sanitary regulations which deviate from, or are in extension of, or are repugnant to, the general law.

Ordered, That Standing Order 173A be applicable to all Bills referred to the said Committee.

Ordered, That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

Ordered, That Five be the quorum of the Committee.—(Mr. Stuart-Wortley.)

QUESTIONS.

CONSOLS AND REDUCED.

SIR J. LUBBOCK (London University): I beg to ask the Chancellor of Exchequer, with reference to the announcement in the Queen's Speech as regards Consols and Reduced, whether it is proposed to convert the whole at the expiration of the notice—namely, on the 6th of July; or, if not, what course it is intended to pursue?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER: Yes, Sir; it is the intention of the Government that the whole amount of Three per Cent. Consols and Reduced outstanding shall either be paid off or converted at the expiration of the notice.

INDIA—NUTHOO WILSON.

MR. C. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) asked the Under Secretary of State for India whether the Secretary of State has yet received any information as to the case of Nuthoo Wilson, now a prisoner at Tehri Gurwhal; and, whether he can lay upon the Table the Report on the case of Nuthoo Wilson, recently made by Mr. Reed, Commissioner at Kumaon?

THE UNDER SECRETARY FOR INDIA (Sir J. E. GORST) (Chatham): The Secretary of State has called for a Report, but there has not yet been sufficient time for its arrival.

THE NEW MAGAZINE RIFLE.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether any, and if any, how many, patents for inventions adopted in the new magazine rifle, stand in the names of Government officials, or servants, and how many in the names of other persons; whether he has made full inquiry into the validity of these patents, especially those standing in the names of persons not in the Government service; and, whether any sum has been decided upon as the price or acknowledgment to be paid for the several patents; and, if so, what is the amount in each case?

MR. E. STANHOPE: There are alleged patents connected with parts of the new magazine rifle. A very full inquiry as to their validity will be made before any question of payment or compensation for rights under them will be considered. At present I do not admit that there are any patents connected with parts of the new rifle which give anyone a claim to compensation.

MR. HANBURY: Is it not the fact that the War Office made application to the Treasury to pay the sum of very nearly £60,000?

MR. E. STANHOPE: No; certainly not.

IRELAND—THE CROWN WITNESS CULLINANE.

MR. COX (Clare, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant whether Cullinane, the informer, is still in the employment of the Government in Ireland; and, if so, whether facilities will be given to the solicitor for the defence at the Special Commission to have a subpoena served on that person?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Assuming that this question relates to the witness who gave evidence against the murderers of Head Constable Whelehan, the man neither was nor is in the employment of the Government in Ireland.

MR. COX: Did this man not swear, both at the investigation at Ennis and at the trial at Wicklow, that he was for years in the pay of the Government?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have given the information I have obtained, and I believe it is correct. If the hon. Gentleman has any doubt in the matter, and will repeat his Question another day, I will endeavour to answer it.

MR. COX: Certainly, I will repeat it.

THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY.

MR. H. J. WILSON (York, W. R., Holmfirth): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant by what means, in the absence of distinguishing numbers, a member of the Royal Irish Constabulary, who may be wanted as a witness or defendant in legal proceedings, can be identified; whether any instructions exist requiring the men and officers of the constabulary to give assistance in the identification of members of that body for the purpose of such proceedings; and whether there is any objection to the English practice in regard to distinguishing numbers being introduced among the Irish Constabulary?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Inspector General of the Royal Irish Constabulary reports, with regard to paragraphs 1 and 2, that every member of the force who may be wanted in the circumstances mentioned is bound to give his name when asked, and his officers or his comrades are bound to give assistance if required; and as regards paragraph 3, that he is not of opinion that any necessity exists for assigning distinguishing numbers throughout the force generally, and that any attempt to keep up any general system of such numbers would prove extremely embarrassing, in view of the removals of men both in bodies and as individuals constantly taking place in all parts of Ireland.

MR. MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): Have not the Dublin Metropolitan Police distinguishing marks; do they not wear numbers and also letters of the alphabet?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I stated the other day that in several of the large towns the police have distinguishing marks.

MR. MACNEILL: Why is the distinction maintained in towns, and not in the country?

IRISH PUBLIC WORKS COMMISSION.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury what has been the entire cost of the Royal Commission on Irish Public Works; and whether any fees, and, if any, to what amount, have been paid to any Commissioner for his services on that Commission?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): The cost of the Commission, as charged on the Temporary Commissions Vote, has been £10,814. Payments amounting to a further sum of about £900 have been made from other Votes for stationery, printing, &c. Three of the Commissioners received remuneration at the rate of ten guineas a working day, as stated in the Estimates for 1887-88, page 502.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER: Were the names of the Commissioners stated?

MR. JACKSON: I do not remember whether the names of the Commissioners were stated in the Estimate, but, of course, the names of the Commissioners are well known.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: I want to know the names of the Commissioners who were paid. There were certain of them who were not paid. I understand from the hon. Gentleman's reply that three of the Commissioners were paid 10 guineas a day. I want to know their names.

MR. JACKSON: There were four Commissioners altogether. Mr. Pim, one of the Commissioners, was not paid.

THE ROYAL BARRACKS, DUBLIN.

MR. LAMBERT (Islington, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that the Royal Lancaster Regiment asked to be allowed to move from the Royal Barracks to Beggar's-bush Barracks, Dublin, when the Liverpool Regiment left there on February 11; whether permission was refused, and whether the Seaforth Highlanders, from Glasgow, were sent to Beggar's-bush Barracks because a guarantee had been given that no fresh troops should be put in the Royal Barracks; and whether, owing to this guarantee, it is intended to keep the Royal Lancaster Regiment for the whole of its term in Dublin, in barracks which are insanitary, uncomfortable, and unfit for habitation?

MR. E. STANHOPE: As a result of the promise that no fresh troops should be moved into the Royal Barracks, the request of the Lancaster Regiment was refused. The General Commanding reports that during the ten months the Lancaster Regiment has been in the Royal Barracks it has been particularly healthy. That steps are being taken to put the barracks into a thoroughly sanitary condition is well known.

MR. LAMBERT: Will the Royal Lancaster Regiment stay there during their whole term?

MR. STANHOPE: I would rather not answer that at present. I will take immediate steps to avert any danger that may be likely to arise.

MR. MAC NEILL: Do I understand that, during the last ten months, the Royal Barracks have been particularly healthy?

MR. STANHOPE: What I said was that the Royal Lancaster Regiment, who have been in the Royal Barracks, have been in a particularly healthy state.

THE DUNGARVAN UNION.

MR. D. SULLIVAN (Westmeath, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant whether the Local Government Board intend to direct the discontinuance in office of the paid Guardians of the Dungarvan Union in time to allow the re-election of a Board of Guardians on the 26th of March next, and give the ratepayers a voice in the levying and expenditure of the rates?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The Local Government Board would not feel justified in discontinuing the Vice Guardians of Dungarvan Union next month, as the proceedings of the elected Guardians who were displaced in October last for jobbery and corruption were such as to render it inadvisable to restore them to office at present. I may add that memorials signed by very influential persons in the Union have been received, praying that the services of the Vice Guardians may be retained.

POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANKS.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General when the new Regulations relating to the Post Office Savings Banks will be laid upon the Table of the House?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): The subject to which the hon. Member refers has not been lost sight of; but I have thought it well to postpone the introduction of any further regulations until opportunity has been given to observe the working of the regulations which were laid on the Table of the House last year, in order to see what alterations in matters of detail may be most desirable. The hon. Member called my attention towards the close of last Session to the inconvenience likely to be caused by one of the regulations respecting the signatures of Trustees of Friendly Societies. Arrangements have consequently been made under which withdrawals from the funds of Friendly Societies can be effected on the signature of two Trustees.

MR. HOWELL: Can arrangements be made whereby Members of the House can have copies of the new regulations?

MR. RAIKES: I will inquire: I should be very glad if that could be done.

BELFAST TELEGRAPH OFFICE.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware of the dissatisfaction which has been caused by the removal of the telegraph office from Waring Street, Belfast; and whether, considering the great inconvenience of the present arrangement, he will take steps to have a telegraph office established in connection with the new post office there?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES): The branch post office and telegraph office in Waring Street, Belfast, was closed on the 31st of August, 1886, when, by the removal of the head post office to Royal Avenue, a new telegraph office was opened about 400 yards off. A memorial for the establishment of telegraph business at the present receiving office in Waring Street has recently been received and is now under inquiry.

IRELAND—IMPRISONMENT OF MR. CAREW.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland whether Mr. Carew, M.P., a prisoner under the Crimes Act in Kilkenny Gaol, still refuses to wear the convict garb; whether his left arm, shoulder, and hip have been injured by the violence inflicted upon him by a body of warders in stripping him of his clothes on his arrival at the prison last week; and what is the legal authority for stripping Mr. Carew by violence?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: 1. Mr. Carew still refuses to wear the prison dress. 2. Mr. Carew admits that his resistance to the removal of his clothes and the putting on of the prison dress was very violent, and considerable force had in consequence to be used in enforcing compliance on his part with the rules, but the Governor, who was present, states the force used was not greater than the circumstances rendered necessary. Mr. Carew complains that his left shoulder and right hip were strained in the struggle, but the only mark of injury now perceptible is a scratch on the back of his right hand, and the medical officer, who examined him immediately after the occurrence as well as on the following day, states that he found no other mark of injury of any sort. 3. Section 13 of 19 and 20 Vict., cap. 68, and Rule 28 of the Local Prison Rules, which latter requires that "a convicted criminal prisoner shall be provided with a complete prison dress and shall be required to wear it." These provisions carry with them, in the opinion of the Board, a legal authority to do whatever is reasonably necessary to give effect to them.

MR. SEXTON: In reference to the explanation the right hon. Gentleman has just given, I beg to ask him whether Rule 58 of the Prison Rules authorizes the Governor, in case of disobedience, to punish a prisoner by close confinement for any time not exceeding 24 hours and by being kept on bread and water; whether Rule 59 prescribes that a man may be punished by confinement in a prison cell; what Rule authorizes the application of physical violence to a prisoner to compel him to strip himself of his clothes and to put other clothes on; and, in view of the enormous number of Rules directing that nothing shall be done to injure any prisoner in body or mind, and Mr. Carew having been continuously six days and nights on a plank bed, how long the right hon. Gentleman intends to keep my hon. Friend in this condition?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Member asks me a series of Questions without notice. In his last Question he asks how long I intend to allow Mr. Carew to remain in his present condition. I have only in reply to say that this is a question entirely for the medical officer of the prison to decide. The medical officer of the prison, I have no doubt, will exercise the closest and most careful supervision over Mr. Carew's health. I have not the slightest doubt that he will see that no injury is done to Mr. Carew's health. With regard to the legal question in the earlier part of the hon. Member's interrogatories, legal opinions have been given over and over again. I have been advised that the prison authorities were acting properly, in accordance both with the spirit and the letter of the Statute, in exercising such force as unfortunately might be necessary to compel obedience to the prison rules. Nor can I conceive that anyone who desires the comfort of Mr. Carew himself would desire to substitute for that amount of force solitary confinement, or putting upon bread and water.

MR. SEXTON: In view of the rules of the Prisons Board declaring that punishment for disobedience shall be one of three things—close confinement, bread and water, or the punishment cell—I ask the right hon. Gentleman to cite for me any rule which justifies the use of physical force.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Member appears to speak under a misapprehension. No punishment has been inflicted upon Mr. Carew. Such force only was used as was absolutely necessary to enforce obedience to the Prison Rules. If I rightly understand the hon. Gentleman, he desires that punishment should be inflicted.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): Will the right hon. Gentleman be good enough to say whether there is any truth in the statement in to-day's papers that Mr. Carew, instead of having a plank bed, has been supplied with a palliasse and mattress?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have not received information to that effect, but I have no doubt that the statement is true.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny S.): May I ask whether the same medical officer is attending Mr. Carew who allowed Larkin, one of Lord Clanricarde's tenants, to die unattended in his cell?

No answer was given.

MR. SEXTON: May I ask whether the prison rule which the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary has quoted relating to hair-cutting does not refer to females; and whether the regulations as to male prisoners are not that the hair shall not be closer than is necessary for health and cleanliness? I also have to ask whether it is for that purpose that the hair of these hon. Gentlemen was cut by violence immediately after their admission; and whether it is not the fact that no Member of Parliament had his hair cut in prison last year?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am afraid I cannot, without further notice, add anything to the answer which I gave to the hon. Gentleman. I understand that the practice in Ireland is precisely the same as it is in England. If it can be shown that it is materially different, I will engage that the difference shall be removed.

MR. SEXTON: Why was the rule not carried out last year?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman is misinformed.

MR. SHEEHY (Galway, S.): If my learned Friend is misinformed, may I ask the right hon. Gentleman when was my hair cut off?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am afraid the hon. Member did not do me the honour to listen to my answer. What I stated was that the practice of clipping hair in Irish prisons did not begin in October last, as some persons think. I believe there were three or four cases in which the hair was not clipped. No doubt the hon. Member who has just spoken was an exception if he says so.

No doubt he is very competent to give information upon that point. But in all cases the exception is made at the instance of the governor or the doctor of the prison.

MR. SHEEHY: I wish to ask whether the governor or the doctor ever asked that my hair should be clipped?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Does the hon. Member refer to the Prisons Board? I presume that neither the doctor nor the governor would refer to the Prisons Board, seeing that it is a matter which is left to the discretion of the doctor, and no other authority is required.

RAILWAY RATES.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the statements reported to have been made by Lord Compton to the electors of Barnsley, alleging that the effect of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act has been to increase the rates for goods and minerals, and the terminal charges of the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway and the Great Northern Railway, and that schedules have been submitted for the approval of the Board of Trade for still higher rates, amounting in the case of coal to 3s. per ton; and whether such statements were founded upon fact?

SIR M. HICKS-BEACH: My attention has been called to the statements by the Question of my hon. Friend. I think they are based upon an entire misconception of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act of last Session, and the difference between the maximum rates and the rates actually charged. If a Railway Company desires to raise the rates actually charged, it can only do so, since the Act came into operation, by giving public notice, which would be sent to the Board of Trade. I am not aware that this Railway Company has done so. In regard to the maximum rates, they, of course, have sent in a schedule, as other companies have done, according to the provisions of the Act. Those maximum rates must be compared, not with the rates actually charged by them, but with their statutory powers, and, of course, they will be subjected to the revision of the Board of Trade and of Parliament.

COLONIAL CONSTITUTIONS.

MR. F. STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye): I beg to ask the Under Secretary for the Colonies when the Return relating to Colonial Constitutions, ordered on the 9th March, 1888, to be printed, will be issued to Members?

BARON H. DE WORMS: The papers are in the printers' hands, and will be distributed shortly.

THE INDIAN CIVIL SERVICE.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary for India when Her Majesty's Home Government or the Government of India propose to announce the action they intend to take upon the recommendations contained in the recently issued Report of the Indian Public Service Commission; and whether the Government contemplate making any alteration in the age at which candidates are admissible to compete for appointments in the Indian Civil Service?

SIR J. GORST: The Secretary of State is unable to name any precise date upon which the consideration of this important Report, which is now proceeding, will be concluded and a decision arrived at. No time has been or will be lost in determining how far effect can be given to the recommendations of the Commission. The alteration of age, as recommended by the Commission, is one of the matters under consideration.

MR. BRYCE: Is it the expectation of the Government that some declaration will be made on the subject during the present Session of Parliament?

SIR JOHN GORST: In a matter of this kind, the Secretary of State cannot bind himself to a particular time. The matter is of immense importance, and the greatest possible attention will be paid to it, both at home and in India, and a decision will be arrived at as speedily as possible.

LAW OFFICERS AND PRIVATE PRACTICE.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Government, in accordance with the pledge given by him on 19th November, 1888, have examined into the question of the position of the Law Officers of the Crown in regard to their taking private practice; and whether they have come to any conclusion on the subject?

MR. W. H. SMITH: There has not been time to give consideration to the matter to which the hon. Gentleman refers. He will remember I said it was one of considerable difficulty.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman undertake to examine into the matter, and give the House his decision before the Estimates come on?

MR. W. H. SMITH: I cannot give a positive undertaking, but I certainly will endeavour to examine into the subject.

IRELAND—IMPRISONMENT OF MEMBERS

MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-on-Tyne): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland by whose direction Mr. E. Harrington, M.P., Mr. W. O'Brien, M.P., and Mr. Carew, M.P., were, on being admitted to prison, subjected to the indignity of having their hair cut off; and whether this course has been sanctioned by the Prisons Board; why a distinction was made in this respect between these Members and other Members of Parliament and others who have been previously committed to prison under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act; and whether the prison rules justify such action otherwise than for the purpose of enforcing cleanliness?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It was by no special direction, but in accordance with ordinary prison rules, that the hair was clipped. I understand the Rule is as follows:—

"No. 35. Each male prisoner shall have his beard clipped or be shaved at least once a week, unless specially exempted by the governor or surgeon. . . . The hair of male criminal prisoners shall not be cut closer than may be necessary for purposes of health and cleanliness."

The distinction made in the cases referred to by the right hon. Gentleman was therefore due to special exemptions by the governor or medical officer. The rule and practice is precisely the same as that which obtains in England, and which was put in force in the case of the Member for North-West Lanarkshire.

AGRARIAN CRIMES IN IRELAND.

MR. J. MORLEY: I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman a Question upon another subject. In another place certain figures have been stated as to the decrease in agrarian crimes. I wish to ask whether the Government will have laid upon the Table, before the further progress of the debate, details of that alleged decrease? The statement was that the number of offences had diminished from 1,100 to 660. It is very important that the House should have an analysis and classification of this Return. I ask, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman will give me a continuation of the Return granted last Session.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: With regard to the last Question, I have no difficulty in saying that if the Return referred to is only a continuation Return, I shall be happy to furnish it. I suppose the figures given in the other House were the ordinary Returns of agrarian outrages. I do not know that they can be laid on the Table out of their order, to meet the exigencies of debate, but I will see what can be done. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will ask me a Question on the subject another day, in answer to which I may be able to give the required information.

MR. J. MORLEY: I will ask a Question on Thursday.

IRELAND—THE DRAINAGE BILLS.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Cambridge): I beg to ask whether the Drainage Bills to be introduced this Session will be the same as those of last Session?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not think it is usual at this stage of our proceedings to describe the character of Bills to be introduced.

IRELAND—THE KENMARE ESTATE— PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Perhaps I may be permitted to correct and supplement something that dropped from me in my speech yesterday. In speaking of the county of Kerry I was interrupted by the hon. Member for Mayo, who asked what part of Kerry I was referring to. I am glad of the interruption, because I made a slight error which caused me to understate my case. Instead of speaking of the county of Kerry, I should have spoken of the Kenmare Estate. The facts are these: On the estate of the Earl of Kenmare in Kerry, there occurred from the 1st of August, 1888, to the 14th of October, 1888, but one case of outrage of any description, and this was a threatening notice. The agitation alluded to began at the end of September, and from the 14th of October, 1888, to the 15th of December, 1888, there occurred 11 outrages on this estate. Of these 11 outrages, one was a threatening letter, three were cases of killing or mutilating animals, two of cattle stealing, three of moonlighting, one injury to property, and one incendiary fire.

THE SPECIAL COMMISSION—THE DISAPPEARANCE OF MR. PIGOTT.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I desire to ask the Home Secretary a Question about the disappearance of Mr. Pigott. I wish to ask him whether he or the authorities at Scotland Yard have taken any steps to secure the apprehension of that person? I further wish to ask him whether Pigott, or any other witnesses engaged for the Times, were under protection from Scotland Yard; if so, I desire to know how it was that Pigott was allowed to escape from this country?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have only just learned from the newspapers that the Court constituted last year has issued a warrant for the apprehension of Mr. Pigott. That warrant, no doubt, will be put in the hands of the police, and I have no doubt the police will use their utmost endeavours to execute it.

MR. T. M. HEALY: That is not an answer to my Question. I asked, in the first instance, was this gentleman or any other of the Times witnesses under surveillance by the London police; and, if so, whether any steps were taken, in the interests of what is called justice, to see that this man and persons of his kidney should be kept here to answer before the Commission any questions that may be put to them?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am not aware that any witnesses subpoenaed by the Times newspaper were under the surveillance of the police. If the hon. Gentleman wishes any further information on the subject I will make inquiries;

but I am not aware of anything on the subject now.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I wish to ask whether, in view of the importance of this witness Pigott, the Government have taken any steps to close the ports against him by telegraphing to the police authorities at those places?

[No answer.]

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I beg to ask, as some of the witnesses have sworn that they were under protection, whether it would be the duty of the officers charged with that protection to make any report to the Home Secretary in the event of any of the persons they were protecting disappearing; and whether any such report has been made to the right hon. Gentleman in the case of Mr. Pigott?

MR. MATTHEWS: No report whatever has reached me with respect to Mr. Pigott. I understood the Question of the hon. Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy) to refer not to protection, but to surveillance—watching. ["No, no!"] I certainly so understood him. If the man in question was protected, I have no personal knowledge of it, and no report has been made to me of any witness requiring protection. Still, I do not deny that some witnesses may have been under protection.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Will the right hon. Gentleman answer my Question—Has any attempt been made to capture Pigott? He is a very valuable person. I have to ask the right hon. Gentleman, as the representative of justice—British justice—in this House, whether he will be kind enough to state what attempt, if any, has been made to close the ports against Pigott?

MR. MATTHEWS: The knowledge that Mr. Pigott has disappeared reached me about an hour ago. In that interval I have personally taken no steps; but I can assure hon. Members that both the Government and the authorities of Scotland Yard will do their utmost to prevent Mr. Pigott escaping.

MR. BRADLAUGH: May I ask, with reference to the officers charged with the protection of Mr. Pigott, whether the right hon. Gentleman will call on those officers for some special report as to the time and place when he disappeared?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am not aware that any officer of the Metropolitan Police had Pigott under his protection.

MR. DILLON (Mayo. E): Perhaps the Chief Secretary can say whether any detectives from Ireland were charged with looking after him? I do think we are entitled to have from the Government some definite statement that they will not only endeavour to prevent Pigott's escape from London, but from Great Britain, and that they will exercise themselves at least to the same extent as they would do if they were trying to apprehend any one of us.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: All hon. Gentlemen must be aware that I have nothing to do with the management of the police in London. As far as I know, no protection was afforded Mr. Pigott. If any efforts of mine can conduce to the capture of that gentleman they certainly shall be made.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): May I ask the Home Secretary whether, now that the absconding of the Times witnesses has commenced, he will take precautions to prevent any other of the witnesses leaving the country, particularly Houston and a few others?

No answer was returned.

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I want to ask the Chief Secretary whether he is aware that an Irish police sergeant in plain clothes was called to-day by the Attorney General to give an account of Mr. Pigott, having been residing at the same hotel with him, and I have also to ask under what instructions, and under whose orders, that sergeant of the police was there?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no information on the point. I was not even aware that the incident to which the right hon. Gentleman alludes occurred in Court. If the right hon. Gentleman will put a Question on the paper I will make inquiries.

PRIVILEGE—STRANGERS IN THE LOBBY.

MR. SEXTON: I desire to say a word by way of personal explanation. I said yesterday I would to-day put a Question to you, Mr. Speaker, as to the admission of a person of the name of Houston to parts of the House reserved to the use of Members of the House. Since then your Secretary, Sir, has been kind enough to inform me that the name of this person has not been placed this year on your Lobby List, or on any list of persons having special access to the House, and I therefore do not propose to put any Question.

MR. SPEAKER: I am not responsible to the hon. Member for whom I admit to the Lobby. Of course, I am glad to give any information in my power. Mr. Houston's name was on the Lobby List last Session for a specified period only. At the commencement of this Session no application was made on behalf of Mr. Houston, and his name was not placed on the List at all. I have not removed the name, as it was not there.

MR. T. M. HEALY: May I ask if you will be good enough to say whether the period when Mr. Houston had admission to the Lobby synchronises with the passage of the Special Commission Act of 1888, when he had conversations with the First Lord of the Treasury?

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! I do not think that is a proper Question to put to me. I have endeavoured to admit to the Lobby representatives of different organizations and different parties in this House, and I am not aware that I have on any one occasion deviated from that course.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HER MAJESTY'S MOST GRACIOUS SPEECH.

[ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [21st February.]— [See page 41.]

Question again proposed.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON (Armagh, N.): Mr. Speaker, I looked forward with interest and anxiety to the attack that my right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Morley) intended to make against the Government. If the old adage is accurate that practice makes perfect, Her Majesty's Opposition ought, in the lapse of years, to arrive at considerable perfection in moving votes of want of confidence in Her Majesty's Government for their Irish Administration. We have had a series of these votes of want of confidence. We are just now considering one, and when I learned the Motion that my right hon. Friend was going to move, I wrote down on a piece of paper I now hold in my hand the points which I imagined my right hon. Friend would strive to make. I imagined that my right hon. Friend would have tried to show that the Crimes Act, which is directed against crime, has failed to accomplish its object, and that crime, instead of diminishing, was augmented. I should also have thought the right hon. Gentleman would show that the Crimes Act interfered unduly with the liberty of the subject, that the innocent suffered whereas the guilty went scot-free, and I anticipated that he would have gone on to show that liberty of speech was interfered with in Ireland. But, on the first head, that of "crime," my right hon. Friend hardly said anything at all, because he knew perfectly well that crime has undoubtedly diminished in Ireland, and that so far from crime, as was said last year, being driven under the surface and taking that form of agrarian crime which, unfortunately, we have seen in Ireland, there is less crime now than at any time since the commencement of the agitation. The first count my right hon. Friend has not attempted to establish, and therefore I suppose it falls to the ground. With regard to the innocent being punished, my right hon. Friend certainly brought forward some cases; but I do not think, if I may say so, that they were seriously meant. He cited some cases of certain persons who had laughed at the police, and who were put in gaol. The right hon. Gentleman himself, however, expressed a certain amount of doubt as to the accuracy of the allegation. Why, I think its utter absurdity is stamped on its very face. I have not heard of the circumstance before; but I venture to prophesy that when researches have been made into the accuracy or want of accuracy of that accusation it will be found, as probably my right hon. Friend believes himself in the bottom of his heart, that it is a wild effusion of the imagination of some Irish editor. With regard to freedom of speech, I venture to say, without fear of contradiction, that there is more freedom of speech in its proper sense in Ireland at the present moment than is to be found in any country in the world. On one occasion it was my good fortune to follow the hon. Member for the Scotland Division of Liverpool (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) during the recent electoral campaign at Maidstone, and the great point the hon. Gentleman made was that for a speech he might make with perfect impunity at Maidstone he would be imprisoned in Ireland. I said, "That undoubtedly is the case. It is perfectly true." But I also maintain it ought to be true. A homely illustration will exactly point my meaning. It is a well-known fact that some hon. Members are addicted to smoking. There is nothing to prevent them lighting a cigar in that portion of this building which is devoted to the worship of nicotine. It is a perfectly legal act, but there are conditions in England under which, if anyone lit a cigar, he would be instantly put in gaol. Let him go down into a coal mine and light a cigar, and he would find that what would be legal in the smoking-room of the House of Commons would, in an atmosphere filled with inflammable particles, be a criminal act of a heinous kind, because it would endanger the lives of those engaged in the mine. That may be a homely illustration, but it accurately represents the condition of free speech in Ireland. A speech may be treated with perfect impunity at Maidstone or in the House of Commons which in Ireland would mean the death of some unfortunate offender against the organization over which hon. Gentlemen opposite hold sway. The chief attack against the Government yesterday was their action in the case of Mr. Harrington. Is it unfair that Mr. Harrington should at the present time be undergoing punishment in Ireland? That is a matter of opinion; but, for my own part, I believe there is no man deserves it better. Mr. Harrington had ample opportunity of knowing the effect of language on the Irish people. In this House, and in his presence, not later than last year, I pointed out the result in a certain town in Kerry which he had mentioned by name; and in an article which he signed himself, so that there should be no mistake as to who wrote it, he held up to public execration land-grabbers, and he must have known that in that townland there was a land-grabber in danger of his life, whose name was Fitzmaurice. Within two months after that article was written Fitzmaurice was murdered in cold blood. I should have thought that his better feeling might have induced Mr. Harrington to refrain, in a neighbourhood which he knew was stained with innocent blood, from trying to foster and revive an organization which he knew was stained with outrage and crime. Let me give one other instance to show the effect of these speeches, which might be made with perfect impunity in the House of Commons, or in London, or elsewhere in England. In this country people might think them bloodthirsty speeches, but they would not lead to crime; but in Ireland they lead directly to, and are directly answerable for, most of the crime which has disgraced and sullied my native land. [Home Rule cries of "Oh, oh!"] Yes, it is my native land as much as yours, and there is no man in this House who feels the honour of being an Irishman more than I do. Let me mention another instance. There was a speech made in the adjoining county of Limerick on January 29, 1888—

"I maintain that a land-grabber is a thief when he covets and steals his unfortunate neighbour's holding, and I want to say once more what I repeated on a hundred platforms—that the land-grabber incurred malediction in the days when the Holy Bible was written. 'Cursed be he who removes his neighbour's landmark' was the dictum of Holy Writ. He is a cowardly, slimy renegade, a man who should be looked upon as a social leper."

That speech was made by Mr. Davitt on January 29, 1888. Two days after that speech had rung round Kerry and Limerick Fitzmaurice was butchered in the light of day before his daughter's eyes. I want to know, is that the sort of freedom of speech which hon. Gentlemen opposite claim? I say that is a sort of freedom of speech which cannot be permitted to exist by, or co-exist with, a civilized or ordered society. The right hon. Gentleman blames the Government very much for the arrest of Mr. M'Fadden and the way it was carried out, and the right hon. Gentleman said, "What would be said of me if I, when I had been Chief Secretary, had ordered the arrest of Dr. Kane when he left his church in Belfast on a Sunday?" But the instance which occurred in Mr. M'Fadden's case could not have occurred in the case of Dr. Kane, for Dr. Kane would have obeyed a summons to appear, and if a warrant had been issued for his arrest Dr. Kane would have allowed the warrant to be served. If a warrant were issued for my own arrest I should not go and live lying about in the mountains of Donegal; I should submit myself to be tried; and my hon. Friend near me, who at one time was arrested, did not run away and hide. Mr. M'Fadden was flying from the hand of justice; a warrant was out from which he was trying to escape; and I maintain and believe, and I think I shall be supported in that belief by a consensus of the opinion of the country, that the blood of the man who was killed is at Mr. M'Fadden's door, just as if it was shed upon his doorstep. That is my opinion, and I believe it to be the opinion of the country. I now pass on. I do not intend to take up the time of the House with details, although I admit their importance, but I think the attack upon Her Majesty's Government is of a Petty Sessions character, rather than a great attack on a great principle of Imperial policy. I am very glad that that debate has occurred, because I believe it will place before the country the difference between the Parties. [Cheers and counter cheers.] I am glad that for once we are all satisfied. We are fighting at the present moment the greatest and the gravest battle that any civilized nation can fight. We are fighting on the one side for the triumph and the supremacy of the law of the land, and on the other for the triumph and the supremacy of the law of the League. I do not think hon. Gentlemen opposite will deny that. They have declared in public that they intend to set the law of the land at defiance, that they intend to set at defiance the Crimes Act, which is as much part of the law of the land as any other Statute on the Book, and declare that that Act is absolutely incapable to arrest their proceedings. If they succeed in proving that the law of the land cannot arrest their proceedings and call them to account when they break its provisions, then I say that their triumph is complete. There are to my mind two ways of dealing with law-breakers. You must put them down or you must give in to them. There is a third course, which is sometimes to put them down, and sometimes to give in to them. That is a course which has been followed by both Parties, but I think we have seen the unwisdom of that course; and when the right hon. Gentleman opposite says, "How can you hope that a coercive policy will now succeed in Ireland when in the past it has always failed," I answer that there is one great and marked distinction between a coercive policy for a fixed period and a permanent one—between the Crimes Act of the present Government and all those other Acts which were passed in bygone days. The present is a continuous Act. The reason the Crimes Act at present in force can be continuous is, that it does not in the very slightest degree interfere with law-abiding men, or with any liberty which any subject of Her Majesty the Queen should desire, whereas the Crimes Acts passed in former days by the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian were of so severe and drastic a character, interfering as they did in an unlimited manner with the liberty of the subject, that they could not be allowed to remain on the Statute Book. It is because the present Act is continuous and does not hold out any hope that the policy of revolution will again triumph, that I believe that Coercion Act, which is really a reinforcing of the law of the land, will permanently remain on the Statute Book of the country, and help, as it is doing now, to establish in Irishmen that belief that the law of the land must be supreme which, I believe, will ultimately make the Irish people a law-abiding race. Of course, the Government have had much greater victories. It was prophesied on the front Opposition Bench that this Act was bound to fail. There are two kinds of prophets; one who lets his prophecy take its chance, and if it is fulfilled gets credit; and there is the other kind of prophet who fulfils his own prophecies or tries to do so. I might make a prophecy that some hon. Member would have a fall; but if I were surreptitiously and feloniously to produce that effect, and trip the hon. Member up, I should fulfil my own prophecy, but I should not deserve any credit. That is exactly what hon. and right hon. Gentlemen have been doing with Her Majesty's Government. They have been tripping up the law. The Irish are a pretty quick people to learn a lesson, and when they are told—especially on high authority—they are right in disobeying the law, they take that advice much more readily than they do better advice. The right hon. Member for Mid Lothian, in speaking about law in Ireland—I think it was pretty strong language from an ex-Prime Minister—said—

“Gentlemen, what I wish to state to you is that the Irish cannot, and the Irish ought not to, acquiesce in a Government which is against them, and is a Government of unequal laws. I take first the law of combination among the poorer classes of the community by which they seek in the use of a weapon that nature has supplied to them.”

The interpretation which any ordinary Irishman would put upon that is, that the “weapons” referred to were black-thorn sticks. I have been blamed for saying that under certain conditions I would disobey the law; but I have the authority of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gladstone) for saying I am right in that. I should look upon a Home Rule Government in Dublin as a Government of unequal law; and, therefore, when I say I cannot and will not obey it I have the right hon. Gentleman on my side. A great effort is being made to defeat the law which this Parliament has passed, and to show that that law works unfairly. We remember that Mitchelstown occupied a very large portion of the speeches of Gentlemen opposite; but, somehow or other, Mitchelstown drooped. The right hon. Gentleman tried to revive it by the help of photographs; but even those failed. Then we had Mandeville. The right hon. Gentleman said at Birmingham we should hear a great deal more about Mr. Mandeville, but we have heard nothing since about Mandeville. Mandeville would not stand examination. He did very well on the platform, when Gentlemen opposite said the Chief Secretary had murdered Mr. Mandeville; but we know very well that statement will not stand the test in the House of Commons, and they never now bring Mandeville forward except incidentally.

Mr. T. P. O’CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): There was a direct Motion upon the case.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: We have heard nothing lately about Mandeville—nothing since the allusion of the right hon. Gentleman at Birmingham. Daniel O’Connell once said that when defending a man on a capital charge he produced the murdered man alive in Court, and yet the jury found his client guilty.

Colonel Sanderson

And Gentlemen opposite know that they could and did produce Mandeville alive and well for a month after he had left prison—he himself boasted that he could tell the Coercionist Government they had not knocked a feather out of him. For some time Mr. Mandeville went about making speeches and took to staying up very late at night, and in the end he, unfortunately, died. That case will not wash, and the right hon. Gentleman, as far as I can remember, did not say much about it. But some cry had to be got up—some cry which would attract the British public, and the cry which is now being got up to attract the public—[Cries of “Pigott;” cheers, and laughter from the Irish Benches.] I do not know why hon. Members opposite cry that name at me. [Laughter.] I know nothing of the man at all, except that I believe he has thoroughly qualified himself to belong to the first Home Rule Parliament in Ireland. But, Sir, what is the great attraction that hon. Gentlemen opposite have had for the last month or two now? The clothes of Mr. O’Brien. [Derisive cheers.] Well, I am sorry to bring that matter forward, but I must. Hon. Gentlemen opposite, above and below the Gangway, have gone up and down the country drawing harrowing pictures of this naked patriot, and have tried to throw utter discredit upon Her Majesty’s Government, and particularly upon the law which this House has passed, because they say it has led to these terrible scenes—Mr. O’Brien sitting bereft of those garments which most people like to wear in the day-time. If a great Party in the State like to make those garments of Mr. O’Brien their Oriflamme—the flag under which they are to march,—and to use them for the purpose of sweeping Her Majesty’s Government off the Treasury Bench, I think I am justified in confronting that Party in the House, and asking them to prove their case. I cannot help admiring the theatrical way in which hon. Gentlemen opposite timed those events to come off just before the meeting of Parliament, or the proceedings which the Lord Mayor of Dublin takes for the purpose of emphasizing the agitation. I know I am about to tread on dangerous ground, but I must even venture to incur the wrath of that civic functionary who suddenly, in the dead of the night—or rather in the early morning—woke to a consciousness that Mr. O'Brien was naked in his cell. Now, as a matter of fact, I do not believe Mr. O'Brien ever has been naked. I understand he has been without certain garments, but not entirely naked. So impressed was the Lord Mayor of Dublin with bringing the matter under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government that he determined on a very remarkable proceeding. The Lord Mayor of Dublin at 1 a.m. was a very different being from the Lord Mayor of Dublin at 1 p.m.; and at the witching hour the Lord Mayor of Dublin appeared to be under the impression that the Home Rule Bill had passed, and that he was master of the situation. He rang for his ambassador, who appeared on the scene in the person of the hall-porter, wrote a letter at that hour, and sent away the messenger to the Chief Secretary, bringing to his cognizance the fact that at that moment Mr. O'Brien was in a naked condition. It would have struck many that most people are usually without certain garments at that hour of the night. Of course I cannot answer for the habits of Nationalist Members. When the messenger came back he told the Lord Mayor that the Chief Secretary had opened the door, having come down in his shirt covered with orders. The hon. Member failed to discern that there was something rather imaginative in the description of his emissary. Well, I should have thought I might have appealed from the Lord Mayor of 2 a.m. to the Lord Mayor of 2 p.m. on Monday, but strange as it may seem the Lord Mayor of 2 p.m. appeared to be under the same delusion. After a day and a half's reflection the Lord Mayor went into the Phoenix Park and made a speech, and said he was informed that the Chief Secretary was a prominent figure in the affair; but whether it was the Chief Secretary or Mr. Hayes Fisher, the Member for Fulham, it was no excuse for not giving a reply to the letter. Gentlemen opposite deserve great credit for the ingenuity which they display in their theatrical performances. Can anybody conceive such a thing happening in London? Conceive the Lord Mayor of London sending a message to the Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt), when he was Home Secretary, informing him that some malefactor had no clothes on at night, and then going into Hyde Park to make a speech, and saying that the right hon. Gentleman had come down in his night shirt covered with orders. Nobody could conceive such a thing happening in any other country but Ireland, and what I find fault with these Gentlemen for is this—I say they had no right to make such asses of themselves, and to bring down everlasting ridicule on the country to which we all belong. I have often heard hon. Gentlemen in this House talk of "Ditch-liners," but I do not agree with those who apply that name to us. We do not intend to line ditches; we will keep the ditches for hon. Gentlemen opposite when they get a chance to line them. But there was another speech made at that meeting which was of an interesting character. We all know the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. T. Healy), and what an able speaker he is. We are all accustomed to his courtesy in this House; we know his ingenuity and research, but we have never regarded him before from a military point of view. Well, this is what the hon. Gentleman is reported to have said on that occasion: "Instead of speaking that day, he wished he could lead them as armed men to clean out the entire gang of lily-souled assassins." Whenever this takes place I hope I shall be there to see, for it would be a sight to see the corner boys from the height of the Phoenix at Dublin rushing down the valley of the Liffey to sweep away the British Empire. Well, Sir, who are these Gentlemen? And there is another point on which I should like to ask a question. Why are they in gaol? The only answer we can give to that question is, because they want to go to gaol. They go there of their own free will. If they obeyed the law, like ordinary persons in this country, they would not go to gaol; but, as it is, they go over to Ireland with the express and deliberate intent to break the law. I have here an authority for this which I think no one can deny—namely, that of the hon. Member for South Tipperary (Mr. J. O'Connor), as to whom I will venture to make this prophecy—and I believe he is going to gaol, for hon. Members opposite are always either coming from been stated—I do not know with what truth—that the widow offered £8 for the house. Ten pounds were offered; that may not be accurate, but I am informed it is. There was a remedy then. It was to charge Elizabeth the same rent as was paid by Mary, that is Michael, on the Shirley estate. Now, the widow writes the following letter, sent to the Times by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone)—

“I was sorry to see false reports in the papers. I do not blame Mr. Gladstone”

The, I understand, is a relative of the right hon. Gentleman—nor did I wish to remain in the place as I could not pay the rent.”

Where were hon. Gentlemen opposite—the friends of the tenants? I remember a speech made by an hon. and learned Gentleman well known at the Bar—the hon. and learned Member for the Brigg Division of Lincoln. He described an eviction which took place, in a manner that would have made any man shed a tear who did not know his antecedents. He escorted an old woman from the house where the eviction took place, giving her his arm, and that old woman, I am informed, was imported for the occasion. Why did the hon. and learned Member not go to Flintshire and show his sympathy to this poor widow? Charity begins at home, and on this ground we have the right hon. Gentleman writing a letter to the Times, in which he says—

“Your wanton intrusion into the private domain was alien to the honourable traditions of the British Press, and has compelled me to be guilty of a seeming impertinence by troubling the people with my private affairs.”

“Wanton intrusion,” when he and his friends had been wandering all over every private domain in my native land! Now, Sir, I ask the right hon. Gentleman for a definite reply to this question: whether it would be right and just in me to go to Flintshire and to start an organization, which would have for its object the intimidation, the murder, the ruin of, or the outrage upon, any incoming tenant who took the widow’s farm? That is the defence which is set up for the Land League and for boycotting. They have swallowed the whole thing. They have drunk the very dregs from which they averted their heads in former days. I believe that the policy of Her Majesty’s Government, if pursued with unflinching courage, will ultimately triumph over the spasmodic efforts of hon. Gentlemen opposite. I do not believe in the solidarity of the two sides of the Gangway opposite. I believe that the English sense of justice and fair play, and manliness and courage, will rally round the Administration, regardless of torrents of the most infamous calumnies, and that the Government are determined to carry out the law without fear or favour or exception. I form my hope of success in Ireland on the fact that whatever faults they have, the Irish people are not absolutely fools. The Irish people know as well as I know the amazing benefits that this House has conferred upon them. No hon. Member opposite can deny that the Irish tenants have had benefits conferred upon them greater than any conferred upon any other tenants in the world. You have given them practically half the fee simple value, which they can sell in the open market and get far more for than the landlord can as a rule. They begin to realize this, and by-and-bye I believe you will find that Irishmen, who, as a rule, side with the stronger, will see that the law is able to maintain its own and to keep down those who oppose it. I can say, honestly and fearlessly, that there is no man among hon. Gentlemen opposite, or in the country, who more earnestly prays and desires the happiness and welfare of Ireland. They seek it in one way, I in another. I seek it by maintaining the law of Parliament and the authority of the Crown. I have been accused by hon. Gentlemen, in reference to a speech I made the other day, of not being a law-abiding man, and that, therefore, I had no right to condemn those whom I called law-breakers. I maintain that that attack upon me has no foundation in fact. This Parliament may pass laws of which I entirely disapprove, but I would not raise my hand against them, but would seek to get them altered in the place whence they came. But a law passed by an Irish Parliament is a different thing. I have never consented to obey such an authority as that. Allow me to illustrate what I mean. What course would hon. Gentlemen opposite pursue if the right hon.

Colonel Saunderson

Gentleman the Member for Derby, say, experiencing one of those sudden conversions which take place in some statesmen, were suddenly to propose—as he might propose some day—the establishment of a Parliament in Ireland, the first qualification for Membership of which was that the Member must belong to the Orange organizations. [Mr. T. HEALY: We would be very glad of it; we would be delighted with it.] If we were to judge their estimate of such a Parliament by their speeches outside of this House, I should say that would be the very last thing to cross their mind. [Mr. T. HEALY: We would take it to-morrow morning.] I venture to say that if such a monstrous proposition were carried, there is no method, even force, which would not be legitimate to be used by hon. Gentlemen opposite in disregard of such an authority. You have always pleaded against ascendancy, but you propose an ascendancy to endure for ever, an ascendancy in which we, the Party to which I belong, would not in any sense be represented. Sir, we will never acknowledge or be subject to such an authority. [Laughter.] Hon. Members laugh; they are at liberty to do so, but they must admit that there are many in Ireland who share my views. The hon. Member for Cork, I admit, speaks in this House in the name of many Irishmen, but so do I. The House must remember there are two Irelands. ["No, no!"] A very high authority has said so. Listen to this quotation—

"You must never forget there are two Irelands, the Ireland of men of all parties, creeds, ranks, and callings, who, in whatever else they may differ, unite in the wish to preserve law and order, and the right of every citizen to go about his business in peace and safety, and that other and smaller Ireland of men who foment, condone, and sympathize with crime."

These are the words of a right hon. Gentleman who was Chief Secretary for Ireland at the time he uttered them, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Bridgeton Division (Sir G. Trevelyan). With all the information then at his disposal, including that of Major Le Caron, he formed that opinion and made that speech. That is what the right hon. Gentleman was, and that is what he is. Sir, I repeat what I said in Ireland. Whatever solution may come, to one solution at any rate we shall never agree. If it is to be a rebel to refuse to obey rebel authority, then I am a rebel. If it is to be a law-breaker to refuse to obey the authority of those who have brought law into contempt, and as far as they could have trampled upon it, then I am a law-breaker. But, Sir, I maintain that Her Majesty the Queen has no more devotedly loyal subjects in the world than in my native country. To Her we owe allegiance, to this Parliament we owe allegiance and obedience, but never to another. Whatever hon. Gentlemen opposite may say, we should be unworthy of the blood that flows in our veins, of the race to which we belong, of our fathers who before us refused to bear the yoke you would now tie about our necks, if we, their sons, did not proclaim the fact that we never, never shall obey such decrees.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): It is customary for the hon. and gallant Gentleman to give these performances once or twice during the Session for the amusement of the House; but his performance on this occasion, to judge from the demeanour of those around him, was rather less amusing than usual. I think the sense of every quarter of the House will be with me, and I know the sense of the people will agree with me, when I say that such speeches may be very amusing, but certainly they are not politic or statesmanlike. If a good and strong illustration were needed why it is that the people of Ireland are always in a state of discontent and revolt against the Executive, I need go no farther than such a speech as we have just heard from a fair sample of the gang of men under whose guidance the mass of the people of Ireland are ruled against their will. An hon. and gallant Gentleman who thinks it highly creditable to himself, amid the cheers of his four followers, to declare that the ditches of Ireland shall be preserved to pitch us into whenever they can get the opportunity! I hope the day is near at hand, and will not be long delayed, when the people—I speak not for myself—will not be in the power of such men to be pitched into ditches or trampled upon. I have not the slightest intention, and I do not think the House will expect me to do so, to follow the hon. and gallant Gentleman through his long array of stale jokes, utterly beside the issue before us. There are only two points in the whole of that long and rambling oration in the least degree worthy of comment. The hon. and gallant Gentleman deemed it consistent with fair play and manliness to commence his discourse with a virulent and calumnious attack on a Member of the House now undergoing six months' imprisonment with hard labour. Why did he not select as the object of his attack a man on these benches who could answer him? My hon. Friend could very well deal with the hon. and gallant Gentleman were he at liberty, but under the detestable system that prevails in Ireland he will not even hear the charges made against him. That does not accord with my idea of what is fair or manly.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: I made the same accusation in the hon. Member's presence last year.

AN HON. MEMBER: It is not true.

MR. DILLON: Whether it was made last year or not, it should not have been made in the hon. Member's absence this year. With reference to the contemptible attack made on the right hon. Gentleman, whom I shall certainly not undertake to defend or speak for, I will only say the hon. and gallant Gentleman has not improved whatever position he had by these attempted sneers. Let the hon. and gallant Gentleman advance in force upon Flintshire and attempt to address a Flintshire audience, and I can tell him he will require strong protection to secure him from intimate acquaintance with the nearest horse-pond. The answer to all the silly talk of the hon. and gallant Gentleman is that the thing could not be done; there is no grievance to encourage organization among the tenants. There is this difference between such a case and our action in Ireland; we do not go down and force our system on the country; we are implored to go to the assistance of unfortunate oppressed people, and when we do go the entire population turns out to listen to us and carry out the policy we recommend. We have heard the statements of the Chief Secretary as to the improvement in the condition of Ireland, and these statements remind me forcibly of certain statements to be found in that most interesting volume, the "Life of the late Mr. W. E. Forster." In the winter of 1882 Mr. Forster wrote—it is touching and painful now to read the letters—to his intimate friends, saying—

"My Resident Magistrates gave me the best reports, crime is declining and rents are being paid, and the people are being turned away from the Nationalist Leaders. We shall soon have the whole country on our side."

We know how in a very short time every one of these expectations was falsified. Just as in these days we are scorned and laughed at, so we were ridiculed and disbelieved then. The late Mr. Forster thought he had got hold of a patriot who had more influence and knowledge among the Irish people than we had. At the very time he was writing these letters he was in correspondence with the illustrious Richard Pigott, who undertook for a trifling consideration to convert the National Party of Ireland from the hon. Member for Cork to the Government of the day. I have not the slightest doubt that the present Chief Secretary has similar agents willing to enlighten the people and bring them over to the Government. The system that has existed for so long in Ireland breeds Pigotts as corruption breeds worms. There never has yet been a Government in Ireland that has not had communications with people of that class. But I content myself now with alluding to the decrease in crime. There is a decrease of crime in Ireland, and no person rejoices at it more than I do. The whole argument of many Members of the Party opposite is addressed to the supposition that we are working in Ireland for the increase of crime. I deny that, and always shall. It is part and parcel of that detestable system of calumny and insult now being exploded and blown into atoms. Our interest is as great as yours, and, indeed, much greater, in the decrease of crime. The reasons with which I account for the decrease in crime are chiefly two; the first is the numerous concessions and settlements which have been obtained by tenants hopelessly in arrear in certain districts by the working of the Plan of Campaign; the second and stronger reason is, that while in the winter of 1882 the people were driven to desperation by the knowledge that there was no feeling of sympathy for them in this House, they are now buoyed up with the hope engendered by the sympathy displayed for them in this country. In my judgment the speeches made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, and by his friends, have had more effect in stopping agrarian crime in Ireland than all the Coercion Acts ever passed. It is impossible to escape from this conclusion, because in the course of Irish history you have tried coercion 70 or 80 times in every shape ingenuity can devise, and we have been taught by long and terrible experience that coercion will not put down agrarian crime, but, on the contrary, that agrarian crime follows in spite of any coercion you may devise. But what is the difference between the condition of things in Ireland now, and what it has been under former Coercion Acts? Hon. Members opposite would have us believe that we have a Heaven-sent Minister, and that is the distinction between Ireland now and formerly, when coercion was administered under less able men. I take a totally different view. I do not see the wonderful ability in the administration of the present Chief Secretary. I recognize considerable literary capacity—and a great gift of conveying insulting sarcasms in controversy. It is preposterous to say that the present Chief Secretary exceeds in ability all his Predecessors who have had to administer Coercion. The distinction that marks off the present period by a broad and manifest line from any previous period in Coercion history is, that for the first time a great Minister has come forward at the head of a great Party and bid the people be of good heart; has told them to control themselves and suffer with patience, for the time is approaching and near at hand when a termination shall be put to their sufferings. That alone it is that has made it possible to show a diminution of crime under a Coercion Act. Now, a few words on the question of prison treatment. First, let me say that we have from the very outset been grossly misrepresented in the whole business. It has been said that we claim that the man dressed in black should receive different treatment from that afforded the poor man in frieze. That is a pure invention emanating from the speeches of the Chief Secretary. Myself, Mr. O'Brien, and numbers of other leaders in the movement, have taken every opportunity to declare our repudiation of the idea that we claim the slightest difference in food or treatment from the poorest man who is punished for acting on our counsel. That has been our attitude from the outset. We never ask for better food or any mitigation of the rules inflicting physical discomfort, and that I may say is severe. It would be more decent and manly for hon. Members to try the effect of the plank bed before they greet the mention of it with a laugh. What we asked and what we shall get in the end in spite of jeers and insults—and I believe the people of England are entirely on our side in this—what we ask is that a man who for political motives in Ireland does certain things that brings him under these so-called legal tribunals should not be subjected to those particular parts of prison discipline which are simply matters of personal insult and indignity, and, I repeat for the twentieth time, our demand is made on behalf of the poorest labouring man as strongly as in favour of Mr. O'Brien, Mr. Carew, or any other Member. In the first place we object to association with criminals; secondly, we object to the revolting service that is put upon criminals; and, thirdly, we have objected and do object to wearing the livery of crime. It has been used as a taunt against us that in objecting to wear prison clothes we are doing a very absurd thing. Do Members know what prison clothes are? Have they seen a prisoner in the prison dress? Are they aware that Conservative newspapers in Ireland boasted that when the Act was passed they would soon have us clad in the livery of crime? These words were used before we had appeared before your tribunals to be condemned; the intention was to humiliate us by putting on the dress worn by forgers and others guilty of disgraceful crimes. I say this attempt to humiliate us I will prove and bring home to the responsibility of the Chief Secretary. [An hon. MEMBER: Where is he?] It is part of that infamous conspiracy that has been carried on in this country by Pigotts, a department of which has come to be known as Pigottism. Let me, before I go into details of the attack upon Mr. O'Brien, draw the attention of the House for a moment to an observation made by the Chief Secretary yesterday. He said—that the attack made on Mr. O'Brien was in consequence of his refusal to allow a medical examination. It is an absolutely false statement as could be made. Mr. O'Brien's description continues—

"About five minutes afterwards the chief warden returned to my cell and said, 'We must force you to put on the prison clothes. I asked to see the governor, who appeared to have been waiting outside the door, for he immediately appeared. I said, 'I have to ask that a doctor shall be present during any attack upon me.' He said, 'I cannot do that; you have passed the doctor.' Then, said I, 'you will have to strip me by force,' or words to that effect. I placed my back to the further wall of the cell. Three warders immediately rushed at me with the chief warden. The four seized me, and a violent struggle took place between us, the governor standing by."

"They succeeded after a struggle in flinging me on my back on the floor, dragging my clothes away meanwhile. When I was down one man placed his knee on my chest, not, as I believe, brutally, but with a pressure that caused me considerable suffering. I heard someone, I think the chief warden, say, 'Don't hurt him.' The pressure was then relaxed, and I struggled to my feet again, and renewed the struggle while my clothes were being torn off one by one. I was then flung down a second time on the floor, this time on my face. I continued to struggle with all my force while they were dragging the prison clothes on me, and from the struggle and exhaustion I became so faint that they had twice to cease in order to give me a drink of water. During this second struggle my strength was totally exhausted. I heard the governor give the order to have my hair and beard taken off, and I remember the first few dashes made at me with the scissors. After that I lost consciousness, and when I recovered found my mouth full of hairs, and was propped up on a stool between two warders, who still held my arms. The governor said, 'Surely you have resisted enough now; you know it has to be done.' I said to him, 'You know little of me if you do not know that the struggle is only beginning now. The instant my hands are free I will fling these clothes off again.' While we were speaking, Alderman Hackett, one of the visiting justices, whom I did not know at the time, came into the cell. I was still gasping for breath, sitting on the stool between the warders. I told him, as well as I was able in my condition at the time, what had happened. He was greatly shocked, but it was not at my suggestion he went for a clergyman. The warders having followed Alderman Hackett to the door, I instantly threw off the prison clothes. Three of them rushed at me again, and another struggle took place. They succeeded in forcing on some of the prison clothes again, seizing and twisting my arms all the time. In consequence of my resistance the chief warden told them not to mind forcing on the coat or vest this time. I again became so faint that they again put water on my lips, but continued to hold my arms while I stood leaning against the wall for a considerable period. So far as I can estimate the scene had by this time lasted half an hour. The warders continued to hold me for a long time, when the chief warden said, 'Bring him along,' and I was immediately dragged to the door in my shirt-sleeves and with my feet naked. No intimation whatever was given me that I was being brought to be weighed. Up to this moment the question of weighing had never been mentioned to me either by the doctor or the warders, and I should never have made the slightest objection if I had known that that was their object. I was dragged across a large open space, which I have since learnt was the main hall of the prison. At the moment I was so stupefied, and my bad sight made me so helpless (my spectacles having been taken from me during the struggle and not returned), that I had only the most confused notion of where I was being taken; my impression was that I was being dragged to a punishment cell. I said to the warders who had hold of my arms again and again, 'Where are you dragging me to?' They made no reply, but pulled me on to what I now believe was a weighing machine, beside which the governor and the doctor were standing. My legs and arms were dragged about the machine in an exceedingly painful way, and I then said, 'As long as you are treating me in this barbarous fashion I will submit to nothing except by force.' The governor said, 'Take him away.' They apparently gave up the attempt to weigh me."

Let the House compare this statement of Mr. O'Brien's with that which was made at the banquet by the right hon. Gentleman, not one word of which is true.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am very unwilling to interrupt the hon. Gentleman, and have refrained hitherto from doing so. I may say, with regard to the information I made public at the banquet, that it was founded entirely on a report in the Freeman's Journal. I had no official report at that time.

MR. DILLON: The right hon. Gentleman said at the banquet that the Prisons Board was not in his Department. Questions connected with prisons did not come through his hands, and therefore it was only from accidental circumstances that he became acquainted with the case. The right hon. Gentleman said that he went down to the office on the Friday, when the facts which he had just stated were brought before him.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That is exactly what I indicated. When I went to the office the Under Secretary brought me a copy of the Freeman's Journal of that day.

MR. DILLON: I leave it to any Member of this House whether any individual reading that speech would not have taken it to be a statement of the knowledge of the Chief Secretary founded on official documents. The right hon. Gentleman said he went down to the office when the "following facts" were brought before him. The words are no quotation from the Freeman's Journal, and the Chief Secretary adopted the statements, whatever they were, and said that he immediately proceeded to write a minute to the effect that, though the responsibility for Mr. O'Brien's conduct in refusing to submit to medical examination would rest with himself, the Chief Secretary did not think he ought to permit Mr. O'Brien to ruin his constitution for the purpose of injuring Her Majesty's Government. There was not a person in that room who did not believe, and was not justified in believing, that the facts mentioned by the right hon. Gentleman were taken from an Official Report at his disposal. My attention has also been drawn to another point which strengthens my case. The right hon. Gentleman read first of all a telegram from the Freeman's Journal, and after reading it alluded to it in the following terms:—"That, gentlemen, is the important part of the telegram which you have all seen in the Freeman's Journal." Now I want the House to understand that the right hon. Gentleman, who stated that this telegram was wholly and absolutely incorrect, gives an account on his own authority of what actually happened.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no desire to interrupt the hon. Gentleman. This particular fact is sprung upon the House. If the House will permit me, as far as I recollect, I will give the exact narrative. If I recollect rightly—I know I am taking a liberty with the hon. Gentleman—the events referred to occurred on the Thursday. On the Friday I was at the office. I had not seen the morning papers. According to my recollection, the Under Secretary came into my room and pointed out the story given in the Freeman's Journal. I did not accept that report as true; but I did think that the part of it which referred to Mr. O'Brien's refusal to be examined was probably true.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): When and where was it stated in the Freeman's Journal?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I may be wrong, but I believe, if my recollection serves me right, the hon. Gentleman will find it in the Freeman's Journal. I have not refreshed my memory. I had reason to believe on the Friday that the sole reason for the report in the Freeman's Journal was that the medical examination had not been allowed to take place, and then I forwarded, by special messenger, the medical reports made about Mr. O'Brien on the previous occasion. On Saturday I made my speech. I think I must have received some kind of official notification of what did take place in the prison, or I should not have said at the banquet that these Reports were false. I do not think my Official Reports referred to Mr. O'Brien's refusal or non-refusal to be examined. I still believed the statement of the Freeman's Journal, when it might naturally be believed that Mr. O'Brien had refused to be examined. The matter was brought before Mr. O'Brien, and he took means of making his complaints public. I took the opportunity of correcting my mistake in the Press.

MR. DILLON: A very strange and wonderful story. I leave that explanation to speak for itself. Before I pass from this particular branch of the subject, I want to direct attention to what the Chief Secretary did and said. He said, "I do not think Mr. O'Brien should be permitted to ruin his constitution in order to injure Her Majesty's Government." He shows not the slightest symptom of a feeling of humanity; his one object of care is Her Majesty's Government. What did he do? He says, "I therefore gave directions that as Mr. O'Brien would not allow himself to be medically examined, the reports made by Dr. Ridley and Dr. Barr should be sent down by special messenger to the doctor at Clonmel, so that he might carefully watch Mr. O'Brien and take care that no eccentricity on his part should injure his constitution." But why were not these reports of the previous occasion of Mr. O'Brien's imprisonment sent down before this brutal assault of the Governor was committed? Why was not a telegram sent from the Castle? Perhaps it was in order that this brutal and disgusting assault on Mr. O'Brien might give the right hon. Gentleman the pleasure of sneering at him at the banquet. Then, finding that a large section of his constituents at Manchester did not approve his conduct, the right hon. Gentleman wrote a long letter to a certain Mr. Armitage, in which he said that Mr. O'Brien's offence was of a very different character from that which it was represented to be by the right hon. Member for Newcastle. In the whole history of political controversy I know of nothing meaner than this attempt to fasten odious charges on an opponent. The right hon. Gentleman proceeds in the letter to give what in his judgment was a fair specimen of the speech for which Mr. O'Brien was convicted. He says—

"Take, for instance, these sentences:—'I am afraid land-grabbers are living and thriving in the midst of you. . . . If all our labours for the last ten years have not been in vain, you ought to know how to deal with a land-grabber.' I say without fear of contradiction that a Government which should allow words like these to be uttered, with whatever intention on the part of the speaker, in a district in Ireland where there were evicted farms, might be making itself accessory to assassination."

Now let the House just listen for a second to what the real speech of Mr. O'Brien was. He did say—

"I am afraid they (land-grabbers) are living and thriving in the midst of you, and you know it. I need not go into particulars. If all our labours for the past ten years have not been in vain, you ought to know a land-grabber when you meet him; you ought to know how to deal with him without any instructions from me."

But then my hon. Friend gave the instructions which were suppressed by the right hon. Gentleman. I will, however, read them to you—

"If you want a lesson how to deal with land-grabbers, go to the English trade unions, and ask them how they deal with cowards and sneaks."

My hon. Friend went on to say—

"I just thought of a higher authority than Lord Salisbury upon the question of land-grabbing, and the words came back to my mind—the mighty words of Scripture—'Break not the bounds of the widow, and enter not into the field of the fatherless, for the Lord hath raised them up a kinsman whose arm is mighty, and he will avenge.' (Cheers.) The Lord has raised up for the homeless and defenceless Irish peasant; the Lord has raised up a friend whose arm is mighty. And I tell you that no law can deal with that power, because it is itself a law of nature. It is the first principle of self-preservation. For hundreds of thousands of the people of Ireland, no alternative, absolutely no alternative, for many of the homeless poor of Ireland, except the alternative of the blunderbuss. It is because I abhor and condemn crime in every form that I hope that every man and every woman in Tipperary will to-day enrol themselves as Primrose knights and Primrose dames, and take a leaf out of the Primrose book."

Sir, I say that a man is no man if he throws out unjust charges against an adversary who is unable to meet him, and denies him the right even of reading the charges levelled against him, but accuses him, upon garbled extracts, of inciting to assassination. Yet this is the kind of thing to which we are subjected in Ireland. That is the kind of war which is being carried out against the Nationalists, and I say that it is a method which will be known to all posterity as "Pigottism." Talk of calumny, and of insult, and of false accusations and slanders! I challenge the annals of political warfare to show anything like what has been levelled at our heads.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Member has brought against me the accusation, couched in violent language, that I accused Mr. O'Brien of inciting to murder. Now, I guarded myself against attributing any motives to Mr. O'Brien in the matter. My words were these—

"I say, without fear of contradiction, that a Government which should allow words like these to be uttered, with whatever intention on the part of the speaker, in a district in Ireland where there were evicted farms, might be making itself accessory to assassination."

The House will notice that I distinctly laid down that words like these might produce a collision. I adhere still to what I said; but I did not suggest that Mr. O'Brien had that intention, or any other intention, and I carefully guarded myself against it.

MR. DILLON: I want to know whether the right hon. Gentleman considers it consistent with his ideas of proper political conduct to have suppressed passages which would fully have explained what the action of Mr. O'Brien really was? I read all that he said, but I say that his purpose was to convey to the people of Manchester that Mr. O'Brien had incited to assassination. That is the only plain meaning that can be put upon his language. If not, why were these passages suppressed, and why was Mr. O'Brien punished? The words, taken by themselves, did not amount to the meaning sought to be put upon them; they were innocent words, and no man ought to be punished for using them. I am not at all surprised that the right hon. Gentleman should have concluded his speech at the Dublin banquet by remarking that these little excitements were soon forgotten, but that the powers of mendacity were by no means exhausted. When the right hon. Gentleman was driven into a corner upon the subject of prison treatment, he said that all Irish prisoners were treated in the same manner; that he could not give dispensations, but that the law required that all prisoners convicted of offences should be treated in the same way. Now, I say that that also is false. It is not true that all political prisoners are treated in the same way. I need only refer to the cases of the Belfast swindlers, and Mr. White, J.P., who was charged with cruelty to a child, to show that, while political prisoners are treated with relentless severity, offences committed by friends of the Government are treated with the greatest leniency. The Belfast swindlers were guilty of a disgusting crime; but the redeeming feature in their case was that one of them was the Secretary of the Association which got up the demonstration for the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain). He was a man—for I saw him on his trial—of a sanctimonious cast of countenance, and the evidence proved that he never appeared out of doors without a silk hat. The Crown exhausted every contrivance to protect the Belfast prisoners, and although the evidence was overwhelming, no pressure was used for a severe judgment. Consequently, these men, who were convicted of one of the most abominable crimes known in civilized life—namely, the insuring of a number of lives, forging certificates, and then supplying men with whiskey who were known to be in the habit of taking too much in order to kill them—men convicted of this atrocious crime were sentenced simply to six months' imprisonment. That is the kind of law and order that exists in Ireland. The prisoners were brought to Belfast Gaol and then ordered to be removed to Derry Gaol. When they emerged from Belfast Gaol to be removed to Derry they were dressed in their own clothes, and one of them, who is said to be the possessor of a fortune of £50,000, but was desirous of adding to it by nefarious practices, said he was cold, upon which the governor of the gaol said he would lend him his own overcoat. I do not state that as a positive fact, but such is my information. At Derry Gaol Mr. Alderman Bell, one of the visiting justices, visited the prisoners Dunlop and Matthews, and he reports that he found Dunlop reading and Matthews writing, and both were entirely satisfied with everything. The only thing they said they wanted was their liberty. Probably if they will send a petition to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham he will procure even that for them. Contrast this treatment with that of a Member of this House, whose only crime is that he has shown the spirit of a man, and has refused to desert his people in obedience to the dictates of the Lord Lieutenant. Mrs. Harrington writes to say, in reference to the treatment of her husband, that he was put to stone-breaking and chopping wood; that the skin was off his fingers with oakum-picking, and that he was driven in prison clothes from Tralee upon an outside car through the chief town of the constituency which he represents in this House, with no overcoat, and only an old blanket to use as a rug to cover him. She spoke to him for a moment and saw that his fingers were raw. See the contrast between the treatment of Mr. Harrington and that of the Belfast swindlers! But let me give another contrast. In December last, Mr. O'Shea, the Secretary of a local branch of the National League at Macroom, was accused of writing a threatening letter, and was sentenced to four months' imprisonment with hard labour. The charge against him was intimidation, and he was convicted, although the man to whom the letter was written came forward and swore that he was in no way intimidated. Here is a contrast. At Stapletown on the 1st of October, 1888, a member of the firm of Hussey & Co., well-known land agents, was charged with assaulting a common prostitute. The police were attracted by her screams, and arrested her assailant, whom they found lying in the hall exhausted. Mr. Gardner, R.M., convicted the offender, but thought the ends of justice would be satisfied by imposing a fine of £5. To make the picture complete, Mr. Gardner is the magistrate who passed a severe sentence upon the Kerry prisoners, against whom no offence whatever was proved. Is it wonderful, under such circumstances, that the people of Ireland should not respect the law? If I were to take the trouble to inquire, I could give numerous instances, but I will content myself with one, that of Adam White, J.P., of the County Leitrim, who is a member of the Loyal and Patriotic Party. This gentleman appears to have been in the habit of returning home drunk, and upon one particular night, when in that condition—a cold and wet night—he stripped a servant girl of 14 stark naked, beat her with all his might, and then kicked her out into the road. She was picked up out of a ditch by somebody who happened to pass. This respectable gentleman—I do not know whether he is not still a magistrate—was brought up before his fellow magistrates, who convicted him and sentenced him to six months' imprisonment without hard labour. Of course, his offence was nothing like so serious a one as that of Mr. O'Brien. Beating and turning a poor little girl out into the road on a cold night in Ireland is a loyal and respectable offence, and I am told that this worthy magistrate enjoys in gaol a glass of whisky every day, and is supplied with the Freeman's Journal. The right hon. Gentleman says that the powers of mendacity in Ireland are absolutely inexhaustible. If the right hon. Gentleman would spend a little more time in Dublin Castle, he would see for himself that that institution is capable of challenging any other in the whole world in misrepresenting and colouring Reports in accordance with its own wishes. And now let me say a word or two upon the question of the improvement of the condition of Ireland. The Chief Secretary seems to think that he utterly crushes us by announcing that the condition of Ireland is improving. Now, I fail to see what point he desires to make from that statement. He has boasted recently of different kinds of improvement, and particularly of improvements in the amount of agrarian crime. I admit this, to a certain extent, and I rejoice at it. The only difference between us is, that the right hon. Gentleman thinks it is due to his wonderful government of Ireland, whereas I say it is due partly to the Plan of Campaign, and partly to the action of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian. But there is another cause. Everybody knows that this has been a better year in England than it used to be, and so it has been in Ireland. The price of cattle has gone up enormously, and as that is one of our chief articles of supply, there has been an increase in railway dividends, and perhaps a momentary gleam of prosperity. But one of the terrible evils which presided over the fate of Ireland in the past, but which, by God's help, I trust will never curse them in the future was, that whenever periods of prosperity came and the price of cattle and stock rose, instead of being a blessing it became a moral curse to the labourer. I trust it is true that this time, at least, the poor and labouring classes may have some share in the advancing wave of prosperity, and, if so, I say that it is to be traced to the results of recent agitation. We have heard of periods of prosperity in Ireland before, and it was the custom for the Lord Lieutenant to come down and tell us ad nauseam of the rising tide of prosperity, predicting that Ireland would soon become the fruitful mother of flocks and herds. But although we were told that the prosperity of the country was rising by leaps and bounds, we heard also of the people flying to another country with hatred in their hearts—people who were destined to give you greater trouble in their new land than in their own. But if the condition of the Irish people has been improved by a rise in prices, it is not the Coercion Act that has increased the price of cattle—at least I have not heard that that result has been claimed for it yet. And now I come to another kind of improvement which is claimed to have taken place in Ireland—namely, the pacification of the people. I utterly traverse the statement of the right hon. Gentleman that the country has quietened down, and that peace and order have been restored where disorder prevailed before, or that a good feeling has been restored between the police and the people where ill-feeling prevailed before. But we have heard nothing this time of boycotted farms being taken; and I tell the right hon.

Mr. Dillon

Gentleman again that there is no foundation whatever for the statements made by himself and his colleague, the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, that boycotted farms have been taken or will be taken. He is not able to show that they are being taken, and therefore he did not allude to them. He says that, on the whole, the relations between the people and the police have improved. I utterly and absolutely deny it. Never in my experience of Irish politics—now some 13 years—do I remember as bad a feeling between the people and the police, and I could point to whole districts which, when the right hon. Gentleman came into office, were peaceable and quiet, with disturbance unknown, where the police and the people got on very well, which are now in a state of siege. Take the County of Donegal. When the right hon. Gentleman came into office, and before the Coercion Act was passed, that county was in an absolutely peaceable state. Now it is the most disturbed county in Ireland, and that disturbance has been brought about by the outrageous action, pig-headed opinions, and deliberate misconduct of the officers in charge of the county, who have done everything that human ingenuity could devise to bring about a collision between the police and the people. Let me say a word about the catastrophe which occurred there the other day. I feel bound to protest against the language used by the Chief Secretary in reference to Father M'Fadden and the prisoners who are about to be tried for murder. No doubt it was an unfortunate catastrophe and a painful occurrence, but nobody can form an accurate judgment with regard to the case unless, like us, he has watched the conduct of the police. Outrageous insults to the people have long been given at Gweedore by Inspector Martin and those under his charge, and now that they have culminated in the death of a police constable hon. Members opposite assume that they amount to murder. [Colonel SAUNDERSON: Hear, hear!] I know that that is the opinion of the hon. Member opposite. It may seem an audacious thing for me to say, but I utterly and absolutely deny that there has been any case of murder at all, according to the dying declaration of the constable who is now dead. The doctrine—and this is a matter upon which a great deal will be heard in England before the subject passes away—the doctrine attempted to be laid down by the Irish Executive is this and nothing less—that it is lawful for the police to attack peaceable people with deadly weapons without provocation, and that if the people so attacked strike a blow in self-defence, any death that may occur is murder. I deny that. I have always maintained that when an assault was made on the people in the square at Mitchelstown the people were perfectly entitled to resist, and according to sworn information I maintain that the people were entitled to resist the police at Gweedore. I am convinced that a grave and serious question will arise whether the people were not acting in self-defence and with perfect legality. If that be so, it is monstrous to assume that the police were acting within their legal right, and that the death of Inspector Martin was a murder. We know what the fate of the Nationalists is when the bloodhounds of the law, hounded on by the head of the Executive, who seems to forget every consideration of fair play, are let loose on the people. I believe that the arrest of Father M'Fadden was one of the wildest things that have ever happened in Ireland. The motive may have been to deprive the other prisoners of Father M'Fadden's evidence. At this moment the authorities are arresting every man and woman in the neighbourhood, so that the unfortunate prisoners may be able to call no evidence in their behalf. The police are sweeping the country night after night, and if to-morrow any man dare to come forward and say he was a witness of the transaction, he would immediately find himself in prison. I say that if there has been murder it is on the other side, and both in England and Ireland I shall continue to denounce the whole thing as a deliberate murder from beginning to end. What is the condition of Donegal? You found it peaceable; you have reduced the people to madness; flooded the country with police; and the last news is that a troop of dragoons is marching there, and that a gunboat employing the electric light is stationed off the coast. This is what you call concentration; and why is all this done? The forces of the Crown were refused to Lord Clanricarde, although he is threatening the Castle that he will levy an army of his own. Why is it that Mr. Olphert, in the North of Ireland, has police, dragoons, and a gunboat placed at his service? It is because Mr. Olphert is an aide-de-camp at the Castle, and on that account you have reduced the county of Donegal from a state of order to a state of turmoil. In all parts of the North and West of Ireland that I am acquainted with personally the feeling of the people is becoming worse day by day, and it will soon lead you to a point of serious difficulty. I am bound to say it would be very little to the credit of the Irish people if that feeling does not increase and become more bitter, because it has now become the absolute practice of the Irish Police, acting under the incitement of the Chief Secretary and Chief Magistrates like Colonel Turner, to assault in the rudest and roughest manner, and without notice, men who are perfectly peaceable, by drawing their batons. The doctrine which is being instilled into the Irish Police is this—“Wherever you see ahead, hit it; murder men; kill, if you have got a shadow of provocation, and we shall back you up in everything. No matter what you do, it will be condoned.” The right hon. Gentleman boasted a few days ago that he had unproclaimed several districts. Unfortunately for that boast, the right hon. Gentleman has, while unproclaiming several baronies, proclaimed seven more. And in this regard I will just point out a most striking illustration of the way in which Ireland can be, for political purposes, represented as either boiling over or quieting down, according as the Executive Officers in Ireland may desire. A few days ago the barony of Lower Dundalk was unproclaimed, and the Secretary of the League, Patrick Largin, was aggrieved that it should be unproclaimed. He wrote to the Freeman's Journal asking what they had done that the district should be unproclaimed, and stating that on the previous Sunday they enrolled 500 members of the League, and that at the meeting over 600 were present. They elected their officers, and the police stood round all the time, but did not attempt to interfere. “On Monday last,” he continues, “I sent £20 to the Central Branch, our subscription for our branch, and, as a proof of our branch's activity, we had bonfires all over the district a week ago to celebrate the re-instatement of a tenant in the parish of Coola, whose farm had been boycotted and kept vacant for seven years under the Coercion Act. The tenant was reinstated on his own terms, without a penny of arrears or costs, and at half the original cost. We are very anxious to do anything we can to deserve Mr. Balfour's attention, but what can we do with enemies who run away.” I have not the smallest doubt in my own mind that if the statistics of derelict farms relet, given by the Lord Lieutenant and Chief Secretary, were examined, this Coola farm would re-appear as one of the relet farms, and I have no doubt that the list given by the Lord Lieutenant of evicted farms relet includes farms to which we have got the tenants back on the original terms. The Chief Secretary is contented, it seems to me, with the result of his government in Ireland; and, from the bottom of my heart, I can say that I am contented also. No one who knows Ireland can deny for a single moment the proposition that the Chief Secretary has succeeded in making the Castle more hateful, if possible, than it ever was previously in Ireland. Whether his administration is successful or not depends entirely on the object which the right hon. Gentleman has in view. If his object be to exasperate the people, to inflict a certain amount of punishment, and to make the people detest him and all those who serve under him, I think he has achieved a measure of success. But if his object be to conciliate in Ireland any considerable party who will support what he calls union between the two countries and the Unionist Government, then, I say, a more deplorable and disastrous failure has not been recorded in the whole of Irish history. At no period in the history of Ireland has the Unionist Party stood lower than they stand to-day. If you had the courage of your convictions, and faced us at the polls to-morrow—you will have to do it sooner or later—the people of this country would then be able to realize how much progress your great, beneficent, and wealth-bringing Government has made in the affections of the people of Ireland. I had an extract, which I think I have mislaid, of the speech made by the right hon. Gentleman at the banquet in Dublin, which, I confess, made me laugh very heartily, because, in the course of that speech, the right hon. Gentleman said he had never, in the course of his political experience, addressed a more representative gathering. Complaints have been heard of a horrid outrage committed upon the banquetters. The atrocity was this—that the names of the guests were published. I understand that they had been going before the Courts in Dublin, weeping bitter tears, whining and groaning, and saying they never would have gone had they known their names were to be given. Let it be noted that this was the representative gathering of the “commercial and banking classes and leaders of the people” in Ireland—men who sneaked in, Crown Prosecutors, expectant place-mongers, and a very small sprinkling of those so-called mercantile men, who got the Chief Secretary, or whoever managed the banquet, to exclude the Press, nominally that the speeches might not be reported, but really that the names might not be published. If that is all the Unionist Party can show for themselves in Ireland their fortunes have reached a very low ebb. I do not think a more cruel illustration could be asked for of the great advance of the Unionist Government. Even when the Chancellor of the Exchequer went to Dublin they were not afraid to publish the names. We are getting on. But that is not all. Some of the great bank directors, who were alluded to, very much like the men in buckram, and whose names were not mentioned by the Chief Secretary, but were pointed out in camera as decorating the table at the representative banquet in Dublin, were questioned at the first subsequent meeting of shareholders, and they got up and apologized, and said they did not go there as directors, but under the impression that it was a private banquet, and that the names would not be published. I express no opinion as to the merits of the attacks that have been made on this banquet, but the opinion that I express is this—that it is a significant fact that the Leader of a Government with a thorough Executive at its back, with all the various machinery to bribe, to coerce, to conciliate the support, which is enjoyed to such an unparalleled extent by the Head of the Executive in Ireland, can gather around his board in an hour of crisis only so poor a body of men, whose greatest achievement was to roar with laughter when they heard of a political opponent having been knocked down and stripped naked, and who then were afraid to let their names be known to the Irish public.

*MR. FORREST FULTON (West Ham): I feel it is extremely difficult to expect the House to listen to one who does not claim to possess the great gift of eloquence of the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down; but there are some matters which I desire to refer to, and which appear to me of considerable importance, which have been touched upon by the hon. Member (Mr. Dillon) and the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Morley). The latter referred to the unfortunate occurrences at Gweedore, and the hon. Member (Mr. Dillon) said that he believed there was not the smallest authority for saying that under any circumstances the death of Inspector Martin could be the crime of wilful murder. There cannot, however, be the smallest possible doubt that the person or persons who caused Inspector Martin's death were guilty of the crime of murder. That matter has been placed beyond the possibility of controversy, because the subject was very thoroughly considered at the time of the murder of Sergeant Brett at Manchester, and Mr. Justice Blackburn and Lord Justice Mellor declined to grant a case on the ground that the point of whether or not the act was one of murder was too clear for argument, and in Mr. Justice Stephen's “Digest of the Criminal Law” it is set forth that when a constable or other person properly authorized acts in the execution of his duty the law casts a peculiar protection around him; and consequently, if he is killed in the execution of his duty, it is murder, even though there be such circumstances of hot blood and want of premeditation as would in ordinary cases reduce the crime to manslaughter. There cannot be the smallest doubt that Inspector Martin was murdered by some person or persons. That is the law of England and the law of Ireland. Now, the right hon. Gentleman, in support of his Amendment, quotes this case from the

picture complete, Mr. Gardner is the magistrate who passed a severe sentence upon the Kerry prisoners, against whom no offence whatever was proved. Freeman's Journal, an authority which we on this side of the House, at any rate, do not consider an absolutely trustworthy authority. It is that of a person called upon by the magistrate to find bail himself for £5, and two sureties for £2 each, to keep the peace, for having cheered Mr. O'Brien. The right hon. Gentleman submitted that this was not the law in England, and that no Home Secretary would venture to act so if it were. I must really remind the right hon. Gentleman that such a power is inherent in the ordinary Justice of the Peace, whether a Resident Magistrate in Ireland or an ordinary Justice in England. If he thinks the action of any individual is likely to provoke a breach of the peace, the magistrate is perfectly entitled, by virtue of his authority, to call upon that person to find sureties for the peace. It has nothing whatever to do with the Crimes Act. I agree that the Home Secretary has nothing to do with matters of that kind, except to advise Her Majesty when a person should be pardoned, but nobody ever said he had. Quoting other instances from the Freeman, the right hon. Gentleman said that one person was bound over for hissing Mr. Cecil Roche. If it be true that there never was a time when the relations between the people and the police were so strained as the hon. Member for East Mayo contends, will any hon. Member deny that a Justice of the Peace was right in so acting? The right hon. Gentleman also says that Colonel Turner ordered four policemen to charge among some youths, and beat them in a merciless way. I should like that statement to be verified. I do not believe a word of it. And the right hon. Gentleman's story that one person, for laughing at a constable, in default of finding sureties, was sent to gaol for three months, is one that requires investigation. Why did not the right hon. Gentleman investigate the charge before he came to the House and made the statement with all his authority as a Privy Councillor, and a man who may some day be Prime Minister for aught I know? When asked for an authority, all he could say was that it was not from the Freeman's Journal, and that he did not vouch for its accuracy. The next case the right hon. Gentleman came to was that of Mr. Harrington, and he commented upon the circumstance that the magistrate had promised to let Mr. Harrington off if he did not offend again. Anyone who has any experience of the administration of the law in this country knows very well that it is the ordinary practice of Chairmen of Quarter Sessions and of Her Majesty's Judges to abstain from passing any sentence at all upon the person convicted under certain circumstances, on their giving an undertaking not to offend again. Then, referring to the case of Mr. Harrington and Mr. Carew, the right hon. Gentleman alluded to their sentences, and said—"Just consider Mr. Carew gets four months and Mr. Harrington six." After 17 years' experience of the law of England, I, like many others, concur that there is nothing so unsatisfactory in the administration of it as the unequal sentences which are passed. One Judge may give five years' penal servitude for a crime for which another may give six months. Very often, to use a vulgar phrase, it is a "toss up" what sentence a prisoner gets. Then the right hon. Gentleman made reference to the fact of imprisoned Members being compelled to wear the prison dress when appearing as witnesses, while Delaney appeared before the Special Commission in his own clothes. I have never known an instance in which prisoners called upon to give evidence did not appear in prison dress.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: Why was Delaney not brought up in prison clothes?

MR. FULTON: I am not responsible for that. I am simply pointing out the fact.

MR. BRADLAUGH: Does the hon. Gentleman apply that to misdemeanants in this country, of which I know a dozen instances, or only to felons?

MR. FULTON: I am not aware of any distinction whatever between the case of a misdemeanant and a felon. I know of no instance in my experience of a convict giving evidence except in ordinary prison dress, save that of Delaney, to which reference is now made. The right hon. Gentleman said the history of this Parliament was one long fraud upon the constituencies. But what had the right hon. Gentleman to say about the hon. Member for the Cirencester Division of Gloucestershire (Mr. Winterbotham), who, in consideration of being a Liberal Unionist, was allowed a walk-over in his constituency? Now, that hon. Member, so far as I know, has never once supported the Government. He did not act like the hon. Member for West Edinburgh, who returned to his constituents when he found himself unable to support the policy of the Government. I do not altogether approve of some of the acts which have taken place in Ireland. It is unfortunate there should be so long a delay in instituting prosecutions in Ireland. We find Mr. Carew, for instance, making a speech in November, and he is prosecuted in the month of January. It is a very great pity that Mr. O'Brien should make a speech in the month of September, and that he should not be prosecuted until November. So far as I am concerned, I think it desirable, if the law is to be set in force, that it should be done as quickly as possible. I have been very much struck by the fact that during the last few months there has been a great increase in the number of Members of this House who have been sent to prison. I have asked myself, is there any special reason why that should be so, and I have come to the conclusion that there is a reason. It is this. For the first time since the Chief Secretary filled the position which he now holds, there were signs during the last Autumn Session that the hand of the Government was beginning to be relaxed. They were beginning to make distinctions between Members of this House who had offended against the law and persons who were not Members. They did so in two notable ways. When some time ago the Chief Secretary for Ireland was questioned in this House as to the practice of arresting Irish Members of Parliament on a warrant in this country he made an answer that, acting on the advice of the Law Officers of the Crown, he did so because the service of a summons granted in Ireland was not good service in England. Therefore, there was no other means of arrest except by warrant backed by a magistrate in this country. Last Session, out of humanity and a desire not to inconvenience Members of this House more than he could possibly help, he substituted the service of what was practically a worthless document—a summons. He granted that as a special favour to Members of this House. I am very strongly of opinion it is not the slightest use endeavouring to conciliate hon. Members opposite by any means of that sort. That was not all. There was another—a still more dangerous—departure from the straight and narrow road of absolute legality. Questions were pertinaciously asked by the Member for West Belfast as to whether the Chief Secretary would prevent service of processes during the continuance of the Autumn Session? I was of opinion then, and I am of opinion now, that the action of the Chief Secretary was most unfortunate and most unconstitutional. I do not think that there exists any power whatever in the Irish Attorney General of controlling a Court of Law in the execution of ordinary process, nor is any power of that kind possessed by the English Attorney General. I am quite sure that the Solicitor General (Sir Edward Clarke), whom I see here, would admit that he had no power to control a Court of Law as to when or how criminal process should be served. It seems to me that the Government, in these two things, showed signs of giving way. Signs of giving way on questions such as these are a great mistake, and the sooner we desist from giving way the better, because I am quite sure there is only one way of bringing this great contest to a successful close, and that is by continuing to walk in the straight and narrow road of absolute legality and Constitutional usage; to extend to all law-breakers alike the same even measure of justice, whether he be a Member of this House or a humble peasant. It is my firm conviction it is only by an impartial administration of the law that we can hope to be successful in the great battle which lies before us. I said, in the first speech I delivered in this House, we are standing on the threshold of a great controversy—a great battle. I am not afraid of it. As long as the Government stand to their guns, as long as they continue to act as they have hitherto acted—with these two exceptions—with absolute impartiality to all Her Majesty's subjects, I have the most perfect confidence in the ultimate result. I have confidence in the good sense, common justice, and common honesty of my fellow-countrymen. I believe, if we only continue to act with firmness and impartiality, we shall be successful when the time comes in the great battle we have to fight for the continued union of these kingdoms.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): The hon. and learned Gentleman who last spoke referred to the case of Mr. Edward Harrington, and he says it is by no means unusual for a magistrate to say practically to a prisoner, "If you will give an undertaking not to offend again, I will abstain from passing any sentence upon you." Well, Sir, I am not prepared to say that this is not occasionally done, but I think my hon. and learned Friend has completely mistaken the point of the criticism of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle. He complains not of the action of the magistrate in offering to inflict no punishment if a promise were given not to offend again, but because the magistrate made this offer in respect of an offence which, when the offer was declined, he considered that six months' hard labour was the only adequate punishment for. And I think that my hon. and learned Friend, with all his great experience at the criminal bar, would have very considerable difficulty indeed in extracting from the criminal annals in this country a parallel case. Again, my hon. and learned Friend referred in terms of indignation—I know not whether it was real or assumed, and it is not for me to say—to the votes which have been given in this House by the hon. Member for the Cirencester Division of Gloucestershire since his return in 1886. Mr. Speaker, these indignant expostulations which he levelled against my hon. Friend ought, with far greater propriety, to have been applied to his own hon. and gallant colleague, the hon. and gallant Member for the Bow and Bromley Division of the Tower Hamlets. Upon these points both these hon. Members are precisely in the same boat. In 1886 each of them pledged himself against Coercion, but the hon. Member for the Cirencester Division has been honest enough to keep his pledge, while the hon. and gallant Member for Bow has grossly violated his. The Irish Secretary complains of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, because he did not in his speech last night dilate upon the details of the notorious scenes which have occurred in Irish prisons, and he entered into explanations denying the accuracy of certain statements which have been published in regard to them. The denials of the Irish Secretary remind me of an incident related at a recent meeting of the Royal Geographical Society by one of our great travellers, who stated that he was visiting a tribe which was shrewdly suspected of cannibalism. He asked a lady member of the tribe whether she had ever eaten "white man," and she indignantly denied it; but presently, as if to relieve her conscience, added, "I have tasted soup made from him." There is one particular part of the right hon. Gentleman's speech to which I desire to refer. The right hon. Gentleman said that every person who had been punished in Ireland had been punished either for crime or for incitement to crime. Now, Sir, it seems to me that the crux of the whole controversy lies in this: What is incitement to crime? The Irish Secretary seems to have fallen into a great confusion of thought which led him to ask triumphantly, upon the one hand, whether dynamite outrages were political offences, and, on the other hand, why, when the Corrupt Practices Act was before this House, hon. Gentlemen on this side insisted that the offenders convicted under it should be treated as ordinary criminals. Now, I think that we, upon this side of the House, are not only willing, but we are anxious that everyone who, for instance, attempts to blow up this House, or who lays a finger upon the land-grabber in Ireland, shall be punished by the law and treated as an ordinary criminal. But when the right hon. Gentleman starts a quibble about incitement to crime, we have a right to ask that, at any rate, there should be established, clearly, connection between the incitement and the crime. The right hon. Gentleman has not been ashamed to throw at hon. Members who sit on these benches wholesale charges of incitement to crime. Well, Sir, there are historical instances, no doubt well known to the right hon. Gentleman, which I think should cause him to hesitate, and cause us to hesitate also, before we endeavour to connect crime with public action. It will be remembered that in 1843, during the Corn Law agitation, there was much disturbance and violence; and Mr. Drummond, the Secretary to the Prime Minister, was assassinated, as was generally believed, in mistake for the Prime Minister. Well, on the 17th February in that year, the Prime Minister came down to this House, and, standing at that Table, deliberately charged Mr. Cobden with having used language calculated or designed to incite persons to assassination, because, forsooth, Mr. Cobden had, at various conferences of the League, declared that he should hold the Prime Minister responsible for the condition of the country. I do not recall that incident to-night, Sir, in order to cast any slur on the illustrious memory of Sir Robert Peel. I quote it simply to show how ridiculously the best of men may be misled when once they surrender themselves to associate crime with the public utterances of their political opponents. I was surprised at the Irish Secretary's references to Daniel O'Connell. He described him as an Irish patriot; yet Daniel O'Connell was prosecuted by the Government of his day, and the Attorney General, who led the prosecution, made almost word for word the indictment which the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary has on this occasion charged against the hon. Member for Cork, against Mr. William O'Brien, and against their friends. I could quote many instances in which these charges against Mr. Parnell correspond with those levelled against Daniel O'Connell; it is the old interminable story. There is no abuse so foul—there is no imputation so base—but that it may be heaped upon the head of an Irish patriot whilst he lives; but when he has been some generations in his grave then he is canonized by the Times newspaper, and the great name of Daniel O'Connell suffers the indignity of being eulogized by the lips of the Irish Secretary to-day. And 20 years hence, if we could imagine this régime lasting so long, the successor to the Irish Secretary would rise in his place in the House, and would talk about the patriot Parnell then, as the right hon. Gentleman now talks about the patriot O'Connell. He would compare the patriot Parnell with the Leader of the Irish Party of that day, very much, of course, to that Leader's detriment. I had intended to address an earnest appeal to the Irish Secretary. I am sorry he is not in his place; but let me tell him that the course on which he has embarked can lead to no good. It is bad in its immediate effects; it will be infinitely worse in its ulterior effects. I hope to God that there will never be any Party in the State, when its turn comes to triumph, which will treat its political opponents as the Irish Secretary has treated his political opponents, and as he is treating them in the Irish prisons to-day. But, Mr. Speaker, this is not a visionary danger, for if there is one lesson which is to be learnt from history, it is that the effects of such a course as that which Her Majesty's Ministers are pursuing have an inevitable tendency to demoralize the people. I cannot hope that my words will produce the slightest effect upon the Irish Secretary or his Friends; but, as he has professed such great respect for Daniel O'Connell, let me then, in sitting down, warn him in the solemn words of the Irish patriot and orator. He said—

“You know not how soon and how bitterly the ingredients of your poisoned chalice may be commended to your own lips.”

MR. SWIFT MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.) rose, and an hon. Member having called attention to the number of Members present, the Speaker counted, and, 40 Members being in their places, the hon. Member proceeded:—The speech we have heard from the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite was in the usual form, and ran over the familiar lines, reminding me of those Jews mentioned by Josephus who ran about the streets of Jerusalem with cries of woe. The hon. and gallant Gentleman has repeated the substance of a speech he made at Portadown the other day, and more than 20 years ago I find a speech made in that same town prophesying, as the hon. Gentleman has, civil war. The dreaded cause then was the Disestablishment of the Irish Church. In May, 1868, the Rev. M. T. Ellis spoke in similar terms to the hon. and gallant Gentleman, declaring he and others would fight sword in hand and die for the cause in which their fathers had died, with the dying cry echoed from Earth to Heaven, “No Popery!” “No Surrender!” No partiacular result, however, followed all the talk in this strain. We are often told by the Chief Secretary, when he is engaged in defending his Coercion policy, and the statement seems to amply satisfy him, that Lord Spencer and Mr. Forster did the same thing. There was, no doubt, coercion in Mr. Forster's time, but there was a wide difference, in that it was not then a policy of exasperation. The policy of Coercion which was pursued by Lord Spencer and Mr. Forster produced great pain and suffering in Ireland, but the pain was also felt by the statesmen who adopted that policy. A policy of exasperation is a very different thing. I never admired Mr. Forster, but I respect his memory; and I may say that nothing would have induced him to adopt personal persecution towards his political opponents. The Chief Secretary has bestowed some praise upon O'Connell. Well, I do not know how O'Connell, if alive, would receive such praise; but I remember a remark he made in reference to a personal and jocular allusion of a Chief Secretary of his day, that it was "something like a sunbeam touching the brass plate of a coffin." With reference to the right hon. Gentleman's allusion to the men of '98, I may say that I have read and written much on the subject; and it is clear as any fact in history that the Government of the day goaded the people into rebellion. God forbid I should bring any such charge against the Ministers of to-day; but this I say, with some knowledge of the subject, that had that been your intention, you could find no better means of carrying it out than by your policy of the last three years. All the efforts of the Nationalist Party in Ireland—all the efforts of the Irish Leaders—would have been totally ineffective to allay the popular irritation, were it not that, for the first time in history, we have the support of the great Liberal Party. That alone prevents the Ireland of the present day becoming the pandemonium it was in 1798. We are the successors of the rebels of 1798, and are proud to be so. Many mistakes they may have made, but their motives were just, noble, and righteous. Again I refer to history, and declare that there was no attempt or idea of armed resistance in 1798 until all Constitutional agitation had failed. If the rebels of 1798 had had, as we have now, the head of the Liberal Party and the heart of England with them, they would have been content to wait until they received liberty, equality, and equal rights. The policy of conciliation has made these sometime rebels join hand and heart with the people of England. We have challenged your treatment of prisoners in Ireland, and you reply, there should be equal treatment in England and Ireland. Yes, there should; but there cannot be while your laws in the two countries are distinctly unequal and administered in a wholly different spirit. Where in England have you anything like the system of jury packing which, according to the Dublin Express, a Conservative paper, makes trial by jury in political or quasi-political offences a mere pretence? The hon. Gentleman the Member for Bodmin, the Chairman of Committees, says that in Ireland there is a great system working for justice and equity, although there are imperfections in its instruments. Who are the instruments of this system? They are simply the persons called Resident Magistrates. They are the pillars of the plank-bed system. They are the persons on whom the Government rely. They are, directly or indirectly, under the influence of the Crown, and these were selected to administer the Coercion Act. In England judicial officers are wholly independent of the Crown, but in Ireland they are dismissible at a moment's notice, and I assert that their decisions are not directly but indirectly influenced by the Crown, because human nature must be more than it ever will be if men whose means of livelihood are dependent on the favour of the Crown are not affected by that supreme consideration. These men are brought up from their counties to hold interviews with the Chief Secretary in Dublin Castle. No doubt the Chief Secretary said they did not come up to him for political purposes. What did they come up for then? Was it to talk about the weather, or the success or want of success of the Times trial? Disguise it as you may, these men went down to their districts to fulfil the behests, either expressed or implied, of their master, the Chief Secretary. The whole thing, as was said by Mr. W. O'Brien, is a grotesque and hideous farce. It will be within the Solicitor

General for Ireland's recollection that so far back as 1874 Mr. Cecil Roche was chosen auditor for the Session of Trinity College, and chose for the subject of his address an attack on Home Rule, and so violent was it that the Board of Senior Fellows actually took the extreme step of suppressing the address and not allowing the meeting to be held. And this was the man who was chosen to try Mr. W. O'Brien. Mr. Cecil Roche went into England at the recent election to speak for the Unionist Party, and it appeared from a correspondence in the newspapers that his hotel and travelling expenses were paid, and through whom? Through the hands of the distinguished Secretary of the Irish Loyal and Patriotic Union, Mr. Houston. Captain Seagrave, who represented the military order of judicial chivalry in Ireland, was appointed a Resident Magistrate in October, 1886, and he was in command of the forces at Mitchelstown when three human beings were killed. Now, I hold in my hand an extract from the Cape of Good Hope Gazette in which it is stated that Captain Seagrave's services are dispensed with from the Colonial Service. It can be got from the Agent General of the Cape of Good Hope, or I should think from the Colonial Office—for surely the document is one which should find a place there. Here is this man's dismissal. The House knows very well what is the meaning of a person's services "being dispensed" with. It does not mean being cashiered, but it means dismissal with a stigma. Well, I say, from this document, that the man who was in command of the military and police when these shocking occurrences happened at Mitchelstown was a man who had been dismissed from his post at the Cape with ignominy; and I ask are we, in order to administer law and order in Ireland, to take up the castaways of the Colonies? In cross-examination at the Coroner's inquest Captain Seagrave stated that he had had no legal training, that he had got his military training in South Africa, never having had a commission in the Home Army, and that, though he had tried three times to pass a military examination at home, he had failed on each occasion. This was the gentleman who has sentenced a priest to six weeks' imprisonment and a Member of Parliament to three weeks' imprisonment. The late Lord Rosse, in a conversation with Mr. Nassau Senior, said that one way to improve the magistracy was to get rid of Resident Magistrates, that no appointments were so infamously jobbed, and that no special education and no talents seemed to be necessary. This statement is strongly borne out by this incident of Captain Seagrave. At a loss to imagine how this young, inexperienced man came to be appointed to the Magistracy, I had recourse to "Burke's Landed Gentry," and I there found that Captain Seagrave was the son of a magistrate for three or four counties, and the brother-in-law of a well-known Unionist, circumstances which easily account for the singular appointment. And now, as a Representative of Donegal, I would speak just one word with regard to the shocking occurrence which occurred in the presence of Father M'Fadden. The arrest of this priest, and subsequently the arrest of Father Stephens, under the circumstances in which they took place, were peculiarly irritating to men who look to their priest as their only friend, their protector, and defender; and, I ask, why invest a hateful law with irritating and humiliating incidents which renders it ten times more hateful? I agree entirely with that part of the Amendment which says, that "this system is viewed with reprobation and aversion by the people of Great Britain." The right hon. Member for Newcastle winds up with recommending a policy of conciliation towards Ireland. I cannot but think that the right hon. Gentleman, when drawing up his Amendment, had in his mind the policy of that great man whose life he has written—Edmund Burke. If in the time of Lord North we had pursued the policy of conciliation advocated by Burke, the American Colonies would have been one with us to-day. Brinsley Sheridan long ago pointed out the fallacy of the assertion that there is no alternative between the Act of Union and total separation. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian has proposed the real solution of the Irish problem, and by that proposal has already wiped out from Irish hearts the memory of seven centuries of wrong.

*MR. F. S. STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye) said: It is not my intention to intervene for more than a very few minutes in the course of the debate, but I cannot refrain from expressing the opinion that the solidarity which exists between the Party above and the Party below the Gangway on this side of the House, so far from being diminished, is likely, on the contrary, to be greatly cemented by the review which has taken place in the course of these debates of the events which have transpired in Ireland during the last few months. Reference has been made in the course of the debate, and allusion has been made in the course of the discussions which have been going on throughout the length and breadth of the land, to the various points of this measure of Coercion ; but it appears to me that the methods by which this Act is being administered may be grouped under three heads. In the first place, we have attempts to impair the right of free speech, in so far as that right of free speech may be brought to bear on the right of combination ; in the second place, we have endeavours to impair the right of a free Press, in so far as freedom of the Press concerns the purposes of combination ; and, in the third place, we have attempts directed mainly and constantly against combination itself. Well, it seems to me, therefore, that, on all these grounds, we cannot altogether dissociate the agrarian from the political problem in Ireland. The treatment of political prisoners is, no doubt, one of the matters under the consideration of the House. But it seems to me that, in order to go to the root of the matter, we must consider the manner in which the Government have neglected on the one hand to attempt those remedies for agrarian grievances which are most urgently needed, and the manner in which they, instead of carrying out these remedies, have turned their attention to remedies which are in no way to be desired. Again and again it was urged last Session and the Session before that the great and principal grievance in Ireland at the present time was the fact that the question of arrears had been left open. It was urged that the Land Act of 1887, which was brought in as a companion measure to the Coercion Bill of that year, was merely intended for the purpose of gilding the pill. We were told that in that measure evictions were to be done away with, and also the question of arrears to be settled. But it turned out that, instead of evictions being done away with, processes were actually rendered more easy, inasmuch as in place of the first process, which formerly took place in the light of open day, and subject to public criticism, we had a surreptitious and hidden process substituted, by which the landlord, by merely sending out a writ in the shape of a registered letter, was able to turn a tenant into a caretaker, and thereby deprive him of all his property in improvements which law and custom declared to be as much his property as the land was the property of the landlord. Another thing we urged against the Act of 1887 was that it entirely failed to deal with the great grievance that was the bane of the poor districts of Ireland—namely, that owing to the millstone of arrears hanging round the necks of the tenants, the landlord had it in his power, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, to evict without compensation. Attempts were made below the Gangway on this side of the House, and also above the Gangway, to get that grievance remedied, but the only alternative which was offered by the Chief Secretary was that if the question of arrears were dealt with at all, the debts due to the shopkeeper would be treated exactly in the same manner as the debts due to the landlord. In making that offer the Chief Secretary was under the same error as the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for North Armagh was under when he compared the operation of the Plan of Campaign in Ireland to what it would be in Cheshire or Flintshire. He ignored the great and cardinal point concerning land in Ireland—namely, the dual ownership, Parliament having conferred on the tenant in that country certain rights of property in the land in connection with the improvements, which the tenant does not possess in this country. The alternative which the Chief Secretary offered was that the debts due to the shopkeeper should be dealt with on the same footing as the arrears of rent due to the landlord. That proposition of the Chief Secretary was, after all, simply a proposal that the shop-keeping Peter should be robbed of his just dues in order to pay the unjust dues of the landowning Paul. If any Commission at any time declares that the present rent of a tenant ought to be reduced 50 per cent, it is preposterous and altogether illogical not to give that Commission power to deal with arrears of rent, which ought, on that showing, to be equally unjust and exorbitant at the rent. All that the Chief Secretary proposes is that the arrears should be spread over a certain interval, which is no remedy at all, because, if the rent is unjust and exorbitant and cannot be paid, the arrears also are unjust and exorbitant and ought not to be paid. The Liberal Party have urged that it is necessary to deal with the question of arrears, and that the agricultural problem lies at the root of most of the disputes taking place in Ireland, and it has been shown again and again that most of the imprisonments which have taken place in that country under the Crimes Act have been connected, directly or indirectly, with some agrarian dispute. It seems to me that the conclusion to be drawn from that is that the administration of this Crimes Act should be reviewed side by side with the administration of the Land Act. We should judge the one by the other, and, doing that, we cannot fail to come to the conclusion that in all these attempts to suppress free speech, and to put down the freedom of the Press, and to put a stop to combination, the administrators of the Crimes Act have had in view the propping up of a system of landlordism unsuited to the needs of the country, and the outcome is a state of things which is against the feeling of justice which animates the great mass of the people, not only of Ireland, but also of England, and which ought at once to be done away with. The hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for North Armagh (Col. Saunderson), in the course of his speech to-night, gave vent to a certain amount of buffoonery and to a certain amount of braggadocio, but it seems to me that that buffoonery was considerably misplaced, and that that braggadocio, considering the events of the past few days, was particularly ill-timed. One point the hon. and gallant Member appeared to lay most stress upon was the way in which political prisoners had been treated under the Crimes Act. He endeavoured to dispute the statement made on this side of the House, that the treatment of the Nationalist Members was of a different character to the treatment of other offenders, such, for instance, as those mentioned in the subsequent speech of the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. Dillon)—those Orange offenders of the City of Belfast, but I do not think the hon. and gallant Gentleman is very successful. It appears to me, therefore, that not only ought we to consider the question in its agrarian aspect, but we should bear in mind the object the Crimes Act has in view, and the peculiarly unjust and preposterous way in which that Act has been administered, and the vindictive spirit which has been shown to certain individuals. On a previous occasion I took the opportunity of referring to a case that had attracted my notice in a special degree, and that was the case of Mr. John Roche. This man was arrested three times for various crimes within a short space of time, and similar vindictiveness was displayed in the case of Mr. E. Harrington. Although the magistrates could not prove Mr. Harrington guilty of making an illegal speech, they could prove him guilty of having reported one, and that was the ground upon which they visited him with the most severe imprisonment it was possible for them to inflict. There was a vindictive sentence of six months' imprisonment with hard labour passed upon him. The policy of exasperation has been persistently pursued in Ireland by the present Administration; but they are acting like drowning men catching at straws, for they know that after their present lease of power terminates, never again will they have an opportunity of trying the policy of coercion. The events which have occurred within the last few days tend to show that the policy of resistance to justice and liberty is mainly directed to the maintenance of landlordism. The speech of the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh shows that there still exist in Ireland some of those whose scruples may be perfectly conscientious, but which can only be attributed to a spirit of bigotry which ought to have disappeared long ago. If the policy of the Government is supported on the one side by bigotry and bigots, it is also supported on the other by pigotry and Pigotts. The solidarity of the alliance intervene for more than a very few minutes in the course of the debate, but I cannot refrain from expressing the opinion that the solidarity which exists between the Party above and the Party below the Gangway on this side of the House, so far from being diminished, is likely, on the contrary, to be greatly cemented by the review which has taken place in the course of these debates of the events which have transpired in Ireland during the last few months. Reference has been made in the course of the debate, and allusion has been made in the course of the discussions which have been going on throughout the length and breadth of the land, to the various points of this measure of Coercion; but it appears to me that the methods by which this Act is being administered may be grouped under three heads. In the first place, we have attempts to impair the right of free speech, in so far as that right of free speech may be brought to bear on the right of combination; in the second place, we have endeavours to impair the right of a free Press, in so far as freedom of the Press concerns the purposes of combination; and, in the third place, we have attempts directed mainly and constantly against combination itself. Well, it seems to me, therefore, that, on all these grounds, we cannot altogether dissociate the agrarian from the political problem in Ireland. The treatment of political prisoners is, no doubt, one of the matters under the consideration of the House. But it seems to me that, in order to go to the root of the matter, we must consider the manner in which the Government have neglected on the one hand to attempt those remedies for agrarian grievances which are most urgently needed, and the manner in which they, instead of carrying out these remedies, have turned their attention to remedies which are in no way to be desired. Again and again it was urged last Session and the Session before that the great and principal grievance in Ireland at the present time was the fact that the question of arrears had been left open. It was urged that the Land Act of 1887, which was brought in as a companion measure to the Coercion Bill of that year, was merely intended for the purpose of gilding the pill. We were told that in that measure evictions were to be done away with, and also the question of arrears to be settled. But it turned out that, instead of evictions being done away with, processes were actually rendered more easy, inasmuch as in place of the first process, which formerly took place in the light of open day, and subject to public criticism, we had a surreptitious and hidden process substituted, by which the landlord, by merely sending out a writ in the shape of a registered letter, was able to turn a tenant into a caretaker, and thereby deprive him of all his property in improvements which law and custom declared to be as much his property as the land was the property of the landlord. Another thing we urged against the Act of 1887 was that it entirely failed to deal with the great grievance that was the bane of the poor districts of Ireland—namely, that owing to the millstone of arrears hanging round the necks of the tenants, the landlord had it in his power, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, to evict without compensation. Attempts were made below the Gangway on this side of the House, and also above the Gangway, to get that grievance remedied, but the only alternative which was offered by the Chief Secretary was that if the question of arrears were dealt with at all, the debts due to the shopkeeper would be treated exactly in the same manner as the debts due to the landlord. In making that offer the Chief Secretary was under the same error as the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for North Armagh was under when he compared the operation of the Plan of Campaign in Ireland to what it would be in Cheshire or Flintshire. He ignored the great and cardinal point concerning land in Ireland—namely, the dual ownership, Parliament having conferred on the tenant in that country certain rights of property in the land in connection with the improvements, which the tenant does not possess in this country. The alternative which the Chief Secretary offered was that the debts due to the shopkeeper should be dealt with on the same footing as the arrears of rent due to the landlord. That proposition of the Chief Secretary was, after all, simply a proposal that the shopkeeping Peter should be robbed of his just dues in order to pay the unjust dues of the landowning Paul. If any Commission at any time declares that the present rent of a tenant ought to be reduced 50 per cent, it is preposterous and altogether illogical not to give that Commission power to deal with arrears of rent, which ought, on that showing, to be equally unjust and exorbitant at the rent. All that the Chief Secretary proposes is that the arrears should be spread over a certain interval, which is no remedy at all, because, if the rent is unjust and exorbitant and cannot be paid, the arrears also are unjust and exorbitant and ought not to be paid. The Liberal Party have urged that it is necessary to deal with the question of arrears, and that the agricultural problem lies at the root of most of the disputes taking place in Ireland, and it has been shown again and again that most of the imprisonments which have taken place in that country under the Crimes Act have been connected, directly or indirectly, with some agrarian dispute. It seems to me that the conclusion to be drawn from that is that the administration of this Crimes Act should be reviewed side by side with the administration of the Land Act. We should judge the one by the other, and, doing that, we cannot fail to come to the conclusion that in all these attempts to suppress free speech, and to put down the freedom of the Press, and to put a stop to combination, the administrators of the Crimes Act have had in view the propping up of a system of landlordism unsuited to the needs of the country, and the outcome is a state of things which is against the feeling of justice which animates the great mass of the people, not only of Ireland, but also of England, and which ought at once to be done away with. The hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for North Armagh (Col. Saunderson), in the course of his speech to-night, gave vent to a certain amount of buffoonery and to a certain amount of braggadocio, but it seems to me that that buffoonery was considerably misplaced, and that that braggadocio, considering the events of the past few days, was particularly ill-timed. One point the hon. and gallant Member appeared to lay most stress upon was the way in which political prisoners had been treated under the Crimes Act. He endeavoured to dispute the statement made on this side of the House, that the treatment of the Nationalist Members was of a different character to the treatment of other offenders, such, for instance, as those mentioned in the subsequent speech of the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. Dillon)—those Orange offenders of the City of Belfast, but I do not think the hon. and gallant Gentleman is very successful. It appears to me, therefore, that not only ought we to consider the question in its agrarian aspect, but we should bear in mind the object the Crimes Act has in view, and the peculiarly unjust and preposterous way in which that Act has been administered, and the vindictive spirit which has been shown to certain individuals. On a previous occasion I took the opportunity of referring to a case that had attracted my notice in a special degree, and that was the case of Mr. John Roche. This man was arrested three times for various crimes within a short space of time, and similar vindictiveness was displayed in the case of Mr. E. Harrington. Although the magistrates could not prove Mr. Harrington guilty of making an illegal speech, they could prove him guilty of having reported one, and that was the ground upon which they visited him with the most severe imprisonment it was possible for them to inflict. There was a vindictive sentence of six months' imprisonment with hard labour passed upon him. The policy of exasperation has been persistently pursued in Ireland by the present Administration; but they are acting like drowning men catching at straws, for they know that after their present lease of power terminates, never again will they have an opportunity of trying the policy of coercion. The events which have occurred within the last few days tend to show that the policy of resistance to justice and liberty is mainly directed to the maintenance of landlordism. The speech of the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh shows that there still exist in Ireland some of those whose scruples may be perfectly conscientious, but which can only be attributed to a spirit of bigotry which ought to have disappeared long ago. If the policy of the Government is supported on the one side by bigotry and bigots, it is also supported on the other by pigotry and Pigotts. The solidarity of the alliance which exists between the Party below and the Party above the Gangway, instead of being weakened by what has occurred, ought to be cemented more closely by the revelations of that policy which have been placed before us by the Chief Secretary. Probably no more humiliating spectacle was ever witnessed in this House than the attitude of the Chief Secretary in the course of the speech of the hon. Member for East Mayo. The hon. Member proved conclusively that in his letter to Mr. Armistage the right hon. Gentleman was guilty of a culpable suppressio veri, and we can only form our own conclusions in regard to the proceedings of the Government when we find that the Chief Secretary is unable to refute accusations of that kind. I think we can already see the dawning of a brighter and a happier day, when all this policy of exasperation and vindictiveness will be swept away. In one instance an hon. Member of this House (Mr. Finucane) was convicted and sent to prison because he had listened without remonstrance to a speech made by another person, and was therefore taken to be a consenting party to it. Surely it is absurd to expect every person who happens to be upon a platform at a public meeting to get up one after another and refute and contradict the statements of other speakers. Let me mention an instance which shows how this principle might be made to apply to the Chief Secretary himself. Not long ago the right hon. Gentleman attended a Conservative demonstration at Staleybridge, and in the course of his speech he took occasion to mention the name of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian. Voices were immediately heard in the crowd. I suppose, if it had taken place at a Liberal meeting, the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh would have said they came from disciples of the hon. Member for Mayo, and therefore we on this side are justified in saying that they were the voices of the disciples of the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh. The voices, on the name of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian being mentioned, called out, "Shoot him." If the same course had been taken as that which was taken in the case of Mr. Finucane, a charge might have been preferred against the Chief Secretary of having connived, by a tacit assent, at the suggested assassination of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian, and it would be impossible for any man to escape responsibility for speeches, innocent or otherwise, that were made by other persons who addressed a meeting from the same platform. Every man who speaks ought only to be responsible for what he says himself, and that such a charge should have been made against Mr. Finucane shows, in my opinion, how far the policy of vindictiveness and exasperation is being carried out. For these reasons I heartily concur in the Amendment moved by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, believing that it would be highly inopportune for the House, by its vote or by its silence, to consent to the felicitations contained in Her Majesty's Speech on the improvement in the state of Ireland.

*MR. W. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): The speech of the hon. Member for South Donegal (Mr. Mac Neill) contained a most unfair attack upon the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary. It must be remembered that the right hon. Gentleman occupies an extremely difficult position, and a position of great responsibility, seeing that he has to contend with those who, the hon. Member for South Donegal tells us, are the successors of the rebels of 1798. That is the position which the hon. and learned Member has proudly asserted for himself. It is not to be supposed that the right hon. Gentleman can fight those persons with kid gloves. The object of the Members below the Gangway and their associates above the Gangway is sometimes forgotten. It is therefore necessary to advert to occurrences and speeches which are now conveniently overlooked, and to recall to the memory of the House that the comparatively mild utterances of some hon. Members in this House, and before English and Scotch audiences, are very different from the utterances of the same gentlemen in Ireland, where it has been plainly pointed out that the object of the confederacy which the Chief Secretary has to contend with is to sever the links that bind Ireland to England. The hon. Member for South Donegal, in claiming to be a successor of the rebels of 1798, conveniently forgot that their great object was to establish a Republic in Ireland on the model of the French Republic, and that their efforts at all times were directed not to the formation of a Parliament that would profess loyal allegiance to the Crown of England, but to separate the Government of Ireland altogether from that of the United Kingdom. It is sometimes convenient to forget history, and the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian, in asking us to study history for ourselves, seems to consider that history ought to be re-written, and that the records of the rebels of '98 ought either to be blotted out, or that their rebellion against lawful authority should be treated as if it were a meritorious act. When the right hon. Member for the Bridgeton Division (Sir G. Trevelyan) was Chief Secretary, and I occupied a subordinate position in connection with the Irish Fishery Department, he was pleased to write me a letter in which he stated that the Members of the Conservative Party had rendered him most loyal assistance in carrying on the government of the country. His allusions to the gentlemen who are now his associates were not of so complimentary a character. It is convenient sometimes to forget these things, and perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would now like to blot out the memory of the services rendered to him by the Conservative Party in Ireland when he was abused, and vilified, and calumniated by the Members of the Nationalist Party.

DR. COMMINS (Roscommon, S.): I rise to a point of order. Is it competent for the hon. Gentleman to say that a right hon. Gentleman has been slandered by Members of this House?

MR. SPEAKER made no reply; and—

*MR. JOHNSTON continued: The hon. Member has a most convenient memory if he can forget the columns of United Ireland, and how bitterly the right hon. Member for the Bridgeton Division was vilified in them when he filled the Office of Chief Secretary. There is scarcely any slander against the present Chief Secretary which was not even more bitterly indulged in against the right hon. Member for the Bridgeton Division. It is not necessary that I should say a word in defence of my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for North Armagh, but I may be permitted to say that there is a solid and compact organization in Ireland, having its ramifications throughout the British Empire, which is resolutely determined to stand by the integrity of the Union of the British Empire and the honour of the Crown. My hon. and gallant Friend was accused by the last speaker of indulging in buffoonery and braggadocio in remarks he has made as to the attitude that will be taken by the loyal population of Ulster in the event of an Irish Parliament attempting to legislate for them. Perhaps it is well that I should mention on this occasion that, when the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian seemed likely to attain his object, and to establish in Ireland the Parliament which has been so long asked for by the Parnellites, I and my Friends were preparing actively and energetically for all eventualities, and that men were sending in their names who were perfectly prepared to justify by action the words which were uttered. It would have been very easy for the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh, if such a Parliament had been established, to have placed 50,000 men in opposition to the successors of the rebels of '98. There is one portion of the policy of Her Majesty's Government with regard to Ireland which I am not altogether prepared to justify. I think they ought to interfere with the entirely unlicensed liberty of Press publication in Ireland. In former days, when rebellion and sedition were rampant in the land, the Press was interfered with, and those who incited to acts of sedition were prevented from promulgating in the pages of the newspapers those seditious doctrines which have caused so much mischief in that country. I hope the utterances of hon. Members opposite in this House or in the country will not cause the nation to forget the object they have had in view, which they have seldom hesitated to express when they truly spoke their sentiments, and did not cover their purpose with expressions which were intended to disguise and not to reveal their intentions. The object of hon. Members opposite and those who are associated with them is the dismemberment of the Empire. It is all very well to talk about promoting a better feeling between the two countries. Humbug is not a Parliamentary expression, and therefore I will not use it—[laughter—I think there are some hon. Members opposite who must indulge in laughter when they think of the ready credence which is given to their professions of friendship for this country. The right hon. Member for Mid Lothian has done more to bring about the disruption and the disintegration of the Empire than a foreign foe could have done in 50 years. Hon. Members below the Gangway opposite now pose in a new attitude as friends of the British Empire. Not so long ago, at certain meetings, the Mahdi was cheered because he was the enemy of England, and in the time of the Indian Mutiny the name of the devil was cheered by disloyalists in Ireland. I do not mean to suggest that that personage is the friend of the hon. Gentlemen opposite. A too ready applause is given to anyone at home or abroad who declares himself the enemy of England, and desirous of bringing about her downfall. In my opinion, the course right hon. and hon. Members opposite have adopted and the policy they have sanctioned will bring about in its eventuality the greatest curse to the country, and, if successfully carried out, it will involve the British Empire in ruin. I cannot help thinking that those who support it, either treacherously or timorously, deserve the reprobation of those who desire to see the great British Empire progressing, in the interests of humanity; and not its right arm paralyzed in a day of difficulty and danger, when we ought to be solid and united for the coming conflict, and when the efforts of all earnest and honest citizens ought to be given to promote the safety, honour, and welfare of the dominions of the Queen.

MR. ATHERLEY-JONES (Durham, N.W.): There was one speech made to-night which, I think, the House could not help hearing with regret.—I mean the speech of the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh. I do not think the tone of that speech was such as to afford any hope that the hon. and gallant Gentleman himself would approach this question at any time, in the course of his career, in a rational and statesmanlike manner. It seemed to me—and I cannot help thinking that my hon. Friends below the Gangway share that opinion—to be a speech more suited to an enthusiastic audience at an Orange meeting in the North of Ireland than to a deliberative Assembly. I do not propose to reply to the speech of the hon. and gallant Member, but with the permission of the House my observations will be addressed to the consideration whether the treatment which has been adopted by this Government towards certain Liberal Members is that which we ought to have expected from any Government representing the democracy of this country. The Chief Secretary, in a speech which was, undoubtedly, of considerable ability, conceded one point which I think, to a large extent, demolished his answer to the charges which have been made against him. He conceded that Mr. O'Brien and his friends, who are now in prison, are political offenders, and he conceded also that those Gentlemen have been actuated by the highest possible motives—namely, that they have obeyed the dictates of their conscience. Now my contention is—and I think it will find a response throughout the country—that political offenders should receive a totally different treatment from that to which ordinary prisoners are subjected. The difference should not be in the severity, but in the form of the punishment. The political offender should not be submitted to any punishment which is inconsistent with the moral nature of his offence and the objects which he has in view. You may have to take the life of a man, but there is no reason why you should scalp him or mutilate him. The Chief Secretary is, I think, the first responsible English Minister who has refused to recognize the widely marked difference which ought to exist between political offences and ordinary crime. Some time ago I placed on the paper a Motion for a Return of the treatment of political offenders, but it has been intimated to me by Her Majesty's Government that do not intend to grant it. Yet I may observe that a Return, which was moved for in similar terms nearly 50 years ago, was granted by the Minister of that day. I am told that the main objection to the Return is the difficulty of defining political offences. In the year 1840, and for many years antecedent, there was a great amount of social and political disturbance in this country, and in the year I have mentioned a large number of persons were imprisoned for political offences. These prisoners were not the gentlemen wearing broadcloth, of whom we have heard to-night, nor were they distinguished and eloquent Parliamentarians. They belonged to such humble classes as those of the North Country miner and the Metropolitan labourer; and I find, among the offences of which they were convicted, and for which they were committed to gaol for various terms, there were such as the one I am about to cite. One man was convicted of having stolen a shot-belt, gun, and ammunition—an offence which certainly does not compare favourably with that of which Mr. O'Brien has been convicted, and yet that prisoner—a poor, humble man, belonging to the working class—was allowed privileges which are altogether denied to Mr. O'Brien. For instance, he had the free use of pen, ink, and paper, was allowed to read the daily newspapers, and was also permitted to partake of food of a much superior character to that served out as the dietary of the ordinary prisoners. Beyond this, he was allowed to see his friends, almost at will, and, further, was permitted—this being no small matter, when we consider, by the light of what has lately happened, what personal degradation means—to wear his own clothes. There was another case—and I will not weary the House with numbers of others that might be gone into—in which a man was imprisoned for having entered, or attempted to enter, and partly demolished a dwelling house. He, also, belonged to the labouring class, and, while undergoing the punishment accorded to him, was permitted to enjoy the same exceptional treatment, the same favours and alleviations, as were allowed in the case of the prisoner I have already mentioned. I will only add on this point that I hold in my hand a list, extending over almost every county in England, and a large number of counties in Ireland, in which men were convicted of political offences of a gravity at least equal to that of Mr. O'Brien, and were treated, while in confinement, with the greatest consideration and kindness. This being the case, I want to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary—or, as he is now absent from the House, either of the subordinate officials on the front bench opposite, why it is that a different punishment to that meted out by the then Conservative Government is to be persisted in, at the present time, by another Conservative Administration? I say, without fear of contradiction, that the action of the Government in this matter is a scandal and a disgrace. You have the means of classifying, in an easy and facile manner, what are known as political offences, as against those that are non-political; and, consequently, there can be no justification, from the historical aspect of the case, of the treatment to which you are subjecting Mr. O'Brien. I would ask the right hon. Gentleman opposite, seeing that he has now returned to his place, what is the object of this treatment? What rational purpose can it be expected to serve? Does the Chief Secretary suppose that Mr. O'Brien, when out of prison, will be more loyal, or that he will, in the smallest degree, be intimidated, by the punishment he will have undergone, from continuing the course he has, in my opinion, the greatest justification for pursuing? There is not a man sitting here among the Irish Members who is at all likely to be intimidated, by the gross and barbarous punishment accorded to Mr. O'Brien, from adopting the same line of conduct as has been followed by that hon. Gentleman. Does the Chief Secretary suppose that Mr. O'Brien's treatment will be likely to impress the Irish people generally with a sense of fear; or, on the other hand, that it will in any way tend to conciliate them in their attitude towards the present Government? If you look through the daily papers—even the now much discredited Times newspaper—you will find a record presented day by day of the enthusiasm and devotion of the Irish people, who have been worked up almost to fever heat by reason of the gross treatment dealt out to the champions of their cause; and I say, unhesitatingly, that there can be no surer way of continuing and intensifying the existing agitation than the course Her Majesty's Government are at present pursuing. I may also say that, even on the Ministerial side of the House, there are a large number of the Government followers who disapprove of their policy in this respect, and from whom, in private converse, one learns that they believe the Government to be now committing a great tactical error. We, who have nothing to do with their tactical error, say to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary that he is carrying out a course of policy which is entirely obsolete and out of harmony and sympathy with the dictates of modern statesmanship. I freely admit that there may have been exaggerations on our side and also indiscretions, and I further freely admit that the right hon. Gentleman has made the best use of them he could. When, however, the right hon. Gentleman alludes to the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. T. Healy) as having used somewhat indiscreet language towards a magistrate before whom he appeared as counsel for Mr. O'Brien, I ask him, as an English lawyer, can he bring himself to conceive a case in which an English magistrate would be found arguing and recriminating with a counsel as to whether he ought to call a man a colonel or not? The absurdity and idiocy and indecency of the proceeding go far to justify, or, at any rate, to excuse the retort made by the hon. Member for Longford. With regard to what has been said with reference to the action of County Court Judges in Ireland, I may state that I have had the honour of conversing with an English judge, not at all in sympathy with Home Rule, or what I may call the tactics of the Irish Party, and he told me that it was contrary to the elementary principles of justice that a man's imprisonment should be increased on appeal. I say that the policy pursued by the Government is a policy which shocks the consciences of the people. It is all very well to punish offences, but when the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary admits they are political offences, and that the men of whom he speaks are actuated by the highest motives in doing what they have done—

MR. BALFOUR: I did not say so.

MR. ATHERLEY-JONES: The right hon. Gentleman stated that he believed they acted from conscientious motives; and, if conscientious motives are not the highest motives, I am at a loss to understand what else they can be.

MR. BALFOUR: I do not think I ever committed myself to any expression of opinion as to conscientious motives. I spoke of political motives.

Mr. Atherley-Jones

MR. ATHERLEY-JONES: At any rate, I would ask, is it not a gross outrage on the common sense of the House to suggest that Mr. O'Brien and other Irish Members are not actuated by conscientious motives; and, if the right hon. Gentleman conceives that they have been actuated by conscientious motives, I would recommend him to read what has been written by his predecessors in England—men holding a similar office to that which he now fills with regard to Ireland. Let him read what was written by the Marquess of Normanby, and by other men holding a similar post, who, in giving directions to the Justices having the administration of prisons, insisted that the greatest tenderness and consideration should be exercised towards all political prisoners. We do not quarrel with the fact that punishment is awarded for political offences; but we do quarrel with the unnecessary degradation that is inflicted on political prisoners by Her Majesty's Government. We say that, in our opinion, it is intolerable that a man like Mr. O'Brien should be ruthlessly assaulted by prison warders, and compelled to submit to the injury and humiliation to which he was subjected; and, in conclusion, I warn the right hon. Gentleman that the course he is pursuing is one that can only end in absolute and complete disaster to the Government. I give him this warning, coming, as I now do, from addressing a public meeting, and bearing in mind the sympathetic English cheers raised by the people there assembled when I told them how Mr. O'Brien has been treated—cheers that were a monition to me that the time will arrive, be it soon or late, which will undoubtedly bring forth this result, that Her Majesty's present Government will be ejected from office by an overwhelming majority of the people.

*SIR G. TREVELYAN: Sir, those who have been present during the early hours of the debate may in some respects consider themselves remarkably fortunate, because they have been able to see the Irish difficulty in a nut-shell. Any one who witnessed the duel between the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh (Colonel Saunderson) and the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon) must have had a very shrewd idea of the difficulties of Ireland. On one side of the House we have had the Member for North Armagh giving vent to a series of propositions incredibly insulting to the great majority of his fellow-countrymen. He said that, if their chosen Representatives got into gaol, he should never let them out, and that he would not line the ditches of Ireland because he would keep them to throw his political opponents into. He also said that the great advantage of the Crimes Act was that it was permanent. It is significant to observe that that sentiment did not elicit a single cheer from the crowded benches round him, although his friends are only too ready to laugh and cheer when they see an opportunity. I think that what would throw the greatest light on the difficulties of Ireland is the nature of the hon. Member's jeers and sneers at Mr. O'Brien. I saw, when looking up to the Gallery, Lord Spencer watching the proceedings with some interest. I could not but wonder what Lord Spencer would have thought, when he was responsible for the destinies of Ireland, if he had heard one of his leading supporters talking in the same tone of levity of the sufferings which had been inflicted upon one of the Representatives of the country he had to govern. When the hon. and gallant Gentleman sat down, the crowded benches on the opposite side at once emptied, and only one Party remained to hear an Irish Member who was second scarcely to any of his colleagues in eloquence, and certainly second to no Irish or English Member in his power of crowding important facts into the compass of a speech. Hon. Members opposite refuse the Representatives of Ireland any other place in which they may express their views about the government of their own country; and, when they rise to express those views here, they will not stay to hear them. We have been told by the greatest of American statesmen that the government we should aim at is the government of the people by the people and for the people; but the present is the government of the majority through the minority for the minority. I wish, however, to refer to the speech of the Chief Secretary last night—a speech made at a great crisis in the history of the nation he has to govern. That speech put before the House the full views, I presume, and the full policy of the Government, and showed Ireland what she has to expect in the present and what hope she has for the future. I congratulate the House on having got rid of the line of argument which many of us have had to pursue during the last two years. There is an end from the mouth of the Chief Secretary of defending his policy by quoting similar, or nearly similar, actions of former Governments; and with twenty-five Irish Members in prison, or recently come out of prison, or on their way to prison, not as first-class misdemeanants, but as common criminals, I think these references to any former Government might well be a thing of the past. The right hon. Gentleman's speech was not devoid of personalities, and what it wanted in tu quoques he made up in charges of inaccuracy. With what grace did those charges come from a Minister who had just had the dressing which the right hon. Gentleman has received from the Member for East Mayo! The Chief Secretary began his speech with a well-known rhetorical device. He said—

“ You put up your Leader on Irish questions to state the indictment against the Government. Then the Chief Secretary, as the man principally implicated, follows; but you wait to make your charges until he has sat down, and when he has no power of reply.”

I think that was a very undeserved charge. From the first word to the last the noble and eloquent speech of my right hon. Friend (Mr. John Morley) was packed close with the most damning facts, placed in the very clearest light, and spoken without the slightest circumlocution. The main point of the Chief Secretary's speech turned on the question of his prisoners. The circumstances of the arrests has varied, but there is one thing common to all. They have always been carried out so that they might give as great a shock as possible to the greatest amount of sentiment and feeling. If a place could be found where an Irish Member has endeared himself to the community or distinguished himself by political action, that has been the place chosen for his arrest. One hon. Member (Mr. Kilbride) had domesticated himself at Leicester, and had many friends there. It was at Leicester he was arrested. The Member for South Galway came to Govan and made his mark, and he was arrested almost in sight and hearing of the people with whom he had influence. Mr. O'Brien was arrested at Manchester, and Mr. Carew at the house of a candidate whose election he had come to assist. The Chief Secretary claimed that the Government are not responsible for the circumstances of these arrests. The Government are responsible to the House of Commons; and the Government deliberately encouraged the police in this sense of public duty which was so severely commented on by the Northern Whig. Not content in the earlier part of last Session with dogging the precincts of the House of Commons and arresting sometimes the right, sometimes the wrong, Member at the door, an Irish constable at last presented a summons within the precincts of the House itself. A Committee of the House was appointed to consider the question, and they found that a breach of privilege had been committed. [An hon. MEMBER: An idiotic Committee.] No, it was not an idiotic Committee; it was an extremely good Committee; it had, I believe, a majority of supporters of the Government upon it; and it presented a Report to the effect that the administration had been lax. But the Government used its majority on both sides of the House to insist that that Report should not be adopted, and by that course they sanctioned this outrageous conduct on the part of the police, and as much as in them lay encouraged them to the still greater outbursts of offensiveness in which they had recently been indulging. In the case of the arrest of Members of Parliament care seems to have been taken to give offence to political feeling, and in the case of priests still more care seems to have been taken to give offence to religious feeling. On this point the right hon. Gentleman made the nearest approach to an admission that I have ever heard him make. The right hon. Gentleman said, with regard to that melancholy and tragic affair at Gweedore, that unquestionably there had been an error of judgment committed, an error of strategy, an error of tactics. But that was by no means the view of the Northern Whig, and there it is that the right hon. Gentleman has seriously mis-

read the opinion of by far the ablest of his supporters in Ireland. That journal stated that, with a little delay, the arrest might have been made in a much easier and quieter manner, and if it had been made in a quieter manner this terrible calamity would not have occurred. What does the Irish Correspondent of the Times, describing the state of Gweedore at this moment, say?—

“Twenty persons, including the Rev. James M’Fadden and four women, are now in custody charged with the murder of District Inspector Martin. The police are looking for numbers of others believed to be concerned in the deed, and almost nightly houses are searched in which some are suspected of being concealed. The parish is practically depopulated; very many of Father M’Fadden’s parishioners who attended Mass on the fatal Sunday morning have left the district, if not the country.”

I was much struck by an observation which fell from the hon. Member for East Mayo about the state in which the Government found Donegal, and the state in which they would leave it. When I was connected with the government of Ireland we used to point to Donegal as a portion of the country—not owing to any merit of ours, but owing to the character of the people and its long history—where, though the people were very poor, there was no disturbance or disaffection whatever. In the course of my connection with Donegal the only difficulty which I can recall is a trumpery question of a Protestant Board of Guardians which would not appoint a teacher to the Catholic children in the workhouse; but of serious crime there was none. But now what is the state of this great district? The Times says it is depopulated. That is the pacification of Ireland according to the notion of the Government—solitudinem faciunt pacem appellant. This is the state of things in Gweedore. From the ghastly murder itself down to the last drop of retribution which will be eventually exacted, all is due to the fact that a priest has been arrested coming away from saying Mass. It is not merely a mistake of strategy or tactics; it is worse. But, strange to say, the Government have not profited by that lesson, for in the Times I observe that another priest on his way to Gweedore after saying Mass was arrested. What are we to think of a Government, after such a lesson as that, which could repeat such a blunder?

Sir G. Trevelyan

When the Government have got those Gentlemen in prison, what is their treatment? Are the Government responsible for their treatment? The Chief Secretary says that the Prisons Board bear precisely the same relation to the Lord Lieutenant, and the Chief Secretary who advises him, as the Prisons Board in England bear to the Home Secretary. He says that the management of the prisoners was not in the Department of the Chief Secretary. Well, then, in whose Department is it? When Mr. Timothy Harrington was in prison for a speech in 1883, representations were made in the House to the Chief Secretary, and through him to the Lord Lieutenant; and the Lord Lieutenant mitigated and humanized the treatment of Mr. Harrington, and not only of Mr. Harrington, but of all other Irishmen who had been placed in prison for speeches and writings. Why did not hon. and right hon. Gentlemen who hold this theory that the Chief Secretary is not responsible for prisoners make that objection when the case was dealt with by the then Chief Secretary. Parliament has never, admitted and will never admit that there is not full Ministerial responsibility for the treatment of prisoners. The right hon. Gentleman suggests that three reasons have been given why these prisoners should not be dealt with as ordinary prisoners. The first, he says, is that those hon. Members were eloquent. It is true that I have praised Mr. O'Brien's eloquence in the country. Anyone who has listened to Mr. O'Brien's speeches on Ireland in this House, and especially anyone who listened to or read the remarkable speech before the Special Commission, in which that hon. Member produced such an effect on the Court that he entirely altered the views which had up to that time been adopted, will agree with me as to that hon. Member's eloquence; and I now say that any one who heard or read that speech and has acquainted himself with the accounts of Mr. O'Brien's treatment in prison would be deeply shocked. I said that in the country, and I say it now. The right hon. Gentleman was not ashamed to raise a cheer from his supporters by saying that Mr. O'Brien had attacked me in former days. It is a very old story.

Wherever I went to speak in the country I always found the statement placarded over the walls, and I always received the same story in an anonymous letter of welcome. I will tell you who started it. It was the work of the Loyal and Patriotic Association, and it was worthy of the inspiration of their secretary. But the idea that because of anything which a political opponent said or wrote of me in old days, I should rejoice to see him insulted in prison, and the still more preposterous idea that on account of that I should alter my views on the question of the treatment of political prisoners, or the still greater issues between Ireland and Great Britain, shows what sort of men they are who entertain such ideas. Then the right hon. Gentleman went on with the next argument that a man who has been delicately brought up suffers more than other prisoners, and, finally, he went on with our principal argument that these offences were political and not strictly criminal offences. The right hon. Gentleman ran through the scale of what he called political crime, and asked whether we can stop short of the midnight assassin and the dynamiter. That was a pretty exercise of the intellect; but if the practical conclusion at which the right hon. Gentleman arrived was that a man who had published the proceedings of a proclaimed branch of the National League was as black a criminal as the man who cut a throat, all I can say is that that might be a clever mode of chopping logic, but it is quite unworthy of a man who undertakes to govern, and govern justly, kindly, and considerately, a great nation. It is not because they are eloquent or because they are delicate that we resent and regret the treatment of Irish Members of Parliament, but because the Government has broken through the great and cardinal principle of treating political prisoners differently from other prisoners, and therefore they are obliged to punish as common criminals eminent public men, and to inflict on men who have been delicately brought up punishment altogether out of proportion to their offences. The real fact is that we have no feeling about the rich and the poor, or Members of Parliament and non-official people. What we object to is to punish men who commit political crime as ordinary criminals, whether they are rich or poor. On the 3rd of May, 1867, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Central Birmingham presented a petition to this House in regard to the treatment of Irish prisoners. He was very much interrupted by hon. Members who sat opposite, but he got the essence of his statement out. The petition which he read asked that prisoners suffering as Fenians or for a political offence should not be confined in common with prisoners suffering for offences against the ordinary law, and it also prayed that in the punishments awarded to them there might be none of a degrading nature, as such punishments were inapplicable to men whose offence was free from dishonour. Mr. Bright said that in the general spirit of that petition he entirely agreed. Now, what is the crime which has been most heavily punished recently under the Crimes Act? Mr. E. Harrington is in prison on hard labour for six months. That is double the amount of punishment inflicted in many cases by London magistrates on persons in a confidential position who have stolen considerable sums of money. Mr. E. Harrington received that severe sentence because he published in a newspaper a speech which the Court pronounced to be innocent—that is to say, a speech in which the law has no concern. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary says that is a grossly inaccurate statement. Now, what are the facts? Three charges were preferred against Mr. Harrington—namely, publishing a report of a meeting of the Tralee National League, attending the same meeting of the League, and inciting to the adoption of the Plan of Campaign. The prosecuting counsel said he proposed to proceed with each charge separately and to tender evidence on each. He eventually withdrew the charge of taking part in the meeting, and then went on to the third charge—that of inciting persons to take part in the Plan of Campaign. Evidence was taken, and Mr. Roche in giving the decision said that, with reference to the last charge, they were of opinion that, though Mr. Harrington had used very strong language, the evidence that had been given was not sufficient to prove the offence, and therefore they dismissed the charge; but with regard to the charge of publishing the report of the meeting, that was a very serious matter indeed, and they gave him six months' hard labour. That was the sort of offence for which Mr. Harrington received the punishment awarded to the vilest criminals. It is said that our sympathy is only given to Members of Parliament. I will take one case to prove that is not so. At Milltown Malbay, Father White, the parish priest, having observed that very serious evils occurred from the publichouses being open at times of political excitement, advised and requested the publicans to close their houses during a certain trial. Whether that advice was legal or not it was very wise, and I wish that the Legislature had the same good sense as Father White in closing public houses during a contested election. The police, however, got wind of it, and long before, for they were able to supply themselves with plenty of liquor in their barracks; but when the day came they went round to 26 publichouses and asked for liquor at each for the express purpose of punishing and oppressing the people. Twenty-one publicans were summoned, for refusing to sell liquor. There was no talk of conspiracy. At the very utmost it was their obedience to their pastor, who deserved their obedience. Those 21 men were convicted of conspiracy, and sentenced to hard labour for a month. They were told that if they would promise never to do it again the sentence would be remitted; but 11 refused, as Irishmen under the circumstances always will refuse, to give such a pledge, and they were sent to prison. They were not tenderly nurtured people, but were political prisoners as much as any Member of Parliament. Now I come to another class of case—that of men who are punished for recommending tenants to take part in the Plan of Campaign, or for in some way or other giving advice with regard to the rent. I will take one of the most marked of those cases, that of Mr. Patrick O'Brien, who, I am glad to see, has returned to the House of Commons. Mr. O'Brien was tried on the 27th January, and was sentenced to four months' imprisonment for interfering in the question of rent between the landlord and tenant. Anyone would have thought that that punishment was enough, but the Government did not think so. Since that Mr. O'Brien had not only made speeches about the payment of rent, but he had made a speech upon a very much more serious question; he had said to the tenants on a certain estate who were giving 17 years' purchase for their farms that they were giving more than it was their interest to give. The advice was given in moderate language, and it is very likely it was good advice. The hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh (Colonel Saunderson) has told us—he knows best with what accuracy—that in many cases the landlord's fee simple was worth a great deal less than the tenant's interest. Say it is five or six years less, these tenants were actually giving 40 years' purchase for their farms. The Government indicted Mr. P. O'Brien on two counts; they charged him with taking part in a conspiracy to compel tenants not to fulfil their legal obligation to pay rent to Mr. John Smithwick; and they likewise charged him with advising the tenants not to deal with Lord Monck in purchasing the land. The Government were exceedingly anxious to get convictions. A speech of very great power and ability was made at the trial by Mr. Leamy, now a Member of the House, on the extraordinary injustice of allowing an agent to use his influence to put pressure on tenants to induce them to purchase, and of punishing a Member of Parliament for simply advising them not to pay more than the farms were worth. But this was not the opinion of the Government, and they did their very best to press the charge. I do not know what the Resident Magistrates thought about it, because they preferred to punish Patrick O'Brien on the ground that he had advised tenants not to pay rent, the evidence being that he had drunk off a glass of water and had said "Down with Smithwick." They gave him three months on this charge, making in all seven months, or one month more than it was evidently the intention of Parliament that anyone should receive for any one class of fault. The fact is that Mr. Patrick O'Brien received a sentence of three months on account of a speech in which there was nothing new except this advice to the tenants not to buy land at 17 years' purchase; and he got this sentence on the top of a sentence of four months. It appears that I thought he had received the sentence for giving this advice about Lord Monck, and that I believe is the outside of any inaccuracy which in the very large number of speeches I have made on the Irish Question during the last year, and if the right hon. Gentleman, the author of the famous letter to Mr. Armitage, regards this as a serious inaccuracy, it only shows that we see our neighbours' faults through different glasses than those with which we look at our own. The right hon. Gentleman said it was the Irish Members below the Gangway who will not have conciliation in Ireland, and he especially charges the hon. Member for North-East Cork (Mr. W. O'Brien) with being responsible for the present agitation in Ireland. The hon. Member did not deserve any such charge. It is the House that is responsible for the Plan of Campaign. What was the course taken by the hon. Member for North-East Cork? In 1886 he urged with great force that times were bad, that a bad winter was approaching, and that the only way to preserve tenants from ruin, and to remove temptations to disorder, would be to revise rents. The Government rejected his advice, a bad winter came, and all the foretold consequences followed. Next year the Government acknowledged their fault and brought in a Bill for revising rents. But it was too late, and arrears of unjust rents had been incurred. Then it was that the hon. Member gave the Government a fresh piece of good advice, for he urged them to introduce an Arrears Bill. On a poor and paltry excuse it was set aside. Irish Members, who are the representatives not only of the farmers, but also of the shopkeepers of Ireland, would not have the just debts to the shopkeepers dealt with in the same manner as the unjust debts to the landlords. Therefore the hon. Member for North-East Cork was entirely free from the charge brought against him of having opposed conciliation in Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman has been very free with his epithets with regard to hon. Members below the Gangway. I care very little about the epithets which the right hon. Gentleman applies to us on this bench; but if anything can do harm, it is that the Minister who is about our barbarous method of treating prisoners. Where did the right hon. Gentleman in his speech bring forward any instance of that? I heard no attempt on his part to justify any one of those propositions which have been put before ignorant audiences in the country. But the charges against the Government have been repeated in a most violent way, and sometimes in offensive language by the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. Dillon) to-night: and although, of course, I am somewhat imperfectly acquainted with all the details of the cases brought forward, I think I am entitled to select a certain number of cases, and if I can show that they are inaccurate they will serve as samples of the general inaccuracy of the charges. I cannot help thinking that if the microscopic examination of the conduct of the Government during the past three or four months has only produced the old, well-worn, and oft-refuted charges, the Government may congratulate themselves that they have been able to carry out what has been a most difficult policy without infringing the Constitution of the country. I will not dwell upon what the right hon. Gentleman who has just spoken has said with regard to the mode in which some of the prisoners have been arrested, except to remark that the obvious reason why they have been arrested in particular places was because they have fled from justice. Warrants were out against the prisoners, and if they were executed under circumstances which gave some inconvenience, it was almost entirely due to the action of those hon. Members who desired to evade the execution of the warrants. Then, Sir, I will put aside the case of Father M'Fadden, to which I am sorry reference has been made, because it is under trial. I am quite aware that the first reference was not made on the opposite side of the House; but I am sure the House generally will be sorry that any such charge has been made as was made from the benches below the Gangway opposite—namely, the charge of murder, or judicial murder, against the Government. I would rather come to a case that has excited a good deal of interest in the country—I mean the case of Mr. O'Brien. Now, the charge against the Government is that they have treated him with barbarity in prison. There are grave charges brought against my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary. First of all, he was charged with attempting to murder Mr. O'Brien; secondly, he is charged with allowing brutal and disgusting assaults to be made upon him, in order that he might afterwards have the pleasure of sneering at him; and, in the third place, he is charged with taking advantage of him by attacking him while he was in prison. With regard to the first charge, I think that when the facts are inquired into it will be found that the statement of the hon. Member for Mayo is altogether without foundation. What are the facts of the case? When Mr. O'Brien was in prison he was asked to take off his clothes in order that he might put on prison clothes, according to prison rules. He refused to do so, and was warned by the Governor of the consequences of his refusal. When he still refused to remove his clothes the Governor ordered a warder to remove them, at the same time telling him not to use more violence than was necessary to accomplish that object. And accordingly the clothes were removed, and then, according to the statement made by the hon. Member for Mayo, Mr. O'Brien was dragged from the place where he was to a place at some distance in order that he might be weighed. According to information in my possession, the machine was brought close to the door of Mr. O'Brien's cell, and when Mr. O'Brien said that he should object to being weighed, that course was not persisted in. It had been said that Mr. O'Brien's spectacles were taken away. They were, in order that they might not be broken, and they were afterwards returned.

Mr. T. M. HEALY: Who says all this?

*Mr. STANHOPE: When the hon. Member for Mayo makes his statement or account of Mr. O'Brien, I reply with the statement of Dr. O'Farrell, the Prisons Board Inspector, a more independent authority than the prison doctor. He says in most emphatic terms——

MR. T. M. HEALY: I wish, Mr. Speaker——

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. T. M. HEALY: I rise to a point of order to ask——

MR. SPEAKER: The right hon. Gentleman is in possession of the House.

MR. T. M. HEALY: But I rise to a point of order, and to ask you a question, Sir. If the right hon. Gentleman reads from a document which is not in our possession, will he not be bound to lay it on the Table?

MR. SPEAKER: That depends entirely on the nature of the document.

*MR. E. STANHOPE continued: Dr. O'Farrell has stated that Mr. O'Brien had no complaint of any kind to make regarding his prison treatment; that he had every confidence in the skill and kindness of the prison doctor; and that if the rule depriving him of his clothing had to be insisted on he would say that no excessive violence had been used. Dr. O'Farrell also stated that Mr. O'Brien was in a boarded cell, heated to a temperature of 60 degrees, and that he was well and cheerful. So much I need say as to the treatment of Mr. O'Brien. Then I gather other complaints made. The hon. Member for East Mayo complains that the Chief Secretary attended a Liberal Unionist banquet in Dublin, and there spoke of Mr. O'Brien's refusal to be examined by the prison doctor. Well, I confess, though I am quite certain that my right hon. Friend had no desire to turn this matter into ridicule, it is hardly possible to talk of the grotesque manner in which Mr. O'Brien has on every possible occasion endeavoured to parade himself before the public—["No, no!"]—for the special benefit of the people of this country, impossible to make any statement in regard to it without exciting some ridicule. What my right hon. Friend did was to read at the banquet from the Freeman's Journal, and that has been severely commented upon to-night. The account in the Freeman's Journal said the prison doctor wished Mr. O'Brien to go out into an open corridor to be examined, and that this request was naturally refused. On the authority of this statement the Chief Secretary felt entitled to say that Mr. O'Brien had refused to be examined; and when he found that the facts did not justify that statement—that Mr. O'Brien had not carried his objections so far—he took the earliest opportunity, in a letter to the newspapers, of expressing his desire to qualify his previous statement. Then objections have been taken to the letter written by the Chief Secretary to Mr. Armitage. It has been described as a deliberate attack upon a man in prison. But that letter was only written because the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle had been in various parts of the country attacking the Chief Secretary on that very point. Quotations were made from the speech of Mr. O'Brien on which he had been committed, altogether omitting the main point of the speech for which he was committed. Is it to be maintained that my right hon. Friend was not right in taking the earliest opportunity of stating to the country the real truth with regard to the charge made against him? Then with respect to the treatment of Mr. Edward Harrington. It has been referred to this evening in terms which are wholly and absolutely without foundation. Mr. Harrington has been put upon the lightest and easiest labour. There is a Report from the Governor of the gaol on the subject, which states in the most distinct terms that the prisoner's fingers were not skinned or raw, as stated by the hon. Member for East Mayo; that he was dressed in a full suit of prison clothes; and that he had flannel shirt and drawers, and also an overcoat and a blue rug. So that the statements made by the hon. Member for Mayo are absolutely without foundation.

tatement, I am sure the right hon. Gentleman will take the House fully into his confidence, and let us have it in its entirety. I would ask the right hon. Gentleman where he got it, and I am instructed that Mr. O'Brien can contradict it practically on every point. I appeal to you, Sir, and respectfully submit that it would be in accordance with precedent, a Minister having quoted from it, that this Official Report should be laid before the House.

*MR. E. STANHOPE: Everybody can have ready access to it. It has already been published in the Press.

MR. T. M. HEALY: But I venture to submit that is not an answer to my question. There is a well-defined practice in regard to documents quoted by a Minister, and it would be in accordance with that to give us the whole of the document from which a part was quoted.

MR. SPEAKER: Such documents are, as a general rule, laid before the House, that Members generally may have ready access to such. The right hon. Gentleman, however, says the document has been already published, and no doubt he will state the date and say where.

*MR. E. STANHOPE: Every word I quoted appeared in the newspapers of February 11th, in the present year.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Still, that is not an answer. I never saw the publication; never heard of it. My point is this, that the right hon. Gentleman should lay a copy of the whole of the document on the Table.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): Are we to understand the right hon. Gentleman was quoting from a newspaper or from the Report itself?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I quoted from a paper of February 11th part of a letter written by the Chief Secretary.

Mr. T. M. Healy

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I think my hon. and learned Friend is entitled to a more specific reply. The point raised has not been dealt with at all. The right hon. Gentleman has quoted an official document, the Report of a prison official. He says a certain portion appeared in the Press, but is not my hon. and learned Friend right in claiming that the House is entitled to have the full document?

MR. SPEAKER: The whole of the document in question referring to the point in question ought to be laid before the House.

Debate further adjourned till Tomorrow.

KITCHEN AND REFRESHMENT ROOMS (HOUSE OF COMMONS).

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Select Committee be appointed to control the arrangements for the Kitchen and Refreshment Rooms, in the department of the Serjeant at Arms attending this House."—(Mr. Herbert.)

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I do not oppose the Motion. Though we do not gather so much from the accounts, I understand that the larger part of the £1,000 granted annually by the House is devoted by the Committee to service. I would suggest that the Report of the Committee should be more precise in details, for if Members generally knew that we had to pay so much for attendance, I am sure there would be general dissatisfaction. The service for any part of the House should find its place in the Estimates.

Motion agreed to.

The Committee was accordingly nominated of—Mr. A. H. Acland, Mr. Agg-Gardner, Mr. H. T. Anstruther, Mr. Biggar, Mr. William Corbet, Mr. Cremer, Mr. Flower, General Goldsworthy, Colonel Hamilton, Colonel Hambro, Mr. Herbert, Viscount Lewisham, Mr. Marjoribanks, Colonel Malcolm, and Mr. Sheil.

Ordered, That Five be the quorum.—
(Mr. Herbert.)

DEACONS (CHURCH OF ENGLAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Sydney Gedge, Bill to amend the law relating to Deacons of the Church of England, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Sydney Gedge, Viscount Folkestone, Sir John Kennaway, Sir Robert Fowler, Mr. Samuel Hoare, and Mr. Mac Innes.

THE SPECIAL COMMISSION—THE CASE OF MR. PIGOTT.

MR. FORREST FULTON (West Ham, N.): I desire to ask the Home Secretary whether he can now explain the delay which is alleged to have taken place on the part of the police in dealing with the warrant for the arrest of Mr. R. Pigott? I understand that the warrant was issued early in the day by the Special Commission.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): Yes, Mr. Speaker; I am able to state that there was no delay whatever on the part of the police. Since I was questioned on the subject by the hon. and learned Member for Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy), I have received information that the Bench warrant issued this morning by the Commission Court was not brought to Scotland Yard till a quarter past 6 by a person in the employment of Messrs. Lewis and Lewis. It was not, therefore, until that hour that the police could possibly take any steps for the arrest of Mr. Pigott. Immediately the warrant was received, every step that was possible was taken by telegraphing to the ports and by employing persons to watch at all railway stations.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): As this question has been raised, evidently by arrangement, I beg leave to remind the House that my first question was whether any kind of surveillance had existed with regard to the Times witnesses, and undoubtedly it had; and my question to the Government was why, that being so, the police let Mr. Pigott slip out of their fingers? Now, an illusory question is put by the hon. and learned Member with regard to the execution of the warrant. That point was not raised at all by me. If the Government are now taking the point that the warrant was not brought to Scotland Yard till 6 o'clock, I respectfully submit to them, in the interests of justice, that as hundreds of officials were in the neighbourhood of the Court they must have known at 12 o'clock, or at 1 o'clock at the latest, that the warrant was issued, and it was their duty to see that the closure, with which we are familiar in this House, was put upon the ports of the kingdom. But that was not my complaint or allegation at all. My complaint is, that you had delegated two sergeants of the Royal Irish Constabulary to look after Pigott—Sergeants Fawcett and Gallagher—and that precious consignment having been committed to their keeping, and they having got him, why did they not keep him? Therefore, the point of my observation remains—namely, that the Irish Government, having paid two police sergeants to watch Mr. Pigott, when the critical hour of 6 o'clock (at which the Continental train leaves Charing Cross) arrived, those two neglect no precautions that may seem necessary.

MR. SEXTON: I wish to ask, with regard to Mr. Houston, whether the right hon. Gentleman will be good enough to bear in mind the statement made before the Special Commission that certain letters of Houston, said to have been destroyed, are in the possession of Pigott?

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I wish to ask the Home Secretary, with reference to the Questions I put to the right hon. Gentleman yesterday, if he has had any opportunity of learning whether the persons whom Pigott, on his examination before the Commission, swore were with him for his protection were constables; and, if so, whether they were constables of the Metropolitan Police, and whether he has any information as to what other force they belong to; also, if they were constables, whether it was their duty to report when Pigott disappeared, and whether they, in fact, made any report, and, if so, to whom?

MR. MATTHEWS: Mr. Pigott was neither watched nor protected by any constables whatever belonging to the Metropolitan Police Force. I cannot give the hon. Member information as to any other persons whose names have been mentioned in the course of these proceedings. If Mr. Pigott has been under police supervision by constables of the Metropolitan Police, of course it would be their duty to make a Report.

MR. BRADLAUGH: Is it within the knowledge of the right hon. Gentleman that it would be possible for constables of any other force to be protecting Mr. Pigott within the Metropolitan Police District?

MR. MATTHEWS: I should say, certainly, no. The constables of any other force whatever have no jurisdiction to act as constables within the Metropolitan District.

MR. O'HANLON (Cavan, E.): Owing to the fact that Dr. Maguire may have got poison administered to him, might it not be well to hold a post-mortem examination?

No answer was returned, the Home Secretary having temporarily left the House.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I wish, in the absence of the Home Secretary, to ask the Solicitor General for Ireland whether he is not aware that two members of the Irish Constabulary, in the course of yesterday, swore, in the Commission Court, that they were protecting this person Pigott; and whether they have made any Report?

THE SOLICITOR-GENERAL for IRELAND (Mr. MARDEN, University of Dublin): That is a Question which obviously requires consideration, and I must ask the hon. Gentleman to give notice of it.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): Are the Government not aware that these two men have been over here for the last fortnight? How comes it that members of the Royal Irish Constabulary can be absent from their stations in Ireland without the Government knowing it? I would ask further, if it is the fact that these officers are not under the control of Her Majesty's Government, why they are in London; and how it is that the Government have been able, on previous occasions, with regard to Members of this House, to suspend the action of warrants issued to members of the Royal Irish Constabulary, unless they can control the action of these men whilst they are in London?

MR. MADDEN: I have no special knowledge of the matters of fact which are the foundation of the Question of the hon. and learned Member, but if he puts the Question on the paper I will make inquiries.

MR. BRADLAUGH: May I ask the Under Secretary whether it is possible for constables of the Irish Constabulary to do duty in London without the knowledge of the Home Office, when the right hon. Gentleman has stated that they have no jurisdiction?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. STUART-WORTLEY, Sheffield, Hallam): I cannot add anything to the answers which my right hon. Friend gave. I think further notice should be given.

MR. T. M. HEALY: May I ask whether a letter has been received in Court this morning from Pigott, written from an hotel in Paris; and whether, in view of that fact, the Government are now in communication with the authorities in Paris with regard to this man?

Mr. Matthews

MR. STUART-WORTLEY: My right hon. Friend has said that every step has been taken that can be taken in the matter.

MR. SEXTON: May I ask whether the warrants which have been issued will enable the arrest of Pigott to be made in Paris?

DR. COMMINS (Roscommon, S.): Is it not the fact that members of the Irish Constabulary do duty in London, Liverpool, and other large centres in England; and, if so, by what authority do they act?

MR. SEXTON: Will either of the warrants issued enable Pigott to be arrested in Paris; and, if so, will the Government telegraph to the British Ambassador at Paris or any other authority?

MR. STUART-WORTLEY: I conceive that the arrest of a person in Paris would be a matter of extradition. Of course, no steps will be omitted that may seem advisable.

MR. T. M. HEALY: In view of the importance of the matter, I should like to know whether any steps will be taken to keep a watch on Houston, the Secretary of the Loyal and Patriotic Union, to prevent him from leaving the country, and to secure his presence during the sittings of the Commission? I hear that he was not in Court to-day. I do not for a moment contemplate the evasion of justice, but I wish to know whether steps will be taken to secure his presence during the sittings of the Commission?

MR. MATTHEWS: I will consider most carefully anything that the law permits me to do. I may state that I have received some further information which supplements an answer I have already given. There has been handed by Mr. Soames to the Metropolitan Police this morning a letter received from Pigott in Paris.

MR. T. M. HEALY: As I stated.

MR. MATTHEWS: The date of the postmark is too obscure for me to be able to state it to the House. There is a French postmark upon it showing that it came from Paris, and the Metropolitan Police are now taking steps, through the Foreign Office, to procure the extradition of Pigott, not, of course, upon the Bench warrant, on which he could not be extradited, but upon the perjury warrant.

MR. BRADLAUGH: May I repeat to the right hon. Gentleman the Question I put to the Under Secretary in his absence? In answer to me the right hon. Gentleman said that no constables except those of the Metropolitan Police can exercise jurisdiction in the Metropolitan Police area. It is clear, if the reports are correct of the evidence taken before the Royal Commission, that two members of the Royal Irish Constabulary at least have been discharging the duty of protecting Richard Pigott. I will ask whether it is possible that that can happen without the knowledge of the Home Office?

MR. MATTHEWS: Perfectly possible. It has happened apparently in this case.

DR. COMMINS: I put a Question to the Under Secretary, but received no answer. I want to know whether it is not a notorious fact that constables belonging to the Irish police have acted as such in London and Liverpool? As the hon. Gentleman says, they have no authority to act as police here, I want to know under what authority they have acted?

MR. MATTHEWS: I stated with perfect accuracy that no Irish constable can act as such within the Metropolitan Police area. There are, however, certain Statutes in existence under which Irish constables are directed to execute warrants here.

DR. COMMINS: It is a notorious fact within my own knowledge that they do act.

MR. BRADLAUGH: The right hon. Gentleman did not answer the Question I put to him. My Question is this. The right hon. Gentleman, in reply to a previous Question, stated that no Irish constable has jurisdiction to act within the Metropolitan Police area. But, at least, two constables have sworn—if the reports be correct—that they have been acting for the protection of Pigott within the Metropolitan Police District, such constables having their services paid for by a Vote of this House. My Question is, Can constables who are in the service of the State do any kind of duty within the Metropolitan Police District without the knowledge of the Home Office?

MR. MATTHEWS: I can only say it is not within my knowledge that any constables have so acted; and I think it is clear that no Irish constable can act as a constable within the Metropolitan Police District. It may happen that an Irish constable may volunteer, or be hired, to do the duty of a constable.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I am afraid that I have failed to make my Question clear. If it is the case of a constable paid by a Vote of this House to do duty in Ireland, how can he be present within the Metropolitan Police District for any time without the knowledge of the Home Office?

MR. MATTHEWS: It is perfectly possible.

DR. COMMINS: There have been for years, both in Liverpool and London, constables attached to the Detective Department who belong to the Royal Irish Constabulary, and I want to know under what authority they act?

MR. MATTHEWS: They do not act as constables, and have no authority to act as constables within the Metropolitan Police District.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The Home Secretary has misapprehended my Question in regard to Irish constables. I do not question for a moment that British law does not allow the capture of persons, but the British law does allow the shadowing, watching, and surveillance of persons, by Irish police officers. We have experienced that ourselves; and I wish to ask whether the same law which has been meted out to Members of this House in the shadowing of their persons, the watching of their houses, and the keeping of a constant eye upon their habits, will now be put in operation in regard to this suspicious person, Houston? I say nothing against Houston, but I merely wish to ask whether, in view of the serious statements which have been made in regard to him, and the cloud of suspicion which circles around him just now, steps will be taken—one of the witnesses having already evaded the jurisdiction of the Court—to prevent Houston from abstracting himself from the jurisdiction of Her Majesty's dominions?

MR. MATTHEWS: The hon. Gentleman has been misled if he suggests that hon. Members below the Gangway have been what is called "shadowed."

MR. T. M. HEALY: I have constantly been shadowed.

Mr. Matthews

MR. MATTHEWS: The assumption of the hon. and learned Gentleman that hon. Members below the Gangway are shadowed is absolutely unfounded.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Not only have measures been taken to watch me here but when I go abroad.

MR. MATTHEWS: I cannot say what can be done or what ought to be done in regard to Houston. I can only repeat that no precautions that may seem necessary shall be neglected.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HER MAJESTY'S MOST GRACIOUS SPEECH ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [21st February].—[See page 41.]

And which Amendment was—

In paragraph 8, line 4, to leave out all words after the word "Country," to the end of the paragraph, in order to insert the words,—“But we humbly represent to Your Majesty that the present system of administration in Ireland is harsh, oppressive, and unjust, that it violates the rights and alienates the affections of Your Majesty's Irish subjects, and is viewed with reprobation and aversion by the people of Great Britain:

“And we humbly represent to Your Majesty that such measures of conciliation should be adopted as may bring about the contentment of the Irish people, and establish a union between Great Britain and Ireland,”
(Mr. John Morley),

—instead thereof.

Question again proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question.”

Debate resumed.

MR. CHANNING (Northamptonshire, East): In venturing to make a few remarks in support of the Amendment, I should like to preface what I intend to say with one or two brief comments on the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War. I think that that speech was infelicitous in its choice of language, and that the trap which the right hon. Gentleman prepared for his opponents succeeded in catching his own friends. What we have to say to those who do not scruple without inquiry to accept at the han-of the basest of mankind instruments that are intended to accomplish the destruction of their political opponents? I think the House has never had a fairer example of the effect of looking at the mote in our neighbour's eye, and forgetting the mighty beam in our own, than has been afforded on this occasion. I was astounded to hear the statement of the right hon. Gentleman that because there is some agreement with him on this side of the House there has been some improvement in the condition of Ireland, that, therefore, we ought to agree to the passage in the Address which ascribes the improvement to the salutary effect of the coercive measures of the Government. I cannot help regretting the ungenerous and pointless sneers which the right hon. Gentleman addressed to the right hon. Member for the Bridgeton Division (Sir G. Trevelyan). We have heard a good deal lately of courage and consistency. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) has abandoned the noble Lord the Member for Paddington (Lord R. Churchill), his former partner in the National Party, and has become a servile worshipper of the Chief Secretary. We on this side of the House, and all right-minded and thoughtful men in the country, have regarded the course of the right hon. Member for the Bridgeton Division with admiration, and his courage and consistency in standing true to his Unionist principles and refusing to be dragged down to the quagmire of coercion, and for declining to tread the slippery path which has led this Government into the morasses of Pigottism and Crime. We heard the speech of the Chief Secretary at the beginning of this debate. I do not know what hon. Members on the opposite side of the House think of that speech, but we on this side think that it was a singularly ineffective reply to the splendid and courageous challenge of the right hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Morley). Upon two points I was gratified by the speech of the Chief Secretary. He seems to have had a lesson in curbing his tongue, and consequently his speech was free from those errors of taste, those insults and petty sarcasms, which disfigured his previous utterances, and which have tended to alienate Englishmen and Irishmen. It also was a speech that meant no surrender, and implied that they were going to fight out this question to the bitter end. The Opposition look with confidence to the result of the controversy. The administration of the right hon. Gentleman shows his utter incapacity to look things in the face and read the hearts of men. The late Lord Derby, when in this House as Mr. Stanley, was a strong supporter of Coercion in Ireland; but if the right hon. Gentleman will look through all the speeches made by Mr. Stanley, he will not find a single sneer at his political opponents, or upon men in his power who were unable to answer him. I shall not regret to see the right hon. Gentleman retain Office for a little longer, because I know that every day he is in Office adds to the strength of our cause in regard to Ireland. We have heard a great deal about the treatment of political offenders in Ireland. Now, there are certain prison regulations in force which are an admirable result of the best temper of the best period of the Conservative Party, and they represent the spirit, not of the right hon. Gentleman, but of the Tory Party in 1887. The prison rules which were passed then were framed with the object of protecting prisoners from every form of hardship. The 28th of these rules says—

"A convicted criminal prisoner shall be provided with a complete prison dress, and be required to wear it."

There is no word in it about forcing him to wear it. It is simply an order from the Prisons Board saying, "You, Mr. O'Brien, or whoever it may be, are required to wear this dress." Turning to Rule 58, I find there that—

"The Governor shall have power to hear complaints respecting any of the offences following—that is to say, disobedience of the regulations by any prisoner," and so on. No one pretends that Mr. O'Brien, or any of the prisoners, offered violence to the Governor of the gaol, or any of the officials. They have simply refused to comply with this regulation. I do not dispute that that is an offence under the Prison Regulations, and that it is punishable by close confinement on bread and water; but I wish to know from the Solicitor General for Ireland or the Chief Secretary where he finds authority for using this physical violence? If there is such authority, what is the meaning of the rule and regulation which prescribe a specific punishment for disobedience in regard to a particular rule? There is another point upon which I wish to put a question to the Government. We have been left for a long time in a state of obscurity as to the exact powers of the Chief Secretary over the Prisons Board and Governors of gaols in Ireland. The Chief Secretary, at any rate, had it in his power when he knew that Mr. O'Brien had been arrested at Manchester to send to the authorities at Clonmel Prison copies of the medical reports as to Mr. O'Brien, and particulars of his previous imprisonment. As soon as the imprisonment was announced, Mr. O'Brien had to submit to what the Chief Secretary calls "the ordinary process." The House knows well the right hon. Gentleman could have exempted the Tory Party from whatever consequences may attach to the prestige and popularity which the Home Rule Party may have gained in consequence of the treatment of the hon. Member. In his speech at Manchester, Mr. O'Brien said—

"I came here in the first place, and principally, because I was anxious, before disappearing, as no doubt I shall do for a considerable time, from the public scene. I was anxious to meet Mr. Balfour's own constituents here in Manchester, to ask them very respectfully, but very solemnly, to-night whether they are proud of his work in Ireland?"

Again, this hon. Gentleman also said—

"How do I come here to-night? Why, simply by walking away after giving fair and public warning that I intended to walk away out of a Court House in and around which there were over 200 armed policemen with no other business except to guard me. Probably the stupidity and utter incompetency of Mr. Balfour's agents are quite sufficient to account for it, without imputing to them any treachery to their masters."

Well, what was the meaning of that speech of Mr. O'Brien's? It was a mighty appeal to the people of Manchester and Salford to be true to the principles of the past, and to reject the right hon. Gentleman and his policy. That was the sting of Mr. O'Brien's offence, and this was rendered all the worse by the fact that his presence in Manchester at all showed that Coercion was a miserable sham, and that men, said to be conspirators, could walk from one end of Ireland to another, through hundreds of armed men whose duty it was to secure them. Although we were yesterday challenged by the hon. Member for North Armagh (Colonel Saunderson) not to say anything about Mr. Mandeville, I will venture to say something about that gentleman. I think it clear that the Chief Secretary and all the powers of the "Castle" might, had they mitigated his treatment at a critical period of his illness, have prevented that wrecking of his constitution which resulted in his death. But they would not do so. The Chief Secretary sent Dr. Barr to get the prison officials up to concert pitch, in order that they might carry out this policy of humiliation, degradation, and physical torment to prisoners. The most offensive and degrading speech I can remember being uttered by a public man in this country was that in which the Chief Secretary referred in mocking tones to Mr. Mandeville after his death, and tried to insinuate that it was due to other than the real causes, casting a slur on Mr. Mandeville's good name which tended to injure it after his death. It is a fortunate thing that such deeds and words do not often characterize English statesmen. In one of the old debates when Daniel O'Connell was speaking of the wrongs of Ireland, and was met by the mocking laughter which is too common among hon. Members opposite below the Gangway, he made this passionate protest:—

"Yes; though I am a mere Irishman, the iron of despotism has not so entered into my soul that I do not bitterly hate slavery and dearly love liberty;"

and when they mocked at his words, he said—

"The mocking laughter of Englishmen is the most powerful argument for Repeal, for it proves a perfect absence of knowledge in respect to Ireland, and a complete incapacity to legislate for that country."

The Chief Secretary might have learned something more of Ireland had he gone back to O'Connell, or remembered the saying of Lord Beaconsfield—

"The blood-and-iron method of governing Ireland would fail. It failed under Cromwell. The Irish are susceptible to kindness, and full of sentiment—inconsiderate of the means necessary to gain the desired ends, but easily governed if dealt with in the right way. That way was by recognizing that imagination played quite as important a part in the government of nations as reason."

Let hon. Members on the opposite side look in their Hansards for 1833 and 1836, and read the speeches of Lord Grey and Lord Althorp, followed up by that of O'Connell. Those were the old days when the old savage spirit of Irishmen, struggling against terrible wrong and oppression, expressed itself in a savage way. At that time there were 9,000 crimes, as against 500 when the miserable Coercion Bill was introduced; and now, when we hear of a few slight outrages in Ireland, we know that they are the lingering symptoms of the old disease which is steadily dying out under the influence of the beneficent reforms that have been effected. The Chief Secretary may immure Mr. O'Brien in gaol, but he cannot silence him. Before he was sent to prison the first time, he said, speaking of the Irish Members generally, "We are the storm-bells on a dangerous coast"; and this is the function they have had to perform. They have told us of the evils existing in some of the dark and out of the way corners of Ireland, and of the miserable plots of desperate assassins in America. They have been the warning beacon of what may come to pass if we are not advised in time. And again, this year, when he was sent to prison, Mr. O'Brien left ringing in the ears of Irishmen and Englishmen the words—"We can see our way to keep Ireland crimeless and unconquered." There is a simple test of what the National League is, and of what it has done. I ask hon. Members opposite do they approve of the Land Laws passed for Ireland and of the reductions of rent that have been effected in Ireland? Have these been just or unjust; fair or unfair? Say one thing or the other. Either deny their justice, or acknowledge that they are due to the wisdom, sagacity, and patriotic efforts of our great Leader the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. Gladstone), and also the efforts of the Land League. These great reforms would never have been carried but for the light thrown on the state of Ireland by the efforts of the Land League and National League, while, with regard to the revision of rents under the Act of 1887, that was due solely to the efforts of the Irish Party. I ask the Tory Party whether this saving of rents to the extent of hundreds of thousands of pounds to the poor Irish tenants is just or unjust? If just, why not give the credit to those who fought for and obtained it? We know what was said by that simple and straightforward soldier who was sent away from Ireland for speaking the truth—Sir Redvers Buller—that when the National League was established, and the people got their land, and took the matter into their own hands, there was no longer one law for the poor and another for the rich. If there be, as we are told, improvement in the condition of the Irish people, is it not fair and honest and reasonable to give the palm to those who have fought the battle for them? We are told that these men are mere conspirators, and have no following; but the Chief Secretary himself, in a lucid interval during his latest speech, recognized the fact that these men had the ear of the majority of the Irish people, and that they had the real power to work a reform in Ireland. He said—

"What we or any Government could do for Ireland would be but a small part of that which they could succeed in effecting for themselves."

The Prime Minister, in another place, said they were confident of the future, because, by their reforms, they were stealing away the hearts of the people from their natural leaders. In conclusion, I would say that if that is the real and sincere, as well as the avowed, view of the Conservative Ministry, and if they are confident their policy will bear inspection in Ireland or in England, then let them face us at the polls by referring this great question of whether they have been false to their pledges and promises made at the last General Election. We, at all events, have no fear of the result. We know well what it will be. We know that you, the Conservative Party, have betrayed your trust, and that the people of England, when you have the courage to challenge them, will record their opinion in favour of the principle embodied by this Amendment.

*MR. MARK OLDROYD (Dewsbury): Sir, I claim that indulgent forbearance which it is the time-honoured custom of the House to extend to Members who pass through the trying ordeal of rising for the first time to address it. I should not have intervened, but during the debate I have been thoroughly impressed with the fact that the Amendment so accurately expresses my own views on the great question which now divides opinion on the respective sides of this House—views that I have expressed to the constituency which recently sent me here by an overwhelming majority—that I have been constrained not to give a silent vote upon it. Last night the Secretary for War, when challenged on this side of the House as to the accuracy of what he was stating, explained his inaccuracy by saying he could not be expected to know the details as well as hon. Members from Ireland. I have not the experience nor the knowledge of the right hon. Gentleman, but am in the position described by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle (Mr. Morley), when he said, in recounting his earlier experiences of the House, he was possessed of that natural simplicity of soul which novices here are supposed to have, and listened to the debates with a view of ascertaining the facts of the case under discussion, so that his mind might be enlightened and his judgment corrected. I shall, in dealing with this subject, confine myself more especially to one point—namely, the alleged cruel and vindictive treatment of political prisoners in Ireland. The public opinion of this country has endorsed by multitudinous resolutions the opinion that the treatment of political prisoners in Ireland is cruel and vindictive. The public opinion of the country is not arrived at, nor is it formed any academical niceties, or by legal subtleties, or by the artifices of captious logic, but rather by hard and obdurate facts. I claim a special experience in connection with this matter, because I have recently come from the influence of those “ignorant assemblages” to which the Secretary of State for War referred last night. I submit that the national sentiment of the country is expressed in the proposition that political prisoners ought not, in fairness and in reason, to be treated as common felons. The age is too far advanced for that; and the introduction of a treatment of that kind would seem to mark a process of retrogression to the days of the Tudors and Stuarts. There is also a general impression throughout the country that the administration of Irish prisons within recent months has been more cruel and more relentless than has been the practice of recent Governments; that this change has been brought about by the extraordinary severity of Resident Magistrates and the Governors of gaols—men who know on which side their bread is buttered, who have taken their cue, if not from the expressed, at all events from the implied, approval of their conduct by the Chief Secretary. Sir, the Chief Secretary for Ireland cannot evade the responsibility which, as Minister of the Crown, he holds towards the House and the country in this matter. My right hon. Friend (Mr. Morley) quoted from the Prisons Act, and the quotation was sufficient to show that not only prisons, but every prisoner, is subject to the regulations of the right hon. Gentleman. Upon casting my eye over the phalanx of notabilities who sit on the opposite benches, I have failed to discover any Minister other than the Chief Secretary who is responsible to this House or to the country for the administration of Irish prisons. The right hon. Gentleman cannot shield himself, as he has attempted to do again and again, behind the Prisons Board. If, as was demonstrated in the course of this debate, the present management of these prisons is more severe than it was formerly, we want to know on what authority the increased severity was first instituted? The right hon. Gentleman has made admissions, and one was with regard to his action as affecting the priests who came within his jurisdiction as criminals. He made the admission that “he almost strained the law” in favour of those gentlemen. I should like an answer to this question—on what principle is the person of a priest to be considered more sacred than the person of an hon. Member of this House? Because a man is a minister of religion is no reason why he should be shown greater gentleness than an hon. Member of this House, who is a representative of the people and a custodian of their liberties. If the right hon. Gentleman will admit the persons of hon. Members are entitled to equal treatment with the persons of priests, I venture to ask why does he accord unequal treatment to hon. Members, by relieving the priests of the indignity of wearing prison garb—an indignity which he inflicts on hon. Members. An hon. Member, on Monday night, observed that Irish Members were loud in the protestations of their desire to serve their country, but that whenever they came into the clutches of the law they began to whine and whimper. But I submit that the Members of this House who are now suffering imprisonment are not protesting against it, but against the indignities to which they have been subjected—the cutting of the hair and moustache, the insistence upon their wearing prison garb, the dragging of hon. Members in prison garb through their constituencies. These are matters inconsistent with propriety and decency and honour. Speaking at a memorable banquet on the 2nd February, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Balfour) spoke of Mr. O'Brien's eccentricities, and, on Friday last, he was reported to have referred to these eccentricities as a mania. But these eccentricities and this mania are what the people of this country respect. We are told that the prison discipline in Ireland on the part of the right hon. Gentleman is not vindictive. If the hon. Gentleman is not amenable to that accusation, perhaps he is amenable to another, that of absolute indifference. I should like to know what the treatment of prisoners in Ireland would be if he were to assume the attitude of vindictiveness? I will not attempt to paint the picture. Let us hope that that frame of mind will not seize the right hon. Gentleman; but I fail to see that he could show any greater cruelty than he displays now, unless he introduces a Bill recommending the restoration and rehabilitation of the racks and thumb-screws which adorn the Tower of London. It is an admitted principle that we must judge of a tree by the fruit it bears. What is the effect of this mild administration in Ireland and in this House? I have always regarded the position of a Member of Parliament as an honourable one; but, according to the theory of the right hon. Gentleman, admission to this House involves association with criminals. It is an indignity upon this House that its Members—political prisoners though they be—should be ranked among ordinary felons. The usages of this House are already being moderated to meet the emergency, and instead of referring to imprisoned Members by the constituencies they represent, their own names may be used.

I was remarkably struck on Friday night by a fact to which I will call your attention. On Friday last there was imposed upon the Speaker the duty of making an announcement that Mr. Carew had been arrested, and within five minutes of that announcement, on the Motion of the Government, Mr. Carew was admitted to a Committee on the Standing Orders of this House. What is the effect of this mild administration upon the prisoners themselves? Does the Government suppose for a moment that these men will be inspired by fear, or that they will be filled with respect for the administration under which they suffer? What will be the effect upon the Irish public? Will it inspire them with respect and obedience to the law which imprisons and degrades with indignities the leaders of their public opinion, men highly respected, if not idolized? This mild administration fulfils the prophecy of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone), on the occasion of the third reading of the Crimes Act, when he said that the new coercion would have to be of a more drastic and a more searching character than had ever disgraced the annals of this House. In another place reference has been made to the dramatic skill with which the Nationalist Party represent their sufferings. I do not wish to indulge in a dramatic representation, but I do say that the spontaneity and simultaneity with which public opinion has been expressed in this country within recent weeks on this very question of prison discipline in Ireland amounts to something which must be ominous—tragically ominous—to right hon. Gentlemen who now occupy the Government benches. By common consent it has been declared again and again, at these gatherings of “ignorant persons,” that the discipline in Irish prisons is unworthy of civilized government, and the determined call, again and again repeated, that there should be an appeal to the country, is proof of the heartfelt determination of the country to wash its hands of this disgraceful stigma, and remove from itself the indignity of a Government which sullies its fair name. I will not enter now into any discussion of the justice of the sentences which have been recently recorded. I will only say this—that with regard to the sentence upon Mr. Finucane, from the first it has been my conviction that it was an outrage upon common sense. With respect to the sentence upon Mr. Harrington, I regard it as neither less nor more than a caricature of legal proceedings. I regard the sentence upon Mr. O'Brien as one huge political blunder. I am also bound to point out that the course of this debate has not served, in the least, to mitigate the impressions and opinions which I had formed before the debate opened. I wish to call attention to one distinct feature of this debate which has impressed itself upon me. There has been carping criticism about words and details, but a lamentable absence of discussion of the broad principles which are involved in this question. The high-minded and eloquent speech of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Morley), in proposing his Amendment, was followed by a speech from the Chief Secretary which was merely a reply in detail, and did not touch upon the principles involved. And we were regaled last night with a speech from the hon. and gallant Member (Colonel Saunderson)—a speech which has been characterized by an hon. Member on this side of the House as an exhibition of buffoonery and braggadocio. What struck me in the speech of the hon. and gallant Member was the announcement of a change in his strategy. On former occasions he has always said that he and his friends would line the ditches; now there is to be a change in the system, for his enemies are to occupy the ditches. That rather indicates, happily, that the attitude of the hon. and gallant Member may be changed when the day comes that the Irish people will be awarded those rights which they have so long and so persistently claimed. Sir, I think this handling of words, these charges and counter-charges in a debate involving great principles is unbecoming and futile. I beg, Sir, to associate with an expression of my own private opinion, based I believe by the great majority of the nation, that the statement of the right hon. Gentleman is perfectly correct, that the question of the government of Ireland will continue to block the way of much legislation for the whole country until we give practical effect to the principles of popular representation by putting over the Irish Government of Ireland to the people of Ireland, with such safeguards for Imperial interests as this House in its wisdom may think necessary.

*VISCOUNT WOLMER (Hants): With the permission of the House I venture to congratulate the hon. Member who has just made his maiden speech, and I trust he will allow me, although not of much longer standing as a Member than himself, to give him a hint that the next time he endeavours to impress Her Majesty's Government with the terrors that await them he will not use such long words as "spontaneity" and "simultaneity." I would suggest one word which, although also beginning with "s," is shorter, and would explain the meaning much more clearly—"Schnadhorst." The hon. Member (Mr. Oldroyd) and the hon. Member who commenced the debate to-day have both, in accordance with the word that has gone forth, made their chief point of what is called the treatment of political prisoners. I do not misrepresent them, or the Parties they represent, when I say that the battle now waged all over the country is on that line. We accept the challenge—we are perfectly content to fight them on that ground. We deny the cruelty—we deny the injustice. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir George Trevelyan), of course unintentionally, misrepresented what the Chief Secretary said, when he said that that Minister placed political prisoners on a level with dynamiters and assassins. All the Chief Secretary argued was that a political motive was assigned as the reason for differences of treatment, and he asked how they were to make the distinction, and whether a dynamiter did not claim to be prompted by a political motive? That is a totally different thing to putting political prisoners on a level with assassins and dynamiters. Where does the hon. Member who spoke last draw the line? Where does the political prisoner begin and where does he end? While that inquiry remains without an answer, it is obviously begging the question to talk about the treaty to Members of Parliament who are political prisoners. The hon. and gallant Member (Colonel Saunderson) said that it is a House of Commons which were established, he intended to break the laws of that Parliament. Suppose the hon. and gallant Member did break the laws under such circumstances, and was punished for it, he would entirely forfeit the sympathy of his friends here should he endeavour to gain separate treatment on the ground of being a political prisoner. The hon. Member (Mr. Oldroyd) made a remark with which I entirely agree, that in a multitude of disputes general principles are lost sight of. I could not help remembering as he spoke the words which accidentally dropped from the right hon. Gentleman (Sir W. Harcourt) at the time of the passing of the Crimes Act, two years ago—namely, that every act of the Executive Government would be viewed through a magnifying glass. He did not mean to use those words, because he corrected himself and said he meant microscope, but they exactly represent what has taken place; for the Party led by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) have left aside the great issues, and fastened on a mass of detail which they have magnified. But what is the question? Is Ireland to be governed by Her Majesty's Government or by the National League? The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) and his followers have come to the conclusion that it had better be governed by the National League. Are we going to hand over the government of Ireland to the Party represented by the National League? We are not, and that is really the point for which we are fighting. But another point has been touched upon by the terms of the Amendment. It presents for Her Majesty's approval a new policy for Ireland—conciliation, by which, no doubt, is meant the establishment of what is commonly called Home Rule. It must be confessed that the word "conciliation" was very aptly chosen by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Morley). If he had used a more definite term, it might have failed to secure the support of any other of his Party than himself, for it is characteristic of that Party that no two Members of it mean the same thing by Home Rule, and they have no actual scheme of Home Rule ["Oh!"] Hon. Members cry "Oh!" I suppose they have in mind the Bill presented to the House in 1886, but we have been informed a good many times that that Bill has been abandoned, and surely I am guilty of no misrepresentation when I say no scheme has been evolved from the great crowd of ideas which flood the minds of Gentlemen of that Party. If the word "justice" had been chosen, it would have more correctly described the grand yearnings and vain imaginings of the Party of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone). Under that term "justice," almost any scheme of sentiment as distinguished from reason could be embraced. If there is one thing to which that Party is committed, it is the retention of Irish Members in this Parliament; but the right hon. Gentleman has stated, and he has never withdrawn the statement, that it passes the wit of man to devise a scheme—[Mr. WINTERBOTHAM: No.]—the hon. Member will no doubt refer me to the speech where he has withdrawn that statement; but the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) said—"I defy the wit of man to invent a scheme by which Imperial and local affairs can be separated in this Parliament." Has he ever withdrawn that, or pointed out how they can be separated? Surely the hon. Member will not go down to his constituents and suggest that the Irish Members are to manage their own affairs and ours also? If hon. Members from Ireland are to be kept in this Parliament at all, Imperial and local affairs must be separated. It is playing with the common sense of the people of this country to ask them to hand over the Government to a Party which cannot define the remedies which they are to propose. I entirely agree with one sentence which fell from the lips of the hon. Member for East Northampton. The hon. Member said that he and his Friends had nailed their colours to the mast, and would accept no compromise whatever. I remember some foolish persons belonging to my own Party thought that the result of the last General Election had decided the question of Home Rule once and for all, but the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle said that that was only the beginning of the struggle. So, too, if the day should come—and I do not believe it will—when the supporters of Home Rule have an overwhelming majority, that would be far from the end of the struggle. They have a large Party in the country, and so have the Unionists, and if a measure of Home Rule were brought forward a great deal of criticism would be applied to it. The struggle before us is long; I regret the bitterness caused by it; but if hon. Members think there is any faltering on the part of those with whom I act, or that a chance victory would land them at their goal, they are greatly mistaken. The history of this question shows that if one Party is determined so is the other.

SIR JOSEPH W. PEASE (Durham, Barnard Castle): Everybody will admit that, even in the most favourable circumstances, the Government of Ireland is encompassed with great difficulties. I am told by hon. Friends who sit on the other side of the House that if we who sit on these benches above the Gangway were to take away our adherence from those hon. Members who sit below the Gangway the reign of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland would be a very satisfactory one; that law and order would be restored; and that contentment and happiness would gradually dawn upon Ireland. In my view, such an argument is one which it is impossible to hold, because we may be perfectly certain that discontent and disloyalty would still prevail in Ireland unless the source of that discontent and disloyalty should have been taken away. Whilst I believe that a great deal of discontent in Ireland arises from agrarian sources, there can be no question that what is called the Home Rule movement not only pervades the agricultural but largely also the urban population in Ireland, for you will find it quite as strong in the large towns of Ireland as it is among the rural populations. Sir, it was my duty and my pleasure about two years ago to second a Resolution moved by my hon. Friend the Member for the Banbury Division of Oxfordshire, in which we opposed what is commonly called the Coercion Bill, and in that Resolution we showed that such a Bill would not tend to the pacification of Ireland, or loyalty of Ireland, or good government in Ireland; for loyalty, good government, and pacification could only be brought about by other means. We divided the House upon that question, and I want hon. Gents. opposite to recollect that three-sevenths of the House of Commons voted against the second reading of the Coercion Bill. We were beaten by the large majority which the Government possessed, but still there is the fact that that Bill only became an Act of Parliament by the will of the majority, and by nothing like an unanimous vote, and it stands on the Statute Book to this day with that fact tainting its very birth. The Motion I have the honour to support to-day is one which speaks very much in the same language; it condemns the present mode of governing Ireland, and it points to a better way of doing it. My noble Friend, who has just delivered a speech well worthy of his name, says that none of us are agreed upon what Home Rule means. I am not one who altogether approved the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian; I thought it embraced far too much the question of dealing with the land of Ireland in a way which I have always protested against, but with the main principles he laid down I still concur, and I take it that those principles are, that we should give the Irish people the management of their local affairs, that we should not interfere with Imperial integrity, and that in anything that is done as regards Ireland, we must take care to protect the minority, to whichever Party it may belong. These, I understand, are the general principles laid down by my right hon. Friend, and they are the principles to which we still adhere. Now, Sir, every hon. Member in this House will agree that the present position of Ireland is lamentable. Four-fifths of the people are dissatisfied with the manner in which they are ruled; disloyalty abounds, the law-breaker is honoured, the law is administered against the will of the majority, and the majority only submit to the law by force. Now, Sir, I have gone as deeply into this question as any Member can do, and in my travels through Ireland I have everywhere been struck by the general appearance of dilapidation and the universal discontent which prevails. There is no contentment among the tradespeople; there is a general feeling that things are wrong and that some great effort on the part of the law-makers is needed to make them right. I have looked into the Returns. There is no real value in the statistics of improvement on which the Chief Secretary has so much relied, which are mainly concerned with the Saving Banks deposits. While pauperism has steadily diminished in England and Scotland, it has enormously increased in Ireland. In 1860 the number of Irish paupers indoors and out was 41,454; in 1878, 85,530; and in 1888, 113,947. The cost in 1860 was £530,000; in 1875, £943,000; and in 1886, £1,087,000. Then, Sir, the population in Ireland has decreased by nearly half a million. In 1878 it was 5,282,246; in 1888 it was 4,790,614. In Scotland, a smaller country, the population has risen from 3,628,268 in 1878 to 4,034,156 in 1888; an increase of 405,888. A great deal has been said about the Savings Banks in Ireland. It is true that the deposits in Government Savings Banks have gone up £92,600 since 1883, while in the Trustee Savings Banks they have diminished £52,000 in the same period. But then, on the other hand, more than a million sterling has gone from the pockets of the landlords into those of the tenants. The investments in Irish Railways have risen from £35,444,000 in 1883 to £36,457,000 in 1887. But the Return laid on the Table by the right hon. Gentleman shows a decrease in cash balances and deposits in Joint Stock Banks in Ireland since June, 1883, of £1,415,000. The Government and Indian Stocks held in Ireland in 1871 amounted to £36,927,000; in 1883 to £31,532,000, and in 1888 to £28,856,000, or a decrease of 8,000,000 since 1871, and of over two and a half millions since 1883. To sum it up, we have a decrease since 1883 in cash deposits of £1,400,000, a falling off in Government and Indian Stocks in Ireland of £2,700,000, and in Trustee Savings Banks of £52,000. As against this you have an increase in the Post Office Savings Banks of £926,000, and of investments in railways of £1,000,000 sterling. Does that show that your plan of governing has made Ireland thrive? Look at the Income Tax Returns. Between 1883-87 the Returns of Assessments for the United Kingdom had gone up £16,561,904; in Ireland they had gone down £33,685. The country is governed by a large number of police. In 1878 you had 12,000 men; now you have 14,000, although the population has decreased by half a million. The cost of the police has risen from £1,200,000 to £1,600,000. The cost of prisons in Ireland has risen from £40,000 to £134,700, yet people have been running out of the country. In 1878 the emigrants numbered 29,492, last year there were 78,900. Then the evictions and notices of evictions are increasing steadily. In 1886, 3,771 families were evicted; in 1887 the evictions under the old Act and the notices issued under the new affected 6,382 families; in the first three quarters of 1888, 9,035 notices were issued under the new process and 819 under the old Act; these will probably affect 50,000 people. In these sad figures you have the picture of a country steadily getting worse on your hands, unlike England, Scotland, and Wales, and unlike every colony in which you are interested. Well, now, I have asked myself, Is the manner in which you are governing Ireland government by a Constitutional country, or is it government by autocracy? It seems to me to be a Government by autocracy, and in a manner utterly at variance with everything contained in the Bill of Rights and in Magna Charta. We have in Ireland 26,700 soldiers and 14,000 policemen—an armed force of 40,000, simply to govern 4,800,000 people—or one armed man for every 117 of the total population—man, woman, and child. I shall be told that the soldiers must be kept somewhere, and, therefore, it does not much matter. But the test is whether, in case of a great war, these soldiers could safely be removed. Every man knows that they could not, and it is equally evident that the work these men have to do is in the highest degree distasteful to them. Can it be imagined that the Scots Greys, with their magnificent record, and with the name of Waterloo on their colours, found it pleasant work to escort the parish priest to gaol? In the proclaimed districts there is no freedom of public meeting or of the Press. One of the speakers last night used the metaphor of a gaseous mine into which it would be unsafe to take a lighted candle. To that I reply that if the mine were cleared of gas, there would be no danger in lighted candles, and I say it is the policy of the Government which, to continue the metaphor, makes Ireland a gaseous, and therefore dangerous, mine. It is impossible to call that a Constitutional Government under which one-quarter of the chosen Representatives of the people either are, or have been, in gaol for crimes which would have been no crimes except for an Act of Parliament passed a couple of years ago. The forces arising against the Government are great, and they are so great that they will ultimately prevail. Behind the Government sit many Members who have pledged themselves to vote against coercion, and a system cannot last which is opposed by a powerful minority in the House, and against which more than one-half of the intelligent people of Great Britain have earnestly protested. At Manchester Mr. O'Brien was actually allowed to occupy the bed in which the Heir next but one to the Throne had previously slept at the Town Hall, and the next day the hon. Member was held down in gaol by four warders, the Governor looking on, while his hair was cut off. These things are not, and never can be, consistent with good government. If the laws are to be respected they must be respectable. Our laws are out of harmony with the best feelings of this country; they are no longer respected and obeyed, and the man who breaks them is not looked on as a criminal. You have 85 out of the 103 Members elected by popular constituencies in Ireland; even in Ulster the majority of the elected Members is against you, the Boards of Guardians are composed of men opposed to you, nearly every Corporation and Mayor is against you, and, singular to say, the Lord Mayors of London, Dublin, and York, all of them are opposed to your plan. Now, Sir, while I protest against the law, I protest more strongly still against the manner in which it is carried out. It is all very well to raise technical objections as to whether the Chief Secretary has this power or that. If he has not the power to treat these men with decency, he ought to ask the House for that power, and he could get it in 36 hours.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Mid Lothian): But he has the power.

SIR J. W. PEASE: Yes I believe he has the power, and indeed it has been proved that he has; but he does not exercise it. Priests are allowed to wear their own dress in gaol, and why not Irish Members of Parliament?

Sir Joseph W. Pease

There is no prison regulation to compel men to have their hair and their beards cut. These are wanton insults, and they aggravate the state of things in Ireland and the state of public feeling in England. But what is the course of action of the right hon. Gentleman? He defends his policy. He defended it at his Balshazar feast in Dublin. I call it by that name, for if ever the handwriting, "Thou art weighed in the balance and found wanting," appeared, it was written on this occasion by an indignant country on the wall of the banquetting-room that night. The right hon. Gentleman was surrounded by friends. I looked through the list the other day and found there were 13 or 14 Crown Prosecutors, five or six Dublin Castle Officials, and 10 or 12 defeated Unionist or Tory Candidates. These were the men who laughed at the sufferings of Mr. William O'Brien. Why did Mr. O'Brien refuse to put on the prison clothes? For the very reason that I would have declined. I should not have felt myself to be a criminal, and we have no right to treat him as a criminal. Having got his political adversaries under his feet, as the right hon. Gentleman has done, it is perfectly clear that those under him have learnt the lesson and taken up his cue as to the manner in which they are to act. The powers possessed by the Chief Secretary seem to have been exercised with irritating recklessness. Two Members of this House have been arrested during elections which they were attending, a third was arrested immediately after a large meeting at Manchester, and two priests have been arrested just as they were leaving Divine Service. The law seems to be constantly begetting fresh breaches of the peace. Let us take the case of Mrs. Moroney at Miltown Malbay, whose tenants have for years been paying £100 a year rent when they ought not, according to the reductions made by the Land Commissioners, to have paid more than £45 a year. This is the way in which crime is got up in Ireland. A landlady exacts £100 for every £45 that she ought to receive; that leads to boycotting; and that in turn to respectable people being sent to gaol with hard labour. In 1887 you proclaimed the National League in Miltown Malbay; it was rife enough then, but after that, every person in the place joined it. Car-owners were next prosecuted for refusing to drive the police to a place where a proclaimed meeting was to be held; three blacksmiths were prosecuted for refusing to shoe Mrs. Moroney's horses, other people were prosecuted for refusing to supply her with goods, and the publicans who closed their houses on the advice of the parish priest were also prosecuted, and eleven went to gaol. Their only offence was that they refused to supply liquor to the police, who had already a good store of it at their own barracks. That is the way in which crime is got up in Ireland. A landlady exacts £100 when she is only entitled to £45, the tenants object to pay, then comes boycotting, and then prosecutions under the Act. Your object in passing the Crimes Bill was not to suppress ordinary crime, but to suppress crimes made by the Crimes Act—to suppress the League, boycotting, intimidation, and the Plan of Campaign. Have you succeeded at all in putting down the League? Not a bit of it. The League has at this moment 1,800 branches, and of the alleged suppressed branches I see from 30 to 50 reported each week. How have the funds come into the League since you began your persecution? In the first fortnight of February, 1885, its receipts amounted to £242, and these have yearly increased till in the first fortnight of February, 1889, they reached the sum of £676. In to-day's Daily News I see that the last fortnight's contributions, partly from America and partly from the Colonies, amount to £2,553. Now as to intimidation. Very few persons have been able or even inclined to take farms from which tenants have been evicted; and while I do not say a word in favour of the Plan of Campaign, I know that it was one of those things which have been forced on the people of Ireland. There have been under it more than 100 combinations, and of these only four have been in any way interfered with by the action of Dublin Castle. There are still 40 estates under the Plan of Campaign, and in all the rest of the 100 cases terms have been arranged satisfactorily to the landlords and tenants. While there have been cases of injury on some of these estates, as a general rule it can be safely said that there has been hardly any agrarian crime on them. As for law and order, it seems as if they are only to be observed so long as it suits hon. Gentlemen opposite. The hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh (Colonel Saunderson) has declared that a Home Rule Parliament will not be obeyed by Ulster. Speaking at Portadown on the 19th inst., the hon. and gallant Gentleman said—

“As to a Home Rule Parliament, nothing under heaven will make us recognize this Parliament or obey its laws so long as we have right arms to strike with. In a fortnight we could put 50,000 men in the field under arms.”

If there is a Dublin Parliament it will be one authorized by the Imperial Parliament, and its laws will take their tone from those of the Imperial Parliament. No one has asked for an Irish Parliament which should not be subservient to the English Parliament. No Parliament can exist in Ireland which is inconsistent with the integrity of the Empire and the proper protection of minorities. And when these pledges have been given by hon. Members on this side of the House it is impossible for the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh to urge that law and order should be observed now, and at the same time declare that they will not be observed under a Dublin Parliament. The fact is that the Government have to deal with a gigantic strike against high rents in Ireland, for reasons which would have justified the strike of any body of English operatives. Rents in Ireland have been high and in many cases oppressive. We have only to look at the Blue Book to see that some rents have been pulled down 60 and 80 per cent. How have you dealt with this state of things? You have dealt with it just as our ancestors tried to deal with the strikes of operatives in England. You have passed repressive laws. Some hon. Members remember how we petitioned in this House for a Royal Commission to be sent to Sheffield to inquire into the things being done there. That Commission reported and the result was the repeal of some of the labour laws and the legalization of trade unions, which has had the effect of bringing all their doings to the surface. Instead of having workmen who were to be distrusted, employers now have workmen with whom they can sympathize and who sympathize with them. If the same plan were adopted in Ireland, and if the complaints of the tenants were treated as those of reasoning and thinking men, the same results would occur. There is no general disposition in Ireland to withhold rents justly due. Another difficulty of the Government lies in the fact that there is no general confidence in their mode of conducting business. Four-fifths of the people of Ireland and half the people of England and Scotland honestly believe that the Resident Magistrates are entirely in the hands of the Irish Government; and they also believe with very good reason, that in the gaols special provision is made for the Irish Members of Parliament, the political foes of the Government. This is shown in the way in which right hon. Gentlemen opposite followed up the charges made against Members of the Irish Party. The Irish Members asked to be tried before their Peers; but instead of that three Judges were appointed. I have nothing to say against those Judges as honest and upright men, but it is an unfortunate circumstance that all three should be of the same political creed. Every facility had been offered by Her Majesty's Government to bring home the charges of complicity in horrible crime against the Irish Members. The Resident Magistrates and all the force of the Irish police have been pressed into the service of proving that these men had complicity with crime. You have done almost worse than that. You have even opened the cell doors of every Fenian and dynamitard in prison to get evidence against the Irish Members. These are the sort of things that exasperate public opinion and make the government of Ireland more difficult than it ought to be. There is hardly a peasant in Ireland who believes that he would get justice. There is the case of murder at Kinsale by emergency men who were engaged in an illegal raid on cattle. The accused persons were brought before Lord Courtown, President of the Land Defence Association of Ireland, and nothing was done. Two men were brought before the Grand Jury. Of that jury I am told that 22 out of 23 were landlords or agents. No true bill was found. At the Coroner's inquest five or six witnesses swore that the two men charged had been parties to the murder. It is clear that these men were equally guilty with the men who were hung at Manchester some time ago, because murder was done while they were engaged in an illegal act. This unfortunate position of affairs is owing in a great degree to the Land Question. The Bessborough Commission in 1845 stated that freedom of contract did not exist, and the Land Act of 1881 showed that it did not exist. Mr. Trench, before the Cowper Commission, said that the landlords were not their own masters, that mortgages were held at 4 and 4½ per cent. over half the land in Ireland. Mr. Samuel Murray Hussey said—

“The way the mortgages are pressing their claims, and the Government their claims with most merciless severity, the landlords will soon be ruined. You have the tenants in distress and arrears, and half the landlords on the verge of ruin.”

What are the remedies proposed? The hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) brought in a Bill to allow the leaseholders to come into Court. That Bill was rejected, but the Government granted the concession in the following year. You lost a year in dealing with these people. But you have not attempted to repeal that law which I consider one of the greatest hardships of the Irish tenant—the law as laid down in the case of “Adams v. Dunseath.” In that case the tenants' own improvements were held, for the purposes of rent, to be practically the landlords' improvements. No attempt has been made to remedy such an utterly immoral and wrong state of things as that. Then the Government had obtained £10,000,000 with which to buy land, but the report as to the hands into which the bulk of that money is going is contrary to the accepted view of the probable recipients when it was granted. But it is said that the Land Court is open. Yes, but the Land Court is not open to the tenant in arrears who may be evicted. The Cowper Commission advised the Government to revise the judicial rents every five years, but they have not acted on that advice. Indeed, from first to last, the Government have opposed that view. In 1886, Lord Salisbury declared: “We do not think it would be honest in the first place, and we think it would be exceedingly inexpedient;” and yet, in the following year, something was done in the direction indicated. Now, so far as I can learn, there has been no general reduction in the statistics of agrarian crime. In the quarter ending December, 1886, there were only 80 cases of agrarian crime, putting aside threatening letters, but in March, June, and September of last year there were 98, 98, and 108 cases, some of them of a graver character than those which occurred in 1886. The condition of the country ought to have been better now, because not only have the Irish people obtained the sympathy of the English and Scottish people, but the times as a whole are better. The truth is that the policy of the Government is at fault. There are only two roads open to the Government. You must either cease to govern Ireland by constitutional means—by turning the Irish Members out of Parliament, and governing the country by the force of the 40,000 armed men at present there—or else you must resort to constitutional methods of government. You must act boldly with regard to legislation in Ireland, with regard to the land, the arrears, and the charges on land. I believe the Government will have to deal with the mortgagees of Ireland, because if the State lays down what rent is to be paid it ought to take upon itself to say what charges the land can bear with that rent upon it. The Irish Representatives must be retained in the Imperial Parliament. In this place you will have in the future to guard all Imperial interests and the integrity of the Empire. In the Imperial Parliament we shall have to do that which has always been the doctrine of those who have advocated Home Rule—to take great care of the minorities of Ireland, whether Protestant or Catholic, landlords or tenants. But the unity of the Empire, which is now greatly in jeopardy, the very safety of the Empire, depends upon bringing about a better state of feeling in Ireland. I believe we shall have to train the Irish people to manage their own affairs, and shall have to place upon their shoulders the responsibility of maintaining law and order, before there will be anything like a state of perfect law and order in Ireland. If the Irish people fail in that task, the English people can be no worse off than they are to-day. On the other hand, if they succeed we shall have solved a great problem;

we shall possess that which we have not possessed during the whole of this century—a United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.

*THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, Dublin University): Mr. Speaker, as I listened to the speech of the hon. Gentleman (Sir J. Pease), it occurred to me to ask the question whether, judging from the evident sincerity with which he spoke, his speech would not have been delivered in the opposite direction if his information had been correct on the various matters which appeared to influence his judgment. The hon. Member called attention to several points which have been discussed over and over again connected with the unfortunate affair which ended in the death of Kinsella. The hon. Member is under the impression that the grand jury threw out the Bills. [Sir J. PEASE: I said so.] The grand jury did not do so. Bills were found against several prisoners, which went before a petty jury. The case was afterwards tried before a jury at the Assizes. It is true that the grand jury ignored the Bill against Freeman, but it is also true that the learned Judge stated at the trial that it had been admitted by every one that there was no evidence that he committed the murder.

SIR J. PEASE: I would not use Freeman's name, because I would not desire to drag it again before the House. But Freeman was the man against whom the coroner's verdict was brought. The grand jury threw out the bill against Freeman. I alluded to the case in order to show how little confidence the people have in the administration of justice in Ireland.

*MR. MADDEN: Quite so. One of the reasons why the hon. Gentlemen supports the attack on the administration of the law in Ireland is that the grand jury ignored, and, according to the Judge, properly ignored, the bill against Freeman. But the Crown put the other men on their trial, and they were tried before a jury. A charge of jury-packing has been made, but not a single man called upon that jury was challenged. There was an instruction given which might have resulted in the exclusion of jurors—namely, that no landlord or land agent should be on the jury; but what I understand hon. Members to refer to as jury-packing is a process accomplished by the exclusion of jurors when they come up to be sworn. The accuracy of the hon. Baronet's information may be inferred from his statement that the decision in the case of Adams v. Dunseath has deprived the tenant of property in his improvements. He has further stated that the Land Court is not open to the tenant under arrears. I can inform him that the Court is open to every tenant under arrears to have a fair rent fixed. The hon. Gentleman stated that in the parts of Ireland where the Land League has been proclaimed it is illegal to advise tenants as to the rents they are to pay, and that there is no liberty of speech. If the hon. Member were in the habit of reading the reports of meetings held in those parts of the country, and the newspapers which circulate there, he would see that there exists very considerable liberty, if not licence, both of speech and writing. I think I have some idea as to what the hon. Member had in his mind when he said the advisers of tenants were not at liberty to give advice to tenants who were about to buy their holdings. He must have had in his mind the case which the right hon. Member for the Bridgeton Division of Glasgow (Sir G. Trevelyan) mentioned in a letter—viz., that of the hon. Member for North Monaghan (Mr. P. O'Brien), who, it is alleged, was imprisoned by a Bench of Magistrates because he advised the people not to buy at a certain number of years' purchase. Now, that statement is absolutely and totally incorrect. I have examined the facts of that case. I have in my hand the conviction of the hon. Member for the offence. The hon. Member for North Monaghan was convicted on one charge, and on one only—namely, that of advocating the Plan of Campaign on the estate of Mr. Smithwick. There was not a conviction on the charge of advising the tenants on another estate—that of Lord Monck; that charge was not pressed. The conviction was for advocating the Plan of Campaign, and had nothing to do with the other charge as to advising the tenants on Lord Monck's estate not to purchase.

MR. LEAMY: Because they said, having convicted him on the first, they would not go into the second.

*MR. MADDEN: I am instructed that the case was not presented by the Crown and was not entertained by the magistrates, and that there was no conviction on it. It has also been stated that the hon. Member was sentenced to three months' imprisonment with hard labour. The real sentence was three months' imprisonment without hard labour. So much for the accuracy of the facts as present in the mind of the hon. Gentleman who asks the House to adopt the amendment. Now, looking back to the course of this debate, I submit that, although there has been a great deal of detailed criticism, there has really as yet been no attempt to deal with the broad issues raised by the amendment. There has been a great deal of detailed criticism of certain sensational incidents which have occurred, and which, I will add, have been created in the course of prosecutions; but there has been no attempt on the other side to go to the root of the matter, to criticize the circumstances under which the prosecutions were instituted, in order to show that they were unnecessary or harsh under the circumstances, and there has been no attempt to prove that in any particular case was an unrighteous or unjust decision come to. I have always admitted that where the Government have been compelled to ask for additional powers it is the right of the House to require a strict account of how they were used, and that it is the duty of the Government to be prepared to give such an account. A great portion, however, of the speeches which have been delivered from the other side have dealt with a totally different question from that of the administration of the law: they have suggested an alteration and a radical change of the law as regards the treatment of a certain class of prisoners. Now, no such principle has ever been adopted in the English law as that any person, be he a Member of Parliament, a priest, or a peasant, who has been convicted of an ordinary offence, even allowing, for the sake of argument, that the offence was committed for the purpose of producing a political effect, to get an advantage for a political party, or even to benefit some particular class of the community—no such principle has ever been admitted under British law that his status or position should be different from that of the man who committed precisely the same offence under different circumstances and from different motives,

Mr. Madden

What I want the House to notice is that all such discussion as that to which I refer is absolutely irrelevant to a motion which arraigns the present Government for their administration of the existing law. What are the issues raised by the Address and by the Amendment? The paragraph of the Address which it is sought by the Amendment to expunge is that in which we assure Her Majesty that we learn with satisfaction that the Statutes recently passed for the restoration of order and confidence in Ireland have been already attended with salutary results. The House is asked to negative that statement. Has there not been a salutary result effected in the direction of restoring order and confidence in Ireland? ["No."] An hon. Member says that no progress has been made in that direction. The hon. Member who challenges that statement differs from all the other speakers on the opposite side, because they have all admitted the improvement, and the only question is as to the cause to which that improvement is attributable. It is a fact that cannot be denied that agrarian crime in Ireland is now lower than it has been since the present agitation began in 1879. It cannot be denied that since June, 1887, under the working of the Crimes Act agrarian crimes have diminished to an enormous extent. For the quarter ending June 30th, 1887, they were 229, and for the quarter ending December 31st, 1888, the total number was 133. But more remarkable still are the figures connected with boycotting. The total number of persons wholly boycotted has diminished from 866 in 1887 to 56; and the total number partially boycotted has fallen from 4,035 to 656.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Are these the same figures as were given by the Secretary of State for War (Mr. Stanhope) last night?

*MR. MADDEN: The figures are brought up to the 31st of December, 1888, and are taken from the Official Return. I am not aware what figures the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War quoted.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The Secretary of State for War read out a wholly different set of figures.

*MR. MADDEN: These figures are absolutely correct as regards the period to which they relate. Let the House for a moment realize what that means. If the Government have nothing else to show to the country as the result of their administration of the Act, the removal of human suffering and misery which these figures indicate would, I think, justify this House in passing the Act of 1887, and entitled the Government which administers it to the gratitude of the country. The hon. Member who spoke last has called attention to several figures relating to the state of Ireland, but his comparison was, for the most part, between Ireland as it is now and its condition at a period antecedent to the present agitation, which commenced in 1879. If the state of Ireland now were compared with its condition three or four years ago, the most remarkable results will be found to have been achieved. It is admitted that the country is more prosperous, that the general relations of different classes of society with each other have improved, that legal obligations are met with greater regularity, and that in particular the relations of landlords and tenants are much more friendly than they were before the present administration of the law commenced. Public confidence has been largely restored, and public credit has made a distinct advance. By public credit, I do not mean national credit, but the degree of confidence which leads men to invest their money in great public undertakings. One of the most crucial tests of returning enterprise is afforded by the success of public undertakings which have been started. There have been a number of schemes started under the Tramways Acts. Out of 18 schemes which have been set on foot only three or four in 1885 had attained a certain degree of prosperity. In that respect there has been a most marked change. On one of these railways 5 per cent. debentures are now selling at £13 15s. or a considerable premium. West Clare 4 per cent. debentures were practically unsaleable in 1885. Now they are selling at 95, or only 5 per cent. discount. The Ilen Valley Railway in 1885 is not an undertaking under those Acts, but it is similarly circumstanced. It owed a large sum to the Board of Works, and endeavoured in 1885 to raise money to pay it off, but was then unable to issue debenture stock even at 5 per cent. They have now succeeded in bringing out £20,000 at par, bearing only 4 per cent, and have forwarded to the Board of Works a cheque for that amount. These facts will be admitted to be most crucial tests of returning prosperity. Another significant circumstance pointing to a better state of things is afforded by the diminution of prosecutions under the Crimes Act itself. We all look forward to the time when the peculiar forms of crime against which the Crimes Act is directed will have disappeared. At all events, Irishmen on this side of the House hail with satisfaction a decrease in the number of prosecutions under the Crimes Act, which unfortunately we are still obliged to institute. It may be asked what is to be said of the fact that prosecutions have been instituted against several Members of Parliament, and that proceedings have been taken against Roman Catholic priests and others who enjoy an exceptional share of the confidence of a section of the public. I would remind the House that its attention has been unduly drawn to accidental incidents which do not go to the root of the matter, and I would direct its attention to the exact evil with which these prosecutions are grappling. The present Government is engaged in a struggle against an organized system of intimidation. A particular phase of that struggle, which is no new struggle unfortunately, may be traced, I think, to a statement the Lord Lieutenant made in the course of the last autumn. In that statement his Excellency called attention to the number of evicted farms taken by persons in the open market. After that statement the Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon) boasted that there were 5,000 evicted farms in Ireland. The year had been fairly prosperous, and the Lord Lieutenant's statement was perfectly true. As has been admitted by speaker after speaker, a great engine used by hon. Gentlemen opposite would have been lost if the improved state of things had been allowed to continue. The fairest way of dealing with what ensued is by reading the words of the principal leader of the agitation. A letter written by the hon. Member for North-East Cork (Mr. W. O'Brien), and dated the 25th of August last year, has been made public. In it the hon. Member said—

Mr. Madden

"My dear Sheehan,—It will be most necessary to show Balfour that his troubles in Ireland are only beginning. We are organizing a series of great demonstrations through Ireland for the latter end of September and beginning of October. You ought to arrange a series of meetings from parish to parish in your division to address your constituents, announcing them publicly. I will, if possible, attend some one of them myself. Don't mention my name publicly as suggesting the meetings. You cannot announce too many of them, but one will do to begin any Sunday after next."

Now, that was in August last. The same Gentleman on another occasion—I am reading from the Freeman's Journal of January 10, 1889—said—

"A good many people were rather amazed—you in Kildare have the reputation of being rather a fat and sleepy people; but these people forget that."

Further on the hon. Gentleman said—

"The besetting misfortune of Irish history has been that while one district was fighting another was asleep, whereas if the whole 32 counties of Ireland had been got to strike together we would have been spared many a miserable century of bondage and of degradation in Ireland. What is the lesson that has been taught to us by the struggle of the last few years in Ireland? Why, Mr. Balfour has only had a mere handful of men in a few corners of Ireland to deal with, and yet they had been more than a match for all the power of his gaols and of his armies."

The series of meetings which followed the letter of August was organized for the purpose of converting the opposition to the law of a handful of men into the opposition of the country generally. I must call the attention of the House to the manner in which that object was attempted to be effected. One of the most typical cases is that of two Catholic priests, Fathers Farrelly and Clarke. In that case a landlord named O'Connor had evicted a tenant. A meeting was called near the evicted farm for the avowed purpose of boycotting O'Connor. It was for speeches delivered at that meeting that these two gentlemen were prosecuted and sentenced to five weeks' imprisonment. A case was stated. It came before the Court of Exchequer in Ireland, and I will proceed to read from the judgment of the Lord Chief Baron, who then characterized the advice given to the people by the priests, and which is in substance identical with that which was given on other occasions with regard to land-grabbers. The Lord Chief Baron clearly laid down the meaning of the Act, and said that it was clear from the speech of the defendant that he used language that came within the definition of the Judge. The defendant told his hearers to make the place unwholesome for land-grabbers, for so long as they remained they would reign and rule over the people. It is idle to argue, as it has been argued, that the words were simply an expression of disapproval of land-grabbing. The words in which the learned Judge referred to the speech indicated the gravity with which he regarded it. The reverend gentleman, he said, told the people to make the place hot for land-grabbers, for so long as they remained they would reign and rule over them; he was a Roman Catholic clergyman addressing the people, not alone in regard to the law of the land but the law of God; he was speaking of moral law, and his words had the more effect inculcating the duty of the people; he told them to boycott O'Connor; to carry out the object of making the place too hot for land-grabbers, and he came to the conclusion that the evidence was overwhelming.

MR. T. M. HEALY: What was the charge?

*MR. MADDEN: There were two charges—conspiracy and inciting to conspiracy. ["Boycotting!"] Hon. Members may or may not be aware that conspiracy to boycott is an indictable offence under the Common Law independently of the Act of 1887, and has been so decided. Incitement to a conspiracy to intimidate is an indictable offence by the law of the land, and in no single one of the prosecutions to which I am directing attention are they other than offences indictable at Common Law. Not one of them can be said to be a new offence created by the Crimes Act.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Will the hon. and learned Gentleman read the charge, or kindly say under what term of English law there is such an offence as inciting to conspiracy?

*MR. MADDEN: The law on the subject is very simple. ["But the charge!"] I have not the charge here; but I have what is more important, the judgment of the Lord Chief Baron, which states the substance of this charge. The law on the subject is very simple, and has been laid down authoritatively; there must be evidence of incitement to enter into a conspiracy; it must be established that the object was to induce persons not to deal with another in the way of trade or business, and by the exercise of influence to affect the freedom and action of the person against whom it is exercised. That is the substance of the charge as stated by the Lord Chief Baron. But the point of my observation is, that this is a typical case. I cannot bring forward every case—time would not permit of it, and there is the further objection that a number of the cases are under appeal, but this case is a typical one of a class in respect to which our action is arraigned—namely, cases in which we find it necessary to proceed against clergymen of the Roman Catholic Church and Members of Parliament for their action in regard to intimidation. My right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary has alluded to the Kenmare estate and to the outrages that followed the introduction of the Plan of Campaign there. He was asked to describe the nature of the outrages, but he had not the list then before him. I have now the particulars, and I can say that they included a threatening letter, killing and mutilating of cattle, cattle stealing, moonlighting, injury to property, and an incendiary fire. Now, I pass on to the meeting held at Ballyneale. It was held in the neighbourhood of an estate upon which a man named Duggan was boycotted for taking a farm from which another man was evicted. He was boycotted and under police protection when the meeting was held.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Where is the evidence of that?

*MR. MADDEN: I state it as a matter of fact. In speeches made on the occasion references were made to this property, and it is important to remember what is likely to be the effect in such a district of exhortations to the people to deal with land-grabbers as they knew how. It is said you may do in England what you may not do in Ireland, and possibly you might hold meetings in Middlesex and Kent, and harmlessly use language that in Ireland would incite to outrage and crime in counties where the Plan of Campaign is in operation, and still more in the neighbourhood of estates where tenants have been evicted, and where the persons who have taken the farms have to be placed under police protection. The same observation applies have now succeeded in bringing out £20,000 at par, bearing only 4 per cent, and have forwarded to the Board of Works a cheque for that amount. These facts will be admitted to be most crucial tests of returning prosperity. The same observation applies to the Castle Connell meeting, which was held in the neighbourhood of the evicted farm, which had been taken by a man named Quilty, who was denounced by name at the meeting, and, as a result, Quilty was driven from the farm. I think it is important that the attention of the House should be directed to the more serious prosecution, for if those who are responsible for the administration of the law contented themselves with dealing with the cases mentioned by hon. Members opposite, the important cases would not be mentioned at all. I will now call the attention of the House for a moment to the class of cases that have been adduced on the other side as grounds of the indictment against Her Majesty's Government—small and trivial cases. It is a remarkable fact that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, who moved the Amendment to the Address, supported his indictment of the conduct of the Government in the administration of the Crimes Act by referring to cases under the ordinary law where persons were bound over to good behaviour. Two young men were charged with obstructing a constable at Ennis. The offence, the right hon. Gentleman said, consisted of laughing at a policeman. This he said the defendants denied, and the magistrate sentenced one to three months' imprisonment in default of bail for good behaviour. In the first place, this was not a prosecution under the Crimes Act at all, but under a Statute that prevails both in England and Ireland. The defendants deliberately insulted the constable, called him "a low scoundrel, the meanest man in Ennis," and said "we will soon kick you out of the town." This is one of the cases made the foundation for a grave indictment of the Government for their administration of the Crimes Act! The proceedings were under the ordinary law, one of the accused gave bail for good behaviour, the other was imprisoned in default of giving bail. Then another case brought forward was one arising out of a charge of riot and unlawful assembly, and two men were found guilty and imprisoned for a month. The offence was one of the incidents of the Plan of Campaign, the accused formed part of a disorderly crowd engaged in hooting the agent of Lord Kenmare. The right hon. Gentleman quoted from a newspaper article, but the newspaper extract from which he read contained only the evidence for the defence. It is upon the prosecution of "corner boys" and roughs such as might be found in any town that the right hon. Gentleman founds his case. These cases have really nothing to do with the charge against the Government, and is it fair or right to bring them forward and found upon them a serious charge against the administration of the law? The hon. and learned Member for Stockton (Sir Horace Davey), of whom I wish to speak with the respect I have for his professional position, commenced his speech by saying, "I am not going to make charges against the Government except upon evidence I have sifted and found satisfactory;" but what did he do? He proceeded to found a charge against the Government upon a newspaper extract, the date of which he was unable to fix, and as to which his notion of the locality was vague. However, I have been able to identify the case. The hon. and learned Member commented severely on the administration of the law, under which, he said, one man was convicted for conspiracy and for unlawful assembly. He argued that one man cannot make a conspiracy, or an unlawful assembly. I do not quarrel with his law. But on examination I find that the man was proceeded against, not for conspiracy or unlawful assembly, but for intimidation. What was done by the representative of the Crown was this, out of a number of cases of intimidation one man was selected as having been guilty of the most intimidatory language, and he only was prosecuted. This was the entire foundation for this charge against the administration of the law, a charge which the hon. and learned Gentleman said he would only bring on sifted and satisfactory evidence.

MR. SHAW - LEFEVRE : Were there not fourteen young men actually charged?

*MR. MADDEN : Yes. Fourteen were charged with intimidation, but the prosecutor, on examining the evidence, found that by far the greater part of the intimidation was from one man, and decided to proceed against this one only. This, I think, indicates discretion and forbearance on the part of the prosecution. Instead of proceeding against 13 comparatively innocent men, they proceeded against the one against whom the charges were more grave, and he was convicted. I call attention to this as showing the recklessness of the charges made by hon. and learned Gentlemen whose position should afford some security against such attacks, and who disclaim any intention of making a charge except on clear and satisfactory evidence. Some other matters have been mentioned in debate to which I ought to call attention. I have to mention a matter to which attention was called by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle. He asked, how does it occur that Mr. O'Brien, who delivered a speech on the last day of September was not prosecuted in respect to that speech until the month of January. The answer is this; in November, last year, a pledge was given by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House, that no Member should be proceeded against until the expiration of the discussion on the Estimates. Now, it will be within the recollection of hon. Members—the painful recollection, perhaps—that our discussions did not terminate until Christmas Eve, leaving but a short period of time before the re-assembling of Parliament. That leaves a great portion of the time accounted for. Then Christmas intervened, and then a prosecution was instituted in January. So the lapse of time from the giving of the pledge is accounted for. Surely hon. Members would not suggest that the pledge given should have been violated? If it were observed, the prosecution could not have been instituted at an earlier time. Two or three statements were made by the hon. Member for Mayo, in the course of his speech, that ought to be dealt with. The hon. Member read a statement in reference to the treatment of persons imprisoned for complicity in reference to the Belfast insurance frauds. I am in a position to say, on the authority of the Governor of the prison, that the statement is entirely without foundation.

MR. CLANCY: When was the statement submitted by the Governor?

*MR. MADDEN: This question has nothing to do with the point which I am making. I say the Governor states that the statement made is without foundation in fact. Then the hon. Member referred to the exceptional treatment of another prisoner, a Mr. White, who was described as a magistrate. I have to state that this man never was a magistrate at all. Why was he described as a magistrate? Was it to insinuate that, on account of his position, he was exempted from ordinary prison discipline? This is the gravamen of your charge; but if you want to establish that differences in treatment are made, you must prove it by other instances than this.

MR. DILLON: I may be allowed to say in passing that I stated this gentleman was a Magistrate, not laying particular stress upon it, but to indicate his position as one of the landlord class.

*MR. MADDEN: The hon. Member usually weighs his words. However, now that it appears that the person in question was not a magistrate, the hon. Member attaches no particular importance to the statement. He never was a magistrate, and, further, I may say he was under infirmity treatment suffering from a serious and dangerous disease. Such is the case brought before the House to suggest there has been in certain cases a variation from the ordinary prison discipline. I am not going into all the matters of detail which have been referred to. Time will not allow of it; but before I pass from this subject I would venture to remind the House that my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary has always said that he was ready to consider as an important and interesting question what changes, if any, should be made in England and Ireland alike in the treatment of different classes of prisoners, but that meanwhile the existing law must be fairly enforced by the Government. The position of prisoners under the Act of 1877 is regulated by Statute. It is suggested that the Act places a dispensing power in the Lord Lieutenant or the Home Secretary, enabling him to say that this man shall be treated under one set of rules with leniency, while another shall be treated with the utmost vigour of discipline. There is no such position occupied by the Lord Lieutenant or Chief Secretary in Ireland, or the Home Secretary in England. It is easy to contradict, but

I challenge support of the contradiction by argument. The Prisons Board can under a section of that Act make rules subject to the sanction of the Lord Lieutenant in Council, and these rules are binding on the Executive, when made with the sanction of the Privy Council, as fully as if they had been contained in the Act of 1877. It is not in the power of the Chief Secretary or the Home Secretary here arbitrarily to depart from the rules so made. The rules may be right or wrong, but until they are altered there is no power to depart from them. Earlier in this discussion attention was called to the force and violence alleged to have been used in enforcing these rules, and it has been said if a prisoner refuses to wear the prison clothes he should be punished according to the rules. Now, there are certain rules that cannot be so enforced. For instance, if a prisoner refuses to enter his cell, is it contended that he shall be deprived of his ordinary allowance of food so long as he refuses? There are certain continuous acts of non-performance against which you cannot enforce the rules by a continuous deprivation of food. If you did you might kill the prisoner in enforcing the rule. It is plain there are some rules compliance with which can only be effectually enforced by some exercise of force. The Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman arraigns the administration of the law in Ireland, because he says it deprives Irishmen of their rights. That is a very strong statement, and I presume it belongs to that class of statements as those in which we are told that the Crimes Act created new crimes. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian in a letter published on February 20, said the Tories and Dissident Liberals thought fit, under the pretence of legislating against crime, to pass a law having practically no concern with crime except that it makes Irishmen liable to punishment for acts of exclusive dealing, which same exclusive dealing is practised by Tories in England, so that was a crime in Ireland which was not a crime in England. Further, he said that Mr. O'Brien was prosecuted for threatening to do what Primrose Dames did in England. Now, the statement of the right hon. Gentleman is that we passed a law making a new crime—making that a crime which is not a crime in England. He applies that statement to the prosecution in question.

MR. GLADSTONE: No; I apply it to the speech of counsel.

*MR. MADDEN: Does the right hon. Gentleman admit that all these prosecutions for conspiracy are for offences which would be crimes in England? No, he does not admit that; that is the exact point upon which we differ. With one solitary exception, the principal cases under the Crimes Act to which I have referred are prosecutions for conspiracy. Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that under the section under which in certain classes of cases jurisdiction is given to Resident Magistrates to deal with cases of conspiracy, the classes of conspiracy are defined as those punishable by ordinary law? Let any hon. Member get up and show that under this section of the Act proceedings can be taken against any persons for a conspiracy that was not indictable by Common Law before the Act was passed. If that is so, what becomes of the suggestion that that which is an offence in Ireland is not an offence in England? If there is any meaning in the language of the letter I have referred to, the right hon. Gentleman states that the kind of "exclusive dealing," as he has called it, practised against what are termed land-grabbers, is of the same kind as the exclusive dealing alleged to be practised by Primrose Dames in England. Well, I should like to understand how the descriptions of boycotting which have been given by right hon. Gentlemen opposite apply to the alleged exclusive dealing of Primrose Dames in England. We have a description of boycotting from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Bridgeton Division, which I shall read to the House. In a speech delivered on the 17 Oct., 1885, he said—

"What is boycotting? Boycotting off all communication and all the advantages of civilisation, and all the means of life for the people who have taken farms which the National League did not intend they should take, and from all people who communicate or deal with them, or work for them. These wretched people are called 'land-grabbers' and they are denounced to the vengeance of the mob in printed notices and in violent speeches. Now, when Lord Spencer was in Ireland to issue these notices and to make these speeches was a punishable offence, and what was more it was an offence which was punished and punished very effectually. But hardly was Lord Spencer out of office, which in his case meant power, for I see no distinction, than a meeting near some evicted farms was held for the purpose of intimidation, a meeting which Lord Spencer had forbidden to be held, was held——"

It must be satisfactory to the right hon. Gentleman to know that he has now no reason to apprehend the dereliction of duty that he then condemned. I have now to refer to the case of Mr. Harrington. It has been stated that the Court expressed an opinion that Mr. Harrington's speech was of an innocent character. Now, Mr. Harrington was convicted of the offence of publishing that speech as made at a meeting of the National League with the purpose of promoting the objects of that Association. My right hon. Friend has called attention to the circumstances under which the meeting was held, and what I wish to point out is that it is incorrect to say the Court pronounced an opinion directly or indirectly upon the innocent nature of the speech. What they did say was that there was no proof of writing to the Plan of Campaign other than the publication in the newspaper that the meeting was held and the speech made there.

MR. R. T. REID: Was there any evidence of the speech having been delivered?

* MR. MADDEN: There was the evidence of the speech afforded by its having been published in the defendant's newspaper. Mr. Harrington however was not convicted on a charge of delivering the speech. Of course to support such a charge there should have been evidence beyond the publication, but I am meeting the distinct statement that the hon. Member is suffering imprisonment for a speech the Court declared innocent. That is not a fact. The guilt or innocence of the speech was never adjudicated upon. Of course the report of the meeting and the danger of reporting such a proceeding under all the circumstances of the case were before the Magistrate. Then it is said this was a vindictive proceeding on the part of the Magistrate, and right hon. Gentlemen accept that statement. I would call attention to two circumstances that should be borne in mind. The Magistrates being of opinion that it was a dangerous thing under the circumstances to have these notices of National League meetings published in the paper, offered not to punish if Mr. Harrington would give an undertaking not to repeat the offence. That may have been wise or foolish, but at least it does not indicate the existence of any vindictive feeling. In the next place I want to point out that an appeal could have been taken from the sentence to the County Court Judge, and these County Court Judges are as independent of the Government as any Judge in England. In all my 25 years' experience of and acquaintance with the traditions of the Bar I never heard of a County Court Judge being promoted by the Ministry. [Cries of "O'Hagan."] Lord O'Hagan resigned his chairmanship, entered Parliament, and became a distinguished Member of the Legislature.

MR. T. M. HEALY: John O'Hagan, not Thomas.

* MR. MADDEN: Mr. John O'Hagan was not a County Court Judge, he had retired.

MR. T. M. HEALY: He was promoted.

* MR. MADDEN: The hon. and learned Member is misinformed, Mr. John O'Hagan was not a County Court Judge when he was made a Judge of the High Court, he had retired from that position, and was simply a practising Member of the Bar, not only technically and legally, but absolutely as a matter of fact. The County Court Judges are independent of the Government, and there is no ground for suggesting that services were rewarded by the promotion of a County Court Judge to the Bench. Then the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle made a serious charge against a Magistrate for refusing to state a case on a point of law that the Court of Exchequer decided ought to be argued. I only refer to it to show how he is mistaken.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Was not a case applied for and granted after it had been refused?

*MR. MADDEN: The case was not refused, upon the point raised in the Court of Exchequer, but on other grounds.

MR. T. M. HEALY: On this point I do not hesitate to assert the hon. and learned Gentleman is mistaken.

*MR. MADDEN: I must remind the hon. and learned Member he will have full opportunity of replying to me. Let him show what was the point upon which the Court of Exchequer required argument. The suggestions of the right hon. Member for Newcastle were directed against the whole administration of the law, and therefore it is I trouble the House with this matter. He attacked the resident magistrates generally and brought forward this instance as an illustration, he said, of their administration. I must say, however, that I think, as compared with what I have observed on former occasions, the attacks on Resident Magistrates are now less violent. I congratulate the House on the fact that the merits of the decisions of Resident Magistrates seem to be recognized even by hon. Members opposite. How can it be otherwise when we see the results of appeals? My right hon. Friend has stated that the percentage of successful appeals from the decisions of Resident Magistrates is only eight. I think that the difference in the results of Crimes Act appeals, as compared with those under the ordinary law, is fully accounted for by one fact—that the Legislature has taken care that in each case one member of the Court shall be a gentleman of whose legal knowledge the Lord Lieutenant is satisfied. This consideration suggests itself to common sense as accounting for the difference in the two classes of Appeals, and the fact that only 8 per cent of the decisions under the Crimes Act have been reversed on appeal. What ground is there for the statement that the administration of the law has deprived people of their rights? What rights have been assailed? Do hon. Members claim the right to carry on their agrarian policy by means of crime—by what in England would be regarded as criminal conspiracy? Does this become a sacred right when done in the interest of the right hon. Gentleman and his Friends? I challenge any lawyer to get up and say that in the case of any prosecution for conspiracy the Act of 1887 has created new crimes, or deprived men of the exercise of what in England is a lawful right. No; the administration of the law has deprived no man of his rights. I go further, and claim for it that it has restored to the humblest man in Ireland what Englishmen regard as the highest right of all—the right of individual liberty, the right of every man to buy from whom he pleases, to sell to whom he pleases, to hire what land he pleases, and pay what rent he pleases. When these rights shall be fully restored to every man, the administration of the law will have accomplished its task. I submit that the House and the country will approve the efforts—the honest and successful efforts—which have been made by the Government towards the attainment of that end, the substitution of the reign of law, with its needful sanctions, for the lawless coercion which has so long destroyed the liberty and paralyzed the energies of Ireland.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): I have listened with great care and interest to the speech just delivered, and though I am willing to admit it was characterized with the hon. Gentleman's usual good taste and tone, and which I think favourably distinguishes his speeches from the more aggressive tone of those of the Chief Secretary, yet I venture to think that speech did not carry the case of the Government one step beyond where it was left by the two Members of the Government who preceded him. The hon. and learned Gentleman has dealt with many matters of detail put before the House by hon. Members on this side, and he has dealt with the question of the treatment of political prisoners to some extent, and upon this subject I will follow him later, but he has not attempted to grapple with the remarkable speech in which my right hon. Friend indicted the Government administration of the Coercion Act. The hon. and learned Gentleman has travelled over much of the ground traversed by the Chief Secretary, and especially in reference to the diminution in the practice of boycotting, justifying that paragraph in the Address to which we take exception, the words referring to the salutary effects of the Coercion Act. If the statistics the hon. and learned Member has quoted as to a diminution in the crime of boycotting are to be relied on—though, for my own part, I feel some hesitation in accepting them implicitly—but assuming they are correct, I can only say that we on this side rejoice at such a diminution. But it must be permitted to us to believe that that is not due mainly or even in part to the Coercion Act, but is due mainly to other circumstances, namely, improvement in agriculture, the great rise in agricultural prices, and other circumstances, among which undoubtedly the passing of the Land Act of 1887 has had a good effect in bringing about the termination of many agrarian disputes. It is partly due also to combinations of tenants having in many instances closed disputes between landlord and tenant, and where this has been the case the districts in which such disputes existed have become quiet and boycotting has come to an end. No doubt also it is partly due, as the hon. Member for Mayo said in his remarkable speech, to the consciousness on the part of the Irish people that a large proportion of the people of England sympathize with them, and are prepared to consider and redress their grievances. To these causes, rather than to the operation of the Coercion Act, we attribute the improvement, and, if time permitted, I could show historically that in no previous instance has a Coercion Act reduced crime, but it has rather had a reverse effect. It would be more to the point if the Government could show there has been a reduction in the number of prosecutions under the Act. On that we have no statistics given us, but it is a well-known fact that during the last two months, and since the close of last Session, there have been a greater number of cases under the Act than in any previous period of the same length of time. I need only refer to the number of Members of Parliament sent to prison or convicted and awaiting appeal. Probably the result of the appeals will be that a vast number of convicted men will be sent to prison. Now there are a few cases under that head which I should like to bring to the attention of the House. The hon. and learned Member has alluded among other cases to one at Pilltown, in County Kilkenny; but his account of the facts has been inadequate even to the point of misrepresentation. The truth of the matter is that 14 young men were charged with shouting "grabber" outside the house of a man named Power. Power, for refusing to give evidence against the men, was committed for eight days, and it is no wonder that he said he had suffered more from the police than from the people. The case against the 14 young men was adjourned; but Power still refused to give evidence. For want of evidence 13 of the young men were dismissed; but the fourteenth was called upon to find bail for his good behaviour, and on refusing was sent to prison for six months. It seems to me that this man who was convicted suffered great hardship; but this is only one illustration of the way in which the Coercion Act is administered at the present time in Ireland. Another case occurred on January 29, when seven men at Dundalk were tried for illegal meeting. The evidence consisted in proving them to have shouted in the streets, "We are the men of '98, Young Irelanders." Their own story was that they were singing a well-known song. They were sentenced to three months' imprisonment, which, whether their story was true or not, was a severe punishment, and shows the harsh state of things now existing in Ireland. Again, in the beginning of February, 31 young men in two batches were summoned for illegal meeting at Waterford, the only evidence being that they had groaned at the police. They were called upon to give bail for their good conduct, under a Statute of Edward III., and on refusing were sent to prison for three months. Another case occurred at Waterford a few days later in September, where 13 young men were prosecuted for attending a procession held in honour of the so-called Manchester martyrs. There was a demonstration on their being conducted to gaol, and on February 20, 20 other men were dragged from their beds after midnight and prosecuted next day for taking part in this demonstration. This case is not yet finally settled. Then there is yet another case—that at Kiltinane, Co. Limerick, where Michael Kelly, secretary of the local branch of the National League, was charged with intimidation towards John Kelly, with a view to cause him to do an act which he had a legal right to abstain from doing—namely, attend a meeting of the Glencoe branch of the League. There was a dispute between John Kelly and Mrs. O'Donnell, which had been referred to the Arbitration of the League. The League decided in favour of Mrs. O'Donnell, and John Kelly refused to carry out the arrangement. Then Michael Kelly wrote this letter to John Kelly—

"I am directed by a Committee of this branch to inform you that a Resolution adopted by them some time ago condemning your action in respect of Mrs. O'Donnell, will be sent to the surrounding branches if you fail to put in an appearance next Sunday at the meeting of the same."

For this, the Secretary of the League was convicted and sentenced to two months' imprisonment. These cases fully and completely prove the harshness with which the Coercion Act has been carried out in Ireland. They are cases in which no English jury would ever convict. And the main point of the Coercion Act is the withdrawal of such cases from the juries. The Chief Secretary has asked in what way the liberty of the subject has been violated, and the reply is, that the right of Irishmen to trial by jury has been violated, and is being violated every hour and every day. I have more than once declared that all the prosecutions taking place under the Crimes Act may be traced directly or indirectly to some dispute existing between landlord and tenant. My conviction is that nothing would be easier than for the Government to get rid of all the cases under the Coercion Act and clear away the existing disputes between the landlords and tenants by a slight modification of the Act of 1887. It is surprising to see how many cases arise out of a single dispute. In the case of Lord Clanricarde no fewer than 170 prosecutions have taken place, and 140 persons have been sent to gaol. In the case of Lord Massereene, 54 persons have found their way to gaol; and in the case of Captain Vandeleur, 41 persons have been imprisoned. On the estate where Inspector Martin met his death, 98 convictions occurred. These figures can be connected directly or indirectly with the remaining disputes between landlords and tenants. If the Government would deal with the subject in accordance with the demands of the Irish people as put forward by their Representatives, all these disputes might be cleared away, and all necessity for prosecutions under the Crimes Act be at an end. It appears to be one of the cardinal points of the policy of the present Chief Secretary not to listen to the demands of the Irish Representatives. This is quite conspicuous both in legislation and administration. The right hon. Gentleman has during the past two years never made a concession of importance to Irish opinion. What the Irish Members have demanded he has rejected and refused; and what they most hate he has thrust upon them. Any concessions he has made have been to the Liberal Unionist Members, in order to keep the Government in power, as was avowedly stated by the Prime Minister. It is not only a question of policy but one of demeanour and speech, and the speeches of the right hon. Gentleman in the House of Commons and on the public platform have been uniformly in contempt of Irish opinion and the wishes and views of the Irish Members of this House. I venture, further, to say that from the time of the Union to the present day there has never been a Chief Secretary who has carried this policy and principle to the same extent as the present Chief Secretary. The only Chief Secretary that at all compares with him within that period in the contempt which he exhibits for Irish opinion, and in the manner in which he deals with Irish questions, is Mr. Stanley in 1832; and we all know now that Mr. Stanley brought down the Government of Lord Grey. I have little hesitation in saying that the same result will be the outcome of the attitude and policy of the present Chief Secretary in connection with this Government. The fact is there are only two ways of governing Ireland under the Act of Union consistently with the maintenance of that Act. The first is to govern Ireland as we have governed Scotland—by deferring to the views and the wishes of the Scottish people on matters of legislation purely affecting that country. The other way is to treat Ireland as an integral part of England—as an English county—and to give it equal rights and privileges with the rest of the English people. But the policy of the present Government and of the present Chief Secretary has been to adopt neither of those courses. He has treated Ireland as if it were a Crown Colony, and as if its Representatives were not entitled to be listened to, nor has any deference paid to them; and it seems to me that the logical conclusion of that Policy would be to get rid of the Irish Members from this House altogether, and to treat Ireland precisely as if it were a Crown Colony. I say that that is a policy which cannot be successful, and that as time goes on the Chief Secretary will find it more and more impossible to carry out a policy of that kind. I would illustrate this particular policy by the treatment the right hon. Gentleman has accorded to the Irish Members in respect to prosecutions under the Coercion Act. But if I refer to the treatment of Irish Members it must not be supposed that I confine my observations solely to them. There are many others in Ireland, persons of all stations and degrees—priests, editors, merchants, farmers, and peasants—who have all been treated in the same manner under the Coercion Act. In my opinion, they are all entitled to equal treatment, but we contend that in cases purely political in their character they ought not to be treated as common criminals. No one can doubt that the Irish Members in prison have been actuated by purely political motives. Out of 24 Irish Members who have been prosecuted and convicted under the Coercion Act, only two have escaped being treated as common criminals. In my judgment, they have all been convicted of offences which are not crimes according to the English Law, of offences which a jury in the United Kingdom would not have visited with a conviction. These gentlemen have been convicted of offences committed for political motives alone, and in cases where they have acted for the most part under the firm belief that their position as representatives called upon them to speak and take the course they pursued—that of advocating the cause of the weak against the strong. I venture to say that in no other country in Europe would offenders of this kind be treated as common criminals. These gentlemen have been convicted of offences which should be placed in the category of sedition and seditious libel, and persons convicted of those offences are treated by law as first-class misdemeanants. I am rather inclined to think that if these persons could have been tried at all in England, they could only have been tried for seditious libel. That is, perhaps, a matter of law, but I have consulted an able lawyer on the point, and he has informed me that if Mr. O'Brien could have been tried in England it would only have been for seditious libel. The only parallel case in England to that of Mr. O'Brien was that of Cobbett in 1831, tried by Mr. Justice Denman. Besides, the majority of Irish County Court Judges who have dealt with these cases have directed that the offenders shall be treated as first-class misdemeanants. I may quote in this connection the judgment of Mr. O'Connor Morris—one of the ablest County Court Judges in Ireland—in the case of Mr. Patrick O'Brien. Mr. O'Connor Morris said—

“I do not think I in any way exceed my powers when I exempt these gentlemen from the harsh degradation of the ordinary prisoner. In cases of sedition the Act prescribes that the accused shall be treated as first-class misdemeanants. The cases before me approach more nearly to sedition than anything else. We cannot shut our eyes to the fact that these meetings are incidents of a great secret movement that is taking place in this country, which is very grave and very deeply to be lamented. But the offences of Mr. P. O'Brien and Mr. Hayden are not to be classed as infamous crimes or disgraceful crimes, that carry with them the detestation and abhorrence of mankind."

That is the common-sense view of the matter, and ought to commend itself to every other judge who deals with these cases. Why is it that the Resident Magistrates have not followed in every case which has come before them the suggestion of the County Court Judges, but have instead sentenced these offenders to be treated as common criminals? I have no doubt that the cause is the Chief Secretary. I hold the right hon. Gentleman directly responsible for the action of the Resident Magistrates in convicting these men, and in sentencing them as common criminals. I have no doubt that it was the language used by the right hon. Gentleman in and out of the House, and the utterances of his Chief (Lord Salisbury) on the public platform that gave the cue to the Resident Magistrates to impose sentences in this way. The right hon. Gentleman has never risen to speak without justifying the treatment of these hon. Members as common criminals. That has been the uniform practice. He has said two or three times in this House that nothing would induce him for a moment to consent to those men being treated differently to common criminals under the ordinary law.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): My statement was that I would never consent, on my own authority, to modify a sentence passed on an hon. Member by a competent tribunal.

Mr. SHAW-LEFEVRE: I will undertake to look up cases. Lord Salisbury has also justified the treatment of political prisoners as common criminals, and the noble Lord is answerable, in my opinion, to a large extent for the action of the Resident Magistrates. Lord Salisbury giped and scoffed at the Irish Members in prison, and declared that he considered their conduct worse than that of criminals who had been sent to prison for thieving and offences of that kind, and the noble Lord also spoke of the effeminate and maudlin doctrine with respect to political prisoners.

Mr. Shaw-Lefevre

The right hon. Gentleman was still speaking at 5.30 when, by the rules of the House, the debate stood adjourned.

THE SPECIAL COMMISSION— QUESTIONS.

On the question that the House do now adjourn,

MR. T. HEALY (Longford, N.): I wish to ask the Home Secretary whether he can give any further information as to Mr. Pigott?

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I also wish to put a Question to the right hon. Gentleman. Immediately before the rising of the House yesterday, the Home Secretary, in answer to the hon. and learned Member for West Ham (Mr. Forrest Fulton), said that the warrant issued by the Commission Court was not brought to Scotland Yard by Messrs. Lewis till a quarter-past six o'clock; that therefore, until that hour, the police could not possibly take any steps for the arrest of Mr. Pigott; and that immediately the warrant was received every step that was possible was taken by telegraphing to the ports and by employing persons to watch at all railway stations. That statement had relation only to the warrant issued by the Judge, under which no proceeding for extradition could be founded. I therefore ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he was aware, when he made that statement, that informations for perjury against Mr. Pigott were sworn at Bow Street yesterday by Mr. Parnell, Mr. Lewis, Mr. Labouchere, and Mr. Campbell, and that a few minutes before four o'clock Mr. Vaughan issued a warrant against Mr. Pigott for perjury, and that instantly that warrant was put into the hands of an Inspector of the Metropolitan Police; and will the right hon. Gentleman endeavour to reconcile his statement with those facts? I also ask whether, yesterday or last night the Government took any step to communicate with their agents in France, or in other parts of the Continent, or adopted any measures to secure the arrest of Mr. Pigott outside of the United Kingdom? I ask, further, whether any steps have been taken to obtain the extradition of Mr. Pigott, and, pending his extradition, to fix his whereabouts and watch his movements?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): When I made the statement at the rising of the House last night, I was only aware of the warrant which had reached Scotland Yard at the time I named, and was not aware that the Bow Street warrant had been issued. It is quite true that between half-past four and five o'clock yesterday a warrant—I think for forgery, which I believe to be an extraditable offence—was issued from Bow Street police-court by Mr. Vaughan. It was given to the inspector on duty at the court, and was instantly acted on by him, in the ordinary course, without communicating with head-quarters. It had not, therefore, reached Scotland Yard at the time I spoke last night, and I knew nothing of it. As to telegraphic communication with France, I have already stated that telegrams were last night addressed to all the agents of the police, not only in France, but to all foreign stations, as to Mr. Pigott's whereabouts. As to the steps which have been taken to-day, I have received no information in addition to what I stated this morning—namely, that the ordinary steps have been taken at the Home Office, and that the Home Office officials have been themselves in communication with the Foreign Office in order to obtain extradition from the French Government.

MR. SEXTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman say whether, pending the possible extradition of Pigott, steps are being taken to fix his whereabouts and to keep him in view.

MR. MATTHEWS: I think the right hon. Gentleman will see that I had better not go into that subject. The police are taking the usual course. I may say that my impression is that forgery is extraditable, but not perjury.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): May I ask whether the right hon. Gentleman said perjury was an extraditable offence?

MR. MATTHEWS: My impression is that forgery is an extraditable offence, but not perjury.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): In the absence of the Attorney General, I beg to ask the Solicitor

Mr. Matthews

General whether he is aware that the Times is still selling its pamphlets called "Parnellism and Crime," and how long after what is called the apology of this morning it is going to disseminate these forgeries?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir E. CLARKE, Plymouth): I have no information whatever with regard to that subject.

MR. T. HEALY: I ask your permission, Mr. Speaker, to give notice that to-morrow, if the Government can give us no information with regard to Pigott, I will ask Her Majesty's Postmaster-General at what hour the telegrams were sent out from Scotland Yard last night.

IRELAND—IMPRISONMENT OF MR. CAREW, M.P.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin County, N.): I wish to ask a Question on another subject. As an action for alleged slander has been brought by a Resident Magistrate against Mr. Carew, who is now in prison at Kilkenny, and as an application has been made to the Prisons Board for his removal to Dublin Prison to enable him to consult his legal adviser, which application has been refused, I wish to ask whether the Government will give directions to the Prisons Board to comply with that reasonable request, so as to prevent the public from concluding that it is intended to load the dice against Mr. Carew in the Civil Courts?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): I will inquire into the matter at once, and see how it stands.

House adjourned at a quarter before Six o'clock.

HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES.

No. 6.]

FIRST VOLUME OF SESSION 1889.

[MARCH 8.]

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, 26th February, 1889.

LAND TRANSFER BILL.—(No. 8.)

(The Lord Chancellor.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord HALSBURY), in moving the second reading of this Bill, said: My Lords, as I explained to your Lordships in moving the first reading of this Bill, it is the same Bill as that which was referred to a Select Committee last Session, and proceeded with down to Section 54. I now ask your Lordships to read the Bill a second time, in order that it may be referred back to the Select Committee.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>a</sup>."—(The Lord Chancellor.)

*LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY: My Lords, your Lordships are probably aware from the newspapers that the Lord Chancellor on the 1st of January issued new Rules for the registration of land under Lord Cairns's Act of 1875, and for this purpose made use of the Ordnance maps. I have been to the office of the Land Registry, and I learn that the new Rules are working well, and that a very fair amount of business has been done considering the short time that has passed since the new Rules were issued. The Ordnance maps for the whole of England are not yet published, but I have been informed that, notwithstanding this, the head of the Ordnance Survey is prepared to give maps for any place for which registration is required. I hope that under the circumstances the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack will give sufficient time for this experiment to work, and for its effects to be observed; and that he will not, except in case of sales, insist upon compulsory registration, which would be very burdensome to all, and especially to those owners who had no occasion to deal with their property, or no intention of selling it.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> accordingly, and referred to a Select Committee.

LUNACY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.—

(No. 9.)

(The Lord Chancellor.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord HALSBURY): My Lords, in moving the Second Reading of this Bill, I need trouble the House with only a few observations. The Bill was passed in your Lordships' House in 1863, in 1866, in 1867, and again in last year. It is unnecessary, therefore, for me on this occasion to discuss the main provisions of the measure. There appears to be some matters upon which there is a difference of opinion; but your Lordships will no doubt feel that those matters will be better discussed when we are in Committee on the Bill. My Lords, I move the Second Reading of the Bill.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>a</sup>."—(The Lord Chancellor.)

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> accordingly.

REFORM OF THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

*THE EARL OF CARNARVON, in rising to ask whether it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to submit to Parliament any measure for restraining unworthy Members of their Lordships' House from voting or taking part in its proceedings, said: My Lords, it will be in the recollection of your Lordships that the noble and learned Lord at the head of Her Majesty's Government last year introduced two Bills dealing with this subject. The first Bill was mainly concerned in giving the Crown a power to appoint Life Peers. It would be a stretch of imagination to say that that Bill met with any very enthusiastic welcome from your Lordships; and, though my noble Friend introduced the Bill, I doubt whether he was himself a very keen supporter of it. However, that Bill has passed away, and I do not propose on this occasion to disturb its rest. There was a second Bill, and, in my opinion, a more valuable one which accompanied it, which I might briefly express by saying that it was a measure intended for the purification of this House. My Lords, the object of that Bill, I think, was a very valuable one. My noble Friend will do me the justice to remember that for years past I have always desired to see some such Bill introduced, and though I am not quite clear that the machinery proposed by that Bill was all that could have been desired, yet the object of it was one upon which I think there was no difference of opinion expressed in this House, and one in which I certainly fully and entirely concur. Your Lordships will remember that it was late in the Session: that we had a considerable debate in this House, and many important speeches were made, and the Bill, I think, passed through the second reading, and was sent to Committee, and the expectations about it were sanguine. At that moment my noble Friend got up and announced that my right honourable Friend Mr. Smith in another place had, in accomplishing that which is euphemistically called "the massacre of the innocents," consigned these two Bills to destruction. My Lords, the House broke up, there was a dissolving view, and the Bills themselves absolutely vanished from sight. The question that I have to ask my noble Friend is this: whether he is prepared either to revise the second of those two Bills for the purification of this House, or to introduce something similar? I earnestly hope that my noble Friend will be able to give an affirmative answer to my Question. My Lords, it is impossible not to feel that some such measure is necessary. There are, unfortunately, cases which I need not specify, because most of them are notorious. There are cases in which old and honoured names have been dragged through the mud, and in which it has been openly stated out of doors that the holders of those names and titles were unworthy to sit here. My Lords, there may be, and there often is, in these cases a good deal of exaggeration. The numbers are comparatively few. It is not wonderful that there should be, out of so large a number as those who fill this House—nearly 600—some who are untrue to the traditions of their family, or to the names that they bear, but it is not the less fatally injurious, because the statements concerning them are taken up, repeated and exaggerated, and the effect which is produced all through the country is one which reacts not only upon this House, but all the great institutions of the land. And, my Lords, in a certain sense, that is an opinion which I hold to be entirely right. I believe that there is no one of your Lordships whom I am now addressing who does not agree with me in the necessity of purging this House from such unworthy Members. I am quite certain that there is not one dissentient out of doors. Your Lordships will remember that we are charged with legislative functions. It is absolutely inconceivable that men whose characters are tainted should, by hereditary right, be empowered to make laws and determine the policy of the country. There are certain cases in this world where public and private character are so bound up with each other that it is impossible to separate them, and I venture to say that in the case of this House the private character of individual Members becomes to all intents and purposes public property. My Lords, it is on this foundation that this House really stands. Take that away and it is nothing but a baseless fabric. We are perfectly right in discussing as we did the other night what should be the quorum, what the attendance, what the best rules for the despatch of public business: all these things are, doubtless, of great public utility. But, after all, the real stay and pillar of this House is the character of its individual Members, and those who legislate and those who are empowered here to pronounce authoritatively upon public policy should, like Cæsar's wife, be above all cavil and suspicion. Therefore, I say that your Lordships would be perfectly right in framing, so far as we are concerned, the severest possible rules by which we may both hold our seats and take part in public proceedings. My Lords, it may be perfectly well said that there are Gentlemen of a very questionable character in the other House of Parliament. It is perfectly true; but, at the same time, you must remember that the House of Commons is an elective body, and that creates a very great distinction, and we must leave the House and the constituents who send up an unworthy Member to settle the matter between themselves. They have had to do this before now, and they may have to do it again. It is probably necessary, I apprehend, to adopt the course which the Government thought fit to adopt last year, and to introduce a Bill upon the subject. It would be a matter of high Constitutional law whether we could meet the difficulty by our own powers; I assume that it is necessary to introduce a Bill. Statutory power is probably needed either to remove or to suspend from his functions in this House an unworthy Peer; but, anyhow, it would be necessary for your Lordships to supplement such a measure by machinery within the House. The Bill of last year, as far as I remember, did not provide that machinery, but I assume that the Government would have made some recommendations upon that subject had the Bill passed. Now I have heard it also said, sometimes, that there should be precedent for this. My Lords, I hold that where a great evil exists, as undoubtedly does exist here, an evil not to be measured by the mere numbers of the delinquents, it would be desirable to make a precedent if no precedent existed; and it does seem to me strange that there should not be some such power of censorship or of suspension inherent in any great body like this when we have seen it exercised from time immemorial—from the time of the Roman Senate down to the constitution of a London West End club. But, as a matter of fact, there is a precedent, so far as it goes, in this respect: that, by the recent Bankruptcy Act, anyone who is adjudged bankrupt is disqualified from sitting or voting in this House. It has also been said that it will be very difficult to specify with sufficient clearness the particular offences for which it is desired to invoke this power of removal or suspension. I confess I do not follow that objection at all. I see no reason whatever why you should define and specify the offence so closely. The Bill of last year did not do so. It very wisely avoided that mistake. After all, it is for your Lordships to remember that in the Army and in the Navy conduct unbefitting a gentleman and an officer is thought ample, and more than ample, to bring down punishment on the offender's head. I venture to think that that which serves the Army and Navy may serve us in this case. My Lords, I do not desire on this occasion to argue this matter any further. What I have said has been with a view of impressing upon my noble Friend at the head of Her Majesty's Government the extreme importance which I, and I believe many of your Lordships, attach, and which certainly is attached out of doors, to the purifying of this House from those few, but still notorious, offenders who detract from its weight and authority as a public institution. I am confident that it can be accomplished, and that it can be accomplished with justice to the individual, with satisfaction to the public, and with credit also to this House.

*EARL COWPER: My Lords, I do not know whether I shall be considered very singular when I ask your Lordships clearly to say whether you think that it is necessary to legislate on this particular point at all. No one has complained with regard to our black sheep that they are common at all, that they put themselves very much forward, that they bleat very loudly, or that they really make themselves objectionable in any way in this House. That being the case and it being our invariable custom in this country not to legislate for imaginary evils, but only to take action when there is a real grievance to remedy, I would ask whether sufficient case has been made out for legislation upon this matter or for proceeding by a Resolution? This House is not a new institution. It has existed for many hundreds of years, and I think we have got on very well until now without anything of this sort being done. I think that we may perhaps be aided rather by history. Two or three generations ago there were at least as many disreputable characters belonging to this House as there are now, but it was never thought necessary to take means for preventing them taking their seats. A great many charges have been made by the public against this House, but I do not think want of respectability is one of them. We have been very unjustly found fault with in many respects. Our wisdom, our energy, our freedom from prejudice, and our power of adapting ourselves to the spirit of the age—all these qualities have been, I think, very unjustly impugned at different times; but I do not think our respectability has ever been questioned. For these reasons, I venture to think, it is quite unnecessary to legislate in this matter. Then, my Lords, consider the practical difficulty. It is not at all easy to make out who ought to be excluded. My noble Friend alluded to bankrupts. Well, there are very often cases in which the bankruptcy is more the misfortune than the fault of the unfortunate bankrupt. If you look back to former days you will find that some of the greatest historical men—some of the greatest statesmen, like Pitt, and Fox, and Sheridan, and others—were always on the verge of bankruptcy, and were only saved from it by the munificence of their friends. Again, I suppose the noble Earl would exclude Peers from this House who had been the subject of an adverse verdict in a Court of Justice. Now, will the noble Earl consider the Jockey Club a Court of Justice for that purpose? Remember that many men have been before the Courts and been convicted for a very great fault, and for something that does not necessarily stigmatize them for the rest of their lives, and in the same way many men who have never been before the Courts at all are great sinners and unworthy to sit in any respectable assembly. If you take Courts of Justice as a criterion, will you apply the principle to spiritual Lords as well as temporal? For instance, if a Bishop is convicted of a ritualistic offence, will he be debarred for ever from sitting in this House? I do not think my noble Friend who brought forward his question will quite approve of that. My Lords, the more I consider this matter the more I cannot help thinking that it will be much better to leave it where it is.

*THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: My Lords, if the question before your Lordships' House was the effect upon this House of those few Members of it whom the noble Lord described as "black sheep," I should say that the remarks of the noble Earl who has just sat down were very pertinent, but as the question before your Lordships is, as pointed out by my noble Friend below (Lord Carnarvon), the effect upon the public generally of the fact that some Members of this House might be called unworthy Members of the Legislature, I cannot see that the arguments of the noble Lord are very much to the point. I cannot at all agree with the noble Earl that the objections which are sometimes raised in the country to this House, among them the fact that this House contains these unworthy Members, be they few or many, are of no importance. The objections that are made to this House in the country generally consist of two. First of all, that great divisions are often taken by Members of this House who very seldom participate in the debates, and who very seldom attend the House. The second is that there are some Members of this House, who may possibly influence by their votes the whole destinies of the people, who are certainly not persons who would be elected to this or to any other Legislative Assembly. I sincerely trust that the noble Member the Prime Minister will introduce the Bill of last Session which will become full of a number of amendments which will admit that the great fault of this House is that it contains a few Members who are unworthy to sit in it. I think that the noble Earl who brought forward his question will quite agree with me that it would be a great improvement if the House though I am happy to think that the acquaintance of the noble Earl with bankruptcy appears to be a very limited one, because the noble Earl, apparently, saw no difference between being on the verge of bankruptcy, and being a bankrupt; but I should think that the difference to the individual concerned would be very great indeed. If the Crown has power given it to cancel a writ, or not to issue a writ, I presume that power would only be set in motion by a Resolution of the House or by some means of that kind, and that some tribunal would be appointed by the House in order to advise the House in the matter. I do not think it would be very difficult to purge the House of these unworthy Members by any statutory measure that may be brought in. Last Session I had the honour of introducing a Bill dealing with the Reform of the Constitution of this House by your Lordships, a Bill that I am bound to say, for, flatter myself as I may, met with very little approbation from any quarter of this House. At the same time without arrogance, I think, I may say that I believe that time will somewhat soften your Lordships' views towards that Bill, because I do believe that people in this country are very much in favour of real and large reforms of this House, and I believe that when your Lordships have made up your minds that such is the case, this House will undertake its own reform; and I venture to think that when this House seriously entertains such matters, the measure which will be introduced will be found to proceed very much on the lines of the Bill which I had the honour to introduce. I can only say that it would be difficult to deal with this subject in any other way than that which I suggested last Session, namely—by delegation or selection. It would be impossible to put upon any Committee of this House, or any individual Member of the House, the disagreeable and invidious task of saying that certain Peers were unworthy to take part in the proceedings of the House. It seems to me the only way in which the difficulty can be got over is by the House appointing a certain number of its members to deal with the matter. But be that as it may, as there is no likelihood whatever of anything of the kind that I have mentioned being accepted by the House, I sincerely trust that Her Majesty's Government will not undervalue the evil that now exists, and that some measure will be introduced dealing with the subject.

*LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY: My Lords, there is an offence which has not been mentioned by the noble Earl who spoke last but one (Earl Cowper) that is, when a man joins a political party, or a Government, and then, for popularity-hunting or self-seeking, abandons it and causes it great embarrassment; in short, how many times may a man rat and not be an unworthy Member of the House?

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: From what was said by the noble Earl who opened this debate, one might imagine that this House is in a very much more serious condition morally than it actually is. The noble Earl spoke of a great evil, and of the necessity of correcting it, and he used words of solemn warning, which rather reminded me of the attempts of Cromwell to purge his Legislative Assemblies, or of the kind of denunciation the leaders of the Mountain were accustomed to address to their followers. I do not think this House is so largely composed of reprobate members as the noble Lord seems to think.

*THE EARL OF CARNARVON: I beg my noble Friend's pardon; but I particularly stated that the evil was not to be measured by the number of individuals who were charged.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Still I suppose there is some relation between the denunciations and the extent of the evil. I think if we discuss the existence of black sheep at all, it would be desirable that some bold person should move that a sort of list should be laid on the Table, and if a return were moved of Peers who have committed any legal offence within the last five years, my impression is that the return would be small. If it is not legal offences that are contemplated, what other offences would you put in? I am not averse to giving a censorial power to the House, such as was proposed by the measure of last year; but I do most earnestly protest against its being concluded from the proposal of such legislation that there is anything that can be called a material grievance or that the House contains receive his countenance and support; but, as to the Life Peers Bill—that Bill which was to effect the introduction into this House of men who would enrich the House and would strengthen it in such a manner that it would be in accord with democratic principles—of that Bill we hear no more. I confess that I felt no very great enthusiasm for it; but let me act the part of a very sincere mourner over the fate of that Bill.

*THE MARQUESS OF BATH: My Lords, I do not think the general feeling of the House would be against some cautious measure which should ensure the exclusion from the House of all those whose presence in any way tends to derogate from its character and dignity. If the noble Marquess would introduce a short Bill to declare that any Peer who had been convicted on the evidence of two reliable witnesses before either a Police Magistrate or at any Sessions of having been twice in one year at a race meeting or of having been the owner of race horses should be incapacitated from setting in the House of Lords, I think the object my noble Friends have in view would be accomplished.

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY: Would the noble Lord make that proposal retrospective?

*THE EARL OF CARNARVON: My Lords, I am sorry that my noble Friend feels that there are difficulties in the way of his introduction of this measure. At the same time, he says that he will not oppose any Bill introduced by me. I do not think that any individual Member on such a question as this, stands upon a footing of equal advantage with the Government. It is a matter mainly, if not essentially, for a Government to undertake; but looking, as I do, upon this as a very serious evil, an evil, as I said before, not to be measured by the mere number of the individuals against whom complaint may be made, I think I should be wrong if I did not accept the invitation which he has given me, and if I did not at all events satisfy my conscience by laying a very short measure upon your Lordships' table. I shall endeavour to do so; and your Lordships may depend upon it that it will be of the very briefest character, for I believe the evil, such as it is, can be met by very brief legislation; and I rely with absolute confidence upon the support which my noble Friend has promised me in carrying that Bill through.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 28th February, 1889.

INCREASE OF DEFECTIVE VISION.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.) asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether his attention has been directed to statements recently made by responsible authorities, to the effect that short sight and other forms of defective vision are rapidly increasing in England; and, whether, to test the accuracy of these statements, he will direct the inspection of the children of some one Board School by a competent ophthalmic surgeon?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE) (Kent, Dartford): Statements such as those referred to were, I believe, recently made in the newspapers, and the Department are quite alive to the importance of the question, and the attention of their Inspectors will be specially directed to testing the accuracy of the alleged facts. I may add that in criticizing the plans of schools special care is taken by the Department to secure enough light, and that it shall fall in the right direction. A Royal Commission has been engaged in taking important evidence, and will shortly report upon the subject.

DR. FARQUHARSON: I beg to give notice that I will call attention to this subject on the earliest opportunity, and will move that a medical inspection of the elementary schools is required, in order to prevent an interference with the present system of compulsory education.

FACTORY ACCIDENTS.

MR. HENRY WILSON (Yorkshire, W. R., Holmfirth) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that on the 23rd April, 1888, a woman and a girl were killed and another girl seriously injured at New Mill, near Huddersfield, by unfenced shafting connected with a factory, but working in gardens; whether an inquest was held at the Huddersfield Infirmary, five miles from New Mill, on the 26th April; whether he is aware that although the coroner's jury could, for a shilling each, have visited New Mill, they did not inspect the shafting, nor was any plan or drawing produced at the inquest; whether he is aware that the Inspector of Factories, Mr. Prior, is reported as having stated at the inquest—

“On the 4th of August, when he last visited this mill, there was no shafting there; he then received no intimation of any intention to put up anything of the kind, nor had he since received any information of its being erected. . . . I have visited this mill once. I have been two years and a-half in this district, and there are lots of places I have not been able to get to for the first time yet;”

whether owners of factories are responsible for accidents arising from shafting outside factories as well as inside; whether it is a fact that Mr. Prior has some 3,200 factories and workshops in his district; and whether it is usual for an Inspector to have the oversight of so large a number of factories and workshops?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I am informed by the Chief Inspector of Factories that the facts are as stated in the first four paragraphs. Owners are responsible for accidents to persons employed in the factories for shafts and other machinery required by the Act to be securely fenced, either within the factory premises, or within the close or cartilage of such premises. The persons referred to in the Question were not employed in the factory, and were alleged to be trespassers at the spot where the accident happened. According to the last Return, the number of factories in this district is 1,918. It is a comparatively small district, and is conveniently situated.

MR. H. WILSON: My Question was not in reference to the last Return, but as to the present number.

MR. MATTHEWS: I have no knowledge of the number except from the Return.

MR. H. WILSON: Will the right hon. Gentleman make inquiry as to the present number?

MR. MATTHEWS: Yes.

MR. BROADHURST (Nottingham): May I ask if the Return includes the number of workshops; and whether the Government have considered the desirability of increasing the number of Inspectors?

MR. MATTHEWS: Yes; I understand that the Inspector General includes both factories and workshops. I have drawn the attention of the Treasury to the necessity of increasing the staff of Inspectors.

MR. BROADHURST (Nottingham): What has been the increase in the number of factory Inspectors?

MR. MATTHEWS: The increase has been two. They are not attached to any district, but their services are available wherever they are wanted.

CONSUMPTION OF LIQUOR IN INDIA.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH (Flintshire) asked the Under Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been drawn to a series of letters recently published by the hon. Member for Barrow when travelling in India; whether he has examined the statements therein relative to the rapid increase of the consumption of intoxicants in India; whether he is aware that public opinion attributes this increase to the licensing policy adopted by the Indian Government for the sake of Revenue; whether the Government of India intends to alter their Abkari (licensing) system; whether his attention has been called to the description Mr. Caine gives of the opium dens in Lucknow; and, whether he will undertake that the Indian Government will inquire into the truth of these statements, and, if they are found to be accurate, will suppress these opium dens?

THE UNDER SECRETARY FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): The Secretary of State has reason to believe that the most friendly communications took place between the hon. Member for Barrow and the authorities in India during his recent travels in that country, and that the valuable observations and statements contained in the letters of the hon. Member have been brought to the notice of those authorities by the hon. Member himself. The excise law and the excise administration vary in the several Provinces of India, according to the diverse circumstances of each Province, and it would be unwise, in the judgment of the Secretary of State, to attempt the imposition on the local Governments of one rigid system for the whole of India. The policy, however, which is uniformly inculcated on the Governments both by the Secretary of State and the Government of India is to make the repression of intoxication and of the use of deleterious drugs the first object of their excise legislation and administration, and to treat the raising of revenue as a purely secondary object. To this policy the Secretary of State has reason to believe that all the local Governments in India are using their best efforts to give effect, and they will, no doubt, derive material assistance from the researches of the hon. Member.

THE CARDIFF SAVINGS BANK.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.) asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he can inform the House what has been done, and is being done, to insure the repayment to the depositors in the Cardiff Trustee Savings Bank of the moneys lost by them through the frauds of the late actuary and the negligence of the trustees and managers, as reported to this House in December 1887 by the Commissioner appointed to inquire into this case?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): The hon. Member will recollect that, upon the Report of the Commissioners appointed by the Treasury to inquire into the failure of the Cardiff Savings Bank, the National Debt Commissioners applied to the High Court for an order to have the affairs of the bank wound up under the Companies Act. This order was made, and a liquidator appointed. In winding up the affairs of the bank, the liquidator, who is going most fully into all the details, is acting under the direction of the Court, and the Government cannot give directions to him as to the course he is to pursue, which it is for the Court alone to decide.

MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, as a period of three years has now elapsed since the failure of the bank, it is not desirable that steps should be taken to repay the depositors?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I have done my utmost to push the matter forward, and such influence as is in the power of the Treasury will be exercised. We have no power, however, to expedite the certificates of the Commissioner.

POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANKS.

MR. HOWELL asked the Postmaster General whether Trade Societies and branches of Trade Unions have for many years been allowed to deposit their funds without limit in the Post Office Savings Banks, in the same way as Friendly Societies; and, whether any Trade Union or branch of a Union has recently been refused this privilege; and, if so, whether he will state upon whose authority such refusal has been made?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, University of Cambridge): The facts as stated in the Question of the hon. Member are substantially correct; but I am in communication with the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, with a view to getting over certain difficulties in connection with the three recent applications which are alluded to in the Question.

BECHUANALAND.

SIR ROBERT FOWLER (London) asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he has yet been informed as to the result of the investigation commenced at the end of December last, at the Limpopo in Bechuanaland, by Her Majesty's Deputy Commissioner in South Africa, as to the collision in that neighbourhood in the previous August between a Boer named Grobbelaar, said to be a Consul accredited by the Transvaal Government, and messengers of the Chief Khama; and when the Government will be able to present to Parliament correspondence respecting this and other proceedings in the Bechuanaland Protectorate subsequent to last August?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron HENRY DE WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): Her Majesty's Government have received Sir Sydney Shippard's Report on the subject; but the correspondence is not yet complete. When it is it will be presented to Parliament with other papers relating to Bechuanaland which are now partly in type.

SIR R. FOWLER: How long will it be before the correspondence is presented?

BARON H. DE WORMS: At present I am unable to say exactly.

DR. OLARK (Caithness): Is it not the case that a Report was received during last Session of Parliament, and that when I asked a Question in reference to it a promise was made that it should be printed and circulated?

BARON H. DE WORMS: I will make inquiry about it.

POST OFFICE STATIONERY.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury) asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is in a position to inform the House what is the nature of the concessions that De La Rue and Company are prepared to make in the proposed new contract for Post Office stationery, &c.; and, whether he will undertake to invite tenders, and give others an opportunity of competing for the supply of Post Office stationery, stamps, &c., without delay, in view of the fact that extensive outlay and preparations will be necessary for the special work required to be undertaken in 1890, when the present contracts will expire?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I have to state that the concessions offered by Messrs. De La Rue amount to a considerable sum; but they are conditional on a prolongation of the period of the contract. I am now considering whether the advantages offered compensate for such a prolongation, involving as it does the absence of public competition. I have caused searching inquiry to be made as to whether the revised prices offered by Messrs. De La Rue are as favourable as those which would be likely to be obtained under open competition, and I hope shortly to be able to announce my decision.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): What terms have been given to Messrs. De La Rue and Company?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: A term of eight years after the two years during which the Contract has now to run.

POSTAGE OF LETTERS ABROAD.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON asked the Postmaster General whether he is aware that the cost of posting a letter from France, Germany, or Russia to British India is only 2½d., while the charge from the United Kingdom is 5d.; whether he is aware that many British merchants and newspaper proprietors in London post a large quantity of letters in France for India and China, thereby saving nearly 50 per cent in the cost for postage; and whether India is in the Postal Union?

MR. RAIKES: I am well aware, as is also the House, and, I think, the public generally, that the facts are as stated in the hon. Member's first Question, and I may remind the hon. Member that the circumstances under which this difference of charge arises have been already explained in this House, I think, more than once. As regards the second point, I am not aware that any practice prevails on the part of British merchants and newspaper proprietors of sending letters to France to be there posted for India and China. On the contrary, from inquiries recently made, I have reason to believe that such is not the case. But I understand that newspapers are posted in the manner described, although, I am glad to say, not to the detriment of the British Revenue, as my Department rather gains than loses by the arrangement. India is in the Postal Union.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON: Arising out of the Question, is the right hon. Gentleman aware that there is a firm in Cornhill which saves £300 a year by posting newspapers for India and China in France?

MR. RAIKES: I have heard that statement, but do not know what is the authority for it.

THE CASE OF HECTOR MACKENZIE.

DR. R. MACDONALD (Ross and Cromarty) asked the Lord Advocate whether he is aware that the man Hector Mackenzie, now lying in Inverness Gaol under sentence of death for a murder at Fort George, has always been looked on by his acquaintances as an imbecile; and, whether he was discharged from the Army as such, as also that his father and two uncles were of weak intellect?

THE LORD ADVOCATE: This case has received the careful consideration of the Secretary for Scotland. An investigation has been made, with the result that the Secretary for Scotland has felt himself justified in recommending Her Majesty to commute the sentence of death to one of penal servitude.

POST OFFICE ARRANGEMENTS AT STOWMARKET.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) asked the Postmaster General if any further arrangements have been made as to the contemplated Post Office alterations at Stowmarket; and, if so, what; and when will they be carried into effect?

MR. RAIKES: A definite proposal will be submitted shortly.

THE LONDON BRIGADES OF VOLUNTEERS.

MR. NEVILLE (Liverpool, Exchange) asked the Secretary of State for War whether the Volunteer Regiments of the London Brigades were invited to join Brigade Camps, under their Brigadiers, for four days, at Easter; and, whether their Commanding Officers have been directed to reduce the number of the men attending below the numbers sent in; and, if so, on what ground?

MR. E. STANHOPE: It is the case that the Volunteer regiments of the London brigades have been invited to join brigade camps, it being held by the military authorities that it is advisable to exercise Volunteer regiments with the brigades to which they belong. As a similar effort will be made in the case of all Volunteer brigades, a limit as to the numbers drawing camp allowance has had to be fixed, but this will not prevent any number from being present without the allowance where barrack accommodation is available. The allowance in proportion to the number of days is somewhat higher than in the case of regimental camps, and an increased sum has been taken in the Estimates for the year.

THE COUNTY COUNCILS.

MR. THOMAS ELLIS (Merionethshire) asked the President of the Local Government Board whether he intends this Session to make any Provisional Orders for transferring, under section 10 of "The Local Government Act, 1888," powers of certain Government Departments and other authorities to the County Councils of England and Wales; and, if so, whether such Provisional Orders will be submitted to Parliament at an early date?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): It is intended to make a Provisional Order for transferring certain powers of Government Departments to the County Councils of England and Wales, and I hope to submit the Order to Parliament at an early date. It is not proposed by the Order to deal with the powers of any other authorities.

THE SALT DUTY IN INDIA.

MR. MAONEILL asked the Under Secretary of State for India whether it is the fact that since the recent increase in the Salt Duty in India there has been a diminution in the demand for salt, to the extent of 120 million of pounds; and, whether, having regard to the fact that salt is an absolute necessity of existence in India, Her Majesty's Government will take any steps to abrogate or diminish a tax which presses severely on the poorest classes of the community?

SIR J. GORST: The diminution referred to, which is about 6 per cent of the total consumption, occurred immediately after the increase of the tax. The large stock then on hand sufficiently accounts for it; and in the latter part of 1888 there was a recovery in the quantity of salt passed into consumption. The Government of India are closely watching the Returns of salt consumption, and the Secretary of State feels convinced that the earliest opportunity will be taken of abrogating the increase of the Salt Tax, to which his assent was given with so much reluctance.

THE ROYAL BARRACKS, DUBLIN.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War how many Boards and Committees have during the past five years investigated the sanitary condition of the Royal Barracks, Dublin; what has been the cost of these investigations; what, if any, of the measures recommended by these Boards of Inquiry have been adopted; whether his attention has been directed to a letter in the Times, over the signature "A Field Officer," in which the writer says that he had been a member of a Board investigating the condition of the Royal Barracks, and that it was found that the ground was saturated with poisonous matter; would he have any objection to lay upon the Table of the House this Report; and whether he would have any objection to lay upon the Table of the House a Return, showing the regiments that have been quartered in the Royal Barracks, Dublin, during the past five years, and the number of each regiment including women and children, and the number of deaths in each regiment including women and children during the period of its sojourn in the Royal Barracks?

MR. E. STANHOPE: I have already said that the first Report of Mr. Rogers-Field on the Drainage of the Royal Barracks will be laid on the Table immediately. I understand that it will contain an account of the recommendations made by previous Boards, and the extent to which they have been adopted. This will meet the request contained in the first portion of the Question of the hon. Member for Donegal. I am not able to trace the Report to which reference has been made by the writer in the Times newspaper. The average number of troops quartered in the Royal Barracks, in addition to women and children, during the last five years has been 1,565; and the average yearly number of deaths from all causes, a little over 15, giving a death ratio of 9.18, as against 6.93, the ratio for home service generally.

MR. MAC NEILL: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered the end of my Question. I want to know what the cost of these investigations has been?

MR. E. STANHOPE: In regard to the cost, I am afraid I can only tell the hon. Member that one of the investigations cost 100 guineas. I am not yet able to estimate the cost of the one now taking place.

PRIVATE BILLS.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.) asked the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to clauses proposed to be introduced into Private Bills enabling certain Railway Companies to increase the nominal amount of their ordinary share capital without any corresponding increase in the amount actually paid up; and, whether, having regard to the provisions of 7 and 8 Vic. c. 85, and to the general question of railway rates, he will state what course he proposes to adopt with respect to such clauses?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS-BEACH, Bristol, W.): My attention has been directed to the matter referred to, and I am now in communication with the authorities of both Houses with the view of checking any attempts to evade the provisions, either of the earlier Act quoted by the right hon. Gentleman, or of the Act of last Session.

LOCAL GRANTS.

MR. HOBHOUSE (Somerset, E.) asked the President of the Local Government Board up to what dates the various local grants referred to in section 24 of the Local Government Act, 1888, will continue to be payable to local authorities; whether there is any enactment that prevents the Police Grant or any other grant being payable up to the end of the present local financial year; and, if so, whether he will ensure, by legislation or otherwise, the continuance of such grants until the County Councils become entitled to the full benefits of the local taxation licences and probate duty grant; and, if he can inform the House when the last instalments of the local grants are likely to be made, and at what periods payments may be expected to be made from the new local taxation account to the County Councils?

MR. RITCHIE: The several local grants which have been voted by Parliament in respect of the present financial year will be paid before the expiration of the year. No further Vote for such grants will again be proposed. In the coming financial year the local authorities will have ceded to them certain licence duties and a proportion of the receipts from probate duty in substitution for those grants. The local authorities will not receive in the next financial year any grants in addition to the licence duties and probate duty, which are in substitution for the grants. I am not at present in a position to say at what dates payment from the local taxation account will be made in the next financial year, but I hope to be able to arrange that payment shall be made by instalments at such times as will be convenient to the authorities.

MR. HOBHOUSE: Will the right hon. Gentleman answer more definitely the first paragraph in my Question?

MR. RITCHIE: The Government will pay the usual grants that are paid in the financial year. After the present financial year the local authorities will receive no grants at all, but will receive the licence duties, out of which they will have to meet the claims upon them.

THE GOVERNOR OF GUERNSEY.

MR. PHILIPPS (Lanark Mid) asked the Secretary of State for War the amount of the salary and allowances of the Governor of Guernsey; how much of this is contributed by Guernsey and how much by the Imperial Exchequer; and, whether the Government will undertake that the present vacancy in this post shall not be filled up till Parliament has had an opportunity of pronouncing an opinion on the necessity of the office?

MR. E. STANHOPE: The Lieutenant Governor of Guernsey, who also commands the troops on the island and in Alderney, receives from Army funds £1,700 a year (consolidated pay) and something under £80 a year from Crown lands. I cannot undertake to abstain from filling up the post as suggested in the Question.

MR. PHILIPPS: Is the Governor provided with a house in addition to these allowances?

MR. E. STANHOPE: No.

THE COAL MINES REGULATION ACT.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his attention has been called to a decision given by Sheriff Orr Paterson at Ayr to the effect that the workmen employed in Knockterra Pit had no power to appoint the Secretary to the Miner's Union to make an intimation on their behalf anent the election of a check weighman, and, whether such decision is in accordance with Sections 13 and 14 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act; and, if so, what action he proposes to take in order to have this anomalous state of affairs amended?

MR. MATTHEWS: Yes, Sir; I have seen the decision in question, which I understand to have been to the effect that the masters were not bound to recognize the check weighman on the ground that insufficient notice of his appointment had been given. No particular form of notice is required by the Act, and I think that employers would not be justified in refusing to recognize a duly-elected check weigher, of whose election they have had sufficient notice; but I concur with the Sheriff in thinking that some sufficient notice should be given before damages can be claimed from the employer. The Sheriff has determined that question of fact, and I see no reason to take any further action in the matter.

MR. C. GRAHAM: Is there anything in the 13th and 14th sections of the Coal Mines Act that empowers the Sheriff to refuse to receive a representation made on behalf of the workmen by a Secretary acting on their behalf?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am afraid I cannot answer that Question without notice.

THE CUSTOMS AT LIVERPOOL.

MR. NEVILLE (Liverpool, Exchange): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury what are the hours of employment of the first and second-class (respectively) outdoor officers of the Customs at Liverpool; how many Customs officers at that port are now doing duty as "acting officers," and at what extra rate of pay; and, how many copyists are now doing at that port the work of first-class outdoor officers?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I am informed there is no distinction as to hours of employment between the first and second class of Customs outdoor officers at Liverpool, or at any other port. The hours of attendance vary according to the kind of duty on which they are employed, being from seven or eight hours a day (according to season) on warehousing stations to (at Liverpool) 12 hours out of the 24 when boarded on vessels from foreign ports; but officers on this latter duty are now usually relieved every six hours. The number of Customs officers who do duty as acting examining officers necessarily varies from day to day, according to the exigencies of the service. At Liverpool there were yesterday employed in this capacity 46 officers, and the extra rate of pay for officers approved for that service when so employed is 2d. for each hour, not exceeding 1s. a day. I am informed that no copyists are doing at Liverpool the work of outdoor officers of either class.

IRELAND—THE MURDER OF HEAD-CONSTABLE WHELEHAN.

MR. COX asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is a fact that Cullinane, the informer, swore at the preliminary investigation into the murder of Head-constable Whelehan, and again at the trial of the men charged with that crime at the Wicklow Assizes, 1887, that he had been in the pay of the police for a number of years; and, whether he is still in the employment of the Government in Ireland; and, if so, whether facilities will be given to the solicitor for the defence at the Special Commission to have a subpoena served on that person?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am not aware of the evidence given by the man referred to. I would beg to refer the hon. Member to the reply given by me a day or two ago to the inquiry repeated in the second paragraph.

MR. SEXTON: I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, considering that the police were in the service of the Times, he will further facilitate the discovery of the truth in the inquiry before the Special Commission?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I shall be glad to facilitate the discovery of truth in every way in my power.

MR. COX: On Monday I will put a further Question on this subject, and give this man's sworn depositions.

MR. CONYBEARE: I wish to know what number of paid informers or police spies are being kept by the Government?

No answer was given to this Question.

PRISON DISCIPLINE IN IRELAND.

MR. TUIE (Westmeath, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is the fact that four of the Barbavilla prisoners at present undergoing sentences of seven years' penal servitude in Mountjoy Prison has not been placed on the special treatment to which they became entitled in December last—namely, improved diet, less work, and visits, and letters every two months until expiration of sentences; and, if so, can he state the reason why those privileges have not been extended in their case?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The General Prisons Board informs me that the facts are not accurately represented in the question. Two of the prisoners referred to were duly approved for the special class privileges. These privileges include letters and visits every two months, but do not affect diet or work. In the case of the other two prisoners, they were disqualified under the rules for promotion to the special class, owing to misconduct.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON AND HOME RULE.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant

published by the hon. Member for Barrow when travelling in India; whether he has examined the statements therein relative to the rapid increase of the consumption of intoxicants in India; whether he is aware that public opinion attributes this increase to the licensing policy adopted by the Indian Government for the sake of Revenue; whether the Government of India intends to alter their Abkari (licensing) system; whether his attention has been called to the description Mr. Caine gives of the opium dens in Lucknow; and, whether he will undertake that the Indian Government will inquire into the truth of these statements, and, if they are found to be accurate, will suppress these opium dens?

THE UNDER SECRETARY FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): The Secretary of State has reason to believe that the most friendly communications took place between the hon. Member for Barrow and the authorities in India during his recent travels in that country, and that the valuable observations and statements contained in the letters of the hon. Member have been brought to the notice of those authorities by the hon. Member himself. The excise law and the excise administration vary in the several Provinces of India, according to the diverse circumstances of each Province, and it would be unwise, in the judgment of the Secretary of State, to attempt the imposition on the local Governments of one rigid system for the whole of India. The policy, however, which is uniformly inculcated on the Governments both by the Secretary of State and the Government of India is to make the repression of intoxication and of the use of deleterious drugs the first object of their excise legislation and administration, and to treat the raising of revenue as a purely secondary object. To this policy the Secretary of State has reason to believe that all the local Governments in India are using their best efforts to give effect, and they will, no doubt, derive material assistance from the researches of the hon. Member.

THE CARDIFF SAVINGS BANK.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.) asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he can inform the House what has been done, and is being done, to insure the repayment to the depositors in the Cardiff Trustee Savings Bank of the moneys lost by them through the frauds of the late actuary and the negligence of the trustees and managers, as reported to this House in December 1887 by the Commissioner appointed to inquire into this case?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): The hon. Member will recollect that, upon the Report of the Commissioners appointed by the Treasury to inquire into the failure of the Cardiff Savings Bank, the National Debt Commissioners applied to the High Court for an order to have the affairs of the bank wound up under the Companies Act. This order was made, and a liquidator appointed. In winding up the affairs of the bank, the liquidator, who is going most fully into all the details, is acting under the direction of the Court, and the Government cannot give directions to him as to the course he is to pursue, which it is for the Court alone to decide.

MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, as a period of three years has now elapsed since the failure of the bank, it is not desirable that steps should be taken to repay the depositors?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I have done my utmost to push the matter forward, and such influence as is in the power of the Treasury will be exercised. We have no power, however, to expedite the certificates of the Commissioner.

POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANKS.

MR. HOWELL asked the Postmaster General whether Trade Societies and branches of Trade Unions have for many years been allowed to deposit their funds without limit in the Post Office Savings Banks, in the same way as Friendly Societies; and, whether any Trade Union or branch of a Union has recently been refused this privilege; and, if so, whether he will state upon whose authority such refusal has been made?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, University of Cambridge): The facts as stated in the Question of the hon. Member are substantially correct; but I am in communication with the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, with a view to getting over certain difficulties in connection with the three recent applications which are alluded to in the Question.

BECHUANALAND.

SIR ROBERT FOWLER (London) asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he has yet been informed as to the result of the investigation commenced at the end of December last, at the Limpopo in Bechuanaland, by Her Majesty's Deputy Commissioner in South Africa, as to the collision in that neighbourhood in the previous August between a Boer named Grobbelaar, said to be a Consul accredited by the Transvaal Government, and messengers of the Chief Khama; and when the Government will be able to present to Parliament correspondence respecting this and other proceedings in the Bechuanaland Protectorate subsequent to last August?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron HENRY DE WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): Her Majesty's Government have received Sir Sydney Shippard's Report on the subject; but the correspondence is not yet complete. When it is it will be presented to Parliament with other papers relating to Bechuanaland which are now partly in type.

SIR R. FOWLER: How long will it be before the correspondence is presented?

BARON H. DE WORMS: At present I am unable to say exactly.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): Is it not the case that a Report was received during last Session of Parliament, and that when I asked a Question in reference to it a promise was made that it should be printed and circulated?

BARON H. DE WORMS: I will make inquiry about it.

POST OFFICE STATIONERY.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury) asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is in a position to inform the House what is the nature of the concessions that De La Rue and Company are prepared to make in the proposed new contract for Post Office stationery, &c.; and, whether he will undertake to invite tenders, and give others an opportunity of competing for the supply of Post Office stationery, stamps, &c., without delay, in view of the fact that extensive outlay and preparations will be necessary for the special work required to be undertaken in 1890, when the present contracts will expire?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I have to state that the concessions offered by Messrs. De La Rue amount to a considerable sum; but they are conditional on a prolongation of the period of the contract. I am now considering whether the advantages offered compensate for such a prolongation, involving as it does the absence of public competition. I have caused searching inquiry to be made as to whether the revised prices offered by Messrs. De La Rue are as favourable as those which would be likely to be obtained under open competition, and I hope shortly to be able to announce my decision.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): What terms have been given to Messrs. De La Rue and Company?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: A term of eight years after the two years during which the Contract has now to run.

POSTAGE OF LETTERS ABROAD.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON asked the Postmaster General whether he is aware that the cost of posting a letter from France, Germany, or Russia to British India is only 2½d., while the charge from the United Kingdom is 5d.; whether he is aware that many British merchants and newspaper proprietors in London post a large quantity of letters in France for India and China, thereby saving nearly 50 per cent in the cost for postage; and whether India is in the Postal Union?

MR. RAIKES: I am well aware, as is also the House, and, I think, the public generally, that the facts are as stated in the hon. Member's first Question, and I may remind the hon. Member that the circumstances under which this difference of charge arises have been already explained in this House, I think, more than once. As regards the second point, I am not aware that any practice prevails on the part of British merchants and newspaper proprietors of sending letters to France to be there posted for India and China. On the contrary, from inquiries recently made, I have reason to believe that such is not the case. But I understand that newspapers are posted in the manner described, although, I am glad to say, not to the detriment of the British Revenue, as my Department rather gains than loses by the arrangement. India is in the Postal Union.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON: Arising out of the Question, is the right hon. Gentleman aware that there is a firm in Cornhill which saves £300 a year by posting newspapers for India and China in France?

MR. RAIKES: I have heard that statement, but do not know what is the authority for it.

THE CASE OF HECTOR MACKENZIE.

DR. R. MACDONALD (Ross and Cromarty) asked the Lord Advocate whether he is aware that the man Hector Mackenzie, now lying in Inverness Gaol under sentence of death for a murder at Fort George, has always been looked on by his acquaintances as an imbecile; and, whether he was discharged from the Army as such, as also that his father and two uncles were of weak intellect?

THE LORD ADVOCATE: This case has received the careful consideration of the Secretary for Scotland. An investigation has been made, with the result that the Secretary for Scotland has felt himself justified in recommending Her Majesty to commute the sentence of death to one of penal servitude.

POST OFFICE ARRANGEMENTS AT STOWMARKET.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camboorne) asked the Postmaster General if any further arrangements have been made as to the contemplated Post Office alterations at Stowmarket; and, if so, what; and when will they be carried into effect?

MR. RAIKES: A definite proposal will be submitted shortly.

THE LONDON BRIGADES OF VOLUNTEERS.

MR. NEVILLE (Liverpool, Exchange) asked the Secretary of State for War whether the Volunteer Regiments of the London Brigades were invited to join Brigade Camps, under their Brigadiers, for four days, at Easter; and, whether their Commanding Officers have been directed to reduce the number of the men attending below the numbers sent in; and, if so, on what ground?

MR. E. STANHOPE: It is the case that the Volunteer regiments of the London brigades have been invited to join brigade camps, it being held by the military authorities that it is advisable to exercise Volunteer regiments with the brigades to which they belong. As a similar effort will be made in the case of all Volunteer brigades, a limit as to the numbers drawing camp allowance has had to be fixed, but this will not prevent any number from being present without the allowance where barrack accommodation is available. The allowance in proportion to the number of days is somewhat higher than in the case of regimental camps, and an increased sum has been taken in the Estimates for the year.

THE COUNTY COUNCILS.

MR. THOMAS ELLIS (Merionethshire) asked the President of the Local Government Board whether he intends this Session to make any Provisional Orders for transferring, under section 10 of "The Local Government Act, 1888," powers of certain Government Departments and other authorities to the County Councils of England and Wales; and, if so, whether such Provisional Orders will be submitted to Parliament at an early date?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): It is intended to make a Provisional Order for transferring certain powers of Government Departments to the County Councils of England and Wales, and I hope to submit the Order to Parliament at an early date. It is not proposed by the Order to deal with the powers of any other authorities.

THE SALT DUTY IN INDIA.

MR. MACNEILL asked the Under Secretary of State for India whether it is the fact that since the recent increase in the Salt Duty in India there has been a diminution in the demand for salt, to the extent of 120 million of pounds; and, whether, having regard to the fact that salt is an absolute necessity of existence in India, Her Majesty's Government will take any steps to abrogate or diminish a tax which presses severely on the poorest classes of the community?

SIR J. GORST: The diminution referred to, which is about 6 per cent of the total consumption, occurred immediately after the increase of the tax. The large stock then on hand sufficiently accounts for it; and in the latter part of 1888 there was a recovery in the quantity of salt passed into consumption. The Government of India are closely watching the Returns of salt consumption, and the Secretary of State feels convinced that the earliest opportunity will be taken of abrogating the increase of the Salt Tax, to which his assent was given with so much reluctance.

THE ROYAL BARRACKS, DUBLIN.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War how many Boards and Committees have during the past five years investigated the sanitary condition of the Royal Barracks, Dublin; what has been the cost of these investigations; what, if any, of the measures recommended by these Boards of Inquiry have been adopted; whether his attention has been directed to a letter in the Times, over the signature "A Field Officer," in which the writer says that he had been a member of a Board investigating the condition of the Royal Barracks, and that it was found that the ground was saturated with poisonous matter; would he have any objection to lay upon the Table of the House this Report; and whether he would have any objection to lay upon the Table of the House a Return, showing the regiments that have been quartered in the Royal Barracks, Dublin, during the past five years, and the number of each regiment including women and children, and the number of deaths in each regiment including women and children during the period of its sojourn in the Royal Barracks?

MR. E. STANHOPE: I have already said that the first Report of Mr. Rogers-Field on the Drainage of the Royal Barracks will be laid on the Table immediately. I understand that it will contain an account of the recommendations made by previous Boards, and the

I am not able to trace the Report to which reference has been made by the writer in the Times newspaper. The average number of troops quartered in the Royal Barracks, in addition to women and children, during the last five years has been 1,565; and the average yearly number of deaths from all causes, a little over 15, giving a death ratio of 9.18, as against 6.93, the ratio for home service generally.

MR. MAC NEILL: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered the end of my Question. I want to know what the cost of these investigations has been?

MR. E. STANHOPE: In regard to the cost, I am afraid I can only tell the hon. Member that one of the investigations cost 100 guineas. I am not yet able to estimate the cost of the one now taking place.

PRIVATE BILLS.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.) asked the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to clauses proposed to be introduced into Private Bills enabling certain Railway Companies to increase the nominal amount of their ordinary share capital without any corresponding increase in the amount actually paid up; and, whether, having regard to the provisions of 7 and 8 Vic. c. 85, and to the general question of railway rates, he will state what course he proposes to adopt with respect to such clauses?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS-BEACH, Bristol, W.): My attention has been directed to the matter referred to, and I am now in communication with the authorities of both Houses with the view of checking any attempts to evade the provisions, either of the earlier Act quoted by the right hon. Gentleman, or of the Act of last Session.

LOCAL GRANTS.

MR. HOBHOUSE (Somerset, E.) asked the President of the Local Government Board up to what dates the various local grants referred to in section 24 of the Local Government Act, 1888, will continue to be payable to local authorities; whether there is any enactment that prevents the Police Grant or any other grant being payable up to the end of the present local financial year; and, if so, whether he will ensure, by legislation or otherwise, the continuance of such grants until the County Councils become entitled to the full benefits of the local taxation licences and probate duty grant; and, if he can inform the House when the last instalments of the local grants are likely to be made, and at what periods payments may be expected to be made from the new local taxation account to the County Councils?

MR. RITCHIE: The several local grants which have been voted by Parliament in respect of the present financial year will be paid before the expiration of the year. No further Vote for such grants will again be proposed. In the coming financial year the local authorities will have ceded to them certain licence duties and a proportion of the receipts from probate duty in substitution for those grants. MR. HOBHOUSE: Will the right hon. Gentleman answer more definitely the first paragraph in my Question?

MR. RITCHIE: The Government will pay the usual grants that are paid in the financial year. After the present financial year the local authorities will receive no grants at all, but will receive the licence duties, out of which they will have to meet the claims upon them.

I cannot undertake to abstain from filling up the post as suggested in the Question.

MR. PHILIPPS: Is the Governor provided with a house in addition to these allowances?

MR. E. STANHOPE: No.

men by a Secretary acting on their behalf?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am afraid I cannot answer that Question without notice.

THE CUSTOMS AT LIVERPOOL.

MR. In the case of the other two prisoners, they were disqualified under the rules for promotion to the special class, owing to misconduct.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON AND HOME RULE.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant whether his attention has been called to the following language, reported as having been used by the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh (Colonel Saunderson)—

“As to a Home Rule Parliament, nothing under Heaven will make us recognize the Parliament, or obey its laws, so long as we have right arms to strike with. The very moment there is a chance of a Home Rule Parliament, we should arm, we should drill, and in a fortnight we could put 50,000 men in the field under arms. I have the authority of leading men in the Army that they would never allow British soldiers to be used against the Irish Loyalists ; ” and whether he intends to institute any prosecution against the hon. and gallant Member for the use of such language? Perhaps I may make to that Question an addendum intimately connected with it—namely, whether the attention of the right hon. Gentleman has been called to the fact that since the appearance of this speech in the Daily Express that journal, in its editorial comments, has expressed its entire assent with the remarks of the hon. and gallant Gentleman ; and whether the right hon. Gentleman will proceed against the Daily Express, under Sub-section 4 of Section 2 of the Crimes Act, under which section the right hon. Gentleman has already proceeded against the editors of several Nationalist journals?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have not read the article in the Daily Express, but I think the answer to the general Question on the Paper will probably apply to the addendum which the hon. Gentleman has just read to the House. I understand that the hon. and gallant Member for Armagh, in the speech to which reference is made in the Question, foreshadowed an act of war against a hypothetical Government. If that Government should ever emerge from the land of dreamland into actual existence it will be for it to determine what course should be taken with my hon. and gallant Friend.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: Arising out of the answer of the right hon. Gentleman, as to the character of which I will make no observations, I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the words of the hon. and gallant Gentleman are not a direct incitement to civil war against a law that may be passed by the Imperial Parliament of this country, and whether the right hon. Gentleman has not prosecuted several Gentlemen for intimidating unknown persons—[Ministerial laughter].—I will call them hypothetical persons if that will please hon. Gentlemen opposite—and whether the right hon. Gentleman does not think that language like this, applied to a population which to a large extent is armed, owing to the neglect of the Government, does not directly tend to interfere with the administration of law and justice in Ireland?

MR. PICTON: I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he has noticed the words, “in a fortnight we could put 50,000 men in the field under arms,” which implies that 50,000 men are already enrolled?

MR. H. GARDNER: May I point out to the right hon. Gentleman that the hon. and gallant Gentleman says in his threat, “If there is a chance of a Home Rule Parliament.” I would ask him whether these words come under his answer?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I shall not be Chief Secretary if there is such a chance, and I do not believe there will be such a chance.

MR. SEXTON: I wish to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the doctrine of contingent disloyalty is permitted in the British Army?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! I must point out to the hon. Gentleman that the question is whether the Chief Secretary intends to institute a prosecution. An answer has been given that no prosecution is intended, and I do not think any further question arises.

MR. SEXTON: With your leave, Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask whether the Secretary for War has inquired of the hon. and gallant Member the names of the leading officers in the British Army who, as he publicly asserted, pledged themselves to him in a certain event that they would violate their oaths?

MR. E. STANHOPE: No, Sir ; I have had no communication on the subject from my hon. and gallant Friend. My attention is now called to the matter for the first time by the Question on the Paper.

MR. SEXTON: By way of spurring the singularly languid curiosity of the right hon. Gentleman, I shall at the earliest opportunity move—

Mr. T. P. O'Connor

"That, in the judgment of this House, and in the interests of public order, it is requisite that the Member for North Armagh, himself a military officer, be called upon to disclose the names of those leading officers of the British Army who pledged themselves to him, on the occurrence of a certain event, that they would violate their oaths of fidelity and obedience to the Crown."

THE ARGENTINE REPUBLIC.

MR. O'KEEFFE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if his attention has been directed to a large number of persons, mechanics and labourers—400 alone from the city of Limerick—who left per steamer Dresden, from Queenstown to Buenos Ayres, on about the 15th of January last; and, whether, having regard to the expression of high ecclesiastical and lay opinion in Ireland as to the danger of numbers of these emigrants being left destitute after their arrival, he will direct Her Majesty's Consular Agent at the Argentine Republic to make inquiries as to their present condition and prospects, with a view to give reliable information in case of any further projected emigration to that country?

SIR J. FERGUSSON said, the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been for some time directed to the large extent to which emigration to the Argentine Republic has increased, and they have been in communication with Her Majesty's Representative at Buenos Ayres on the subject, and are considering whether any special agency is necessary for the purposes mentioned in the Question of the hon. Member.

PROVINCIAL COLLEGES.

MR. MUNDELLA asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is now prepared to lay upon the Table the promised scheme for aiding provincial colleges, and to fix the date when it will come into operation.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: A Vote for Provincial Colleges has been put down in the Estimates for 1889-90. The Government have found considerable difficulty in deciding what colleges should be entitled to share in it, and in what proportions and on what conditions it should be distributed between them. They have accordingly appointed a small Committee to make particular inquiries and advise them on these points. The Committee will sit at an early date, and its deliberations are not likely to be prolonged. Upon receiving its Report the Government will settle the scheme of distribution. The sum voted will, of course, be available for the colleges which are entitled to share in it during the coming financial year.

THE LASH.

MR. PICKERSGILL asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the sentence of flogging (30 lashes) for contempt of Court, imposed on Thomas Taylor, on July 27 last, by the Chief Justice of the Bahamas, was carried out?

BARON HENRY DE WORMS: In reply to the hon. Member, I have to say that the sentence was carried out on the day it was passed.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: Are we to understand that the Chief Justice still holds office under the Crown?

BARON HENRY DE WORMS: Yes.

THE SPECIAL COMMISSION.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it had been brought to his notice that it had been sworn that Head Constable Gallagher and Sergeant Faussett, of the Royal Irish Constabulary, and being now in this country on subpoenas from the solicitor of the Times, were directed by one Shannon, an agent of the Times, to accompany the Times witness Pigott from the Royal Courts of Justice to his hotel, and to reside at said hotel, in order to protect Pigott in case of need; whether the members of the Royal Irish Constabulary now in London on subpoenas, were permitted to take the orders of the agents and sub-agents of the Times, or to protect the Times witnesses by order of the said agents or sub-agents; whether Head Constable Gallagher and Sergeant Faussett reported to their official superiors that they were being employed by a sub-agent of the Times in protecting a Times witness; whether they were in receipt of official full pay during the period of their residence in London under subpoena, and their employment by the agents or sub-agents of the Times; whether he was aware that Sergeant Faussett had already appeared as a witness for the

MR. BALFOUR: I never heard of it. If the hon. Gentleman will put the Question on the paper, I will make inquiry.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I ask the Home Secretary whether he has any information as to the visits of Head-constable Preston?

THE HOME SECRETARY: No; my information is inconsistent with the suggestion.

MR. J. F. X. O'BRIEN (Mayo, S.): When am I likely to get permission to visit Nally? I asked for it on the 21st instant.

THE HOME SECRETARY: The authority is on its way. Reference was made to the prison authorities, and as soon as it was found that Nally was entitled to receive a visitor, the permission was given.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Can the right hon. Gentleman assure the House that these two men have been visited by nobody except by persons entitled under the prison rules to visit them?

THE HOME SECRETARY: I have given the hon. Gentleman all the information I can on the subject.

NEGLECT OF CHILDREN.

MR. PICKERSGILL asked the President of the Local Government Board if he had taken advice whether or not Boards of Guardians were the only persons who were competent to institute a prosecution against parents under the 37th Section of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1868, for wilfully neglecting to provide food for their children, being in their custody; and in any case, whether he would issue a circular calling the attention of Boards of Guardians to their duties and responsibilities in the matter?

MR. RITCHIE: I am advised that Boards of Guardians are not the only persons who are competent to institute proceedings against parents under the enactment referred to; but I should be sorry if the fact that such proceedings may be instituted by others should have any effect in inducing Boards of Guardians to be less vigilant with regard to such cases. So recently as the 31st of December last I caused a circular letter to be issued to the several Boards of Guardians, drawing their attention to the Section, and impressing upon them the duty which attaches to them of instituting prosecutions in the cases to which it refers.

IRELAND—THE MITCHELSTOWN AFFRAY, 1887.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, whether Mr. O'Neil Segrave, R.M., who was in command of the forces of the Crown at Mitchelstown in September, 1887, on the occasion of a collision with the people, in which three lives were lost, is the same Mr. O'Neil Segrave of whom the following notice appears in the Government Gazette of the Cape of Good Hope, published by authority on Friday, September 4th, 1885:—

“Head Quarters, Colonial Forces,
King William's Town, 24th August, 1885,
Colonial Forces Order, No. 281.

“His Excellency the Governor, with the advice of the Executive Council, has been pleased to approve of the following alterations, &c., in the Colonial Forces:—

“No. 2 Cape Infantry Regiment.

“Lieutenant O'Neil Segrave's services are dispensed with from 31st July, 1885.

“Herbert Watson Major, gentleman, to be Lieutenant, from 1st August, 1885, vice Segrave, whose services have been dispensed with.

“By Order,

“P. Kenion Ffolliott, Lt. Colonel,

“Military Secretary, Colonial Services.”

And, what inquiries, if any, did the Government make into the antecedents of Mr. O'Neil Segrave previously to his appointment to the post of Resident Magistrate in October, 1886?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have already explained that the Government are making full inquiries into all the circumstances, and I hope the hon. Member will agree with me it would be wise to await the result of such inquiries.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): May I ask how it happens that ten weeks have been consumed in making these inquiries? Has the right hon. Gentleman any objection to give the House an assurance that the inquiry will be closed before the salary of this person is voted by the House?

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): Is it not a matter of notoriety that this man was turned out of the Cape Army for embezzlement?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am making every inquiry into the matter, and have done so since the information laid before the House led me to believe there was something to be investigated, which is not always the case. This Gentleman at once went on leave, and has remained on leave ever since. I apprehend that is the only course which it is proper to pursue. When I have made full investigation, it then remains for the Government to determine what course to adopt.

MR. SEXTON: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered my Question. Has he any objection to give the House an assurance that the inquiry will be closed before we are asked to vote the salary for the Office?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have every expectation that it will; but I cannot say definitely. I cannot conceive that it will last so long.

MR. MAC NIELL: I will repeat the Question on Monday, and if necessary, move the adjournment of the House.

PUBLIC MEETINGS ON THE HORSE GUARDS PARADE.

MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether any decision has been arrived at by the Government in regard to the holding of Public Meetings on the Horse Guards Parade; and whether any objection will be raised to the holding of meetings there, under the same rules and regulation as are applied to meetings in the Public Parks?

MR. MATTHEWS: The Rules of Hyde Park, of Battersea Park, of Regent's Park, and of Victoria Park allow Public Meetings to be held in those Parks, and the Government have no intention of altering the Rules of St. James's Park, which prohibit the delivery of Public Addresses on the Horse Guards Parade.

MR. CREMER: Am I to understand by the answer given by the right hon. Gentleman that the meetings are not to be permitted on the Horse Guards Parade, and, if I have rightly interpreted the answer, has the right hon. Gentleman any objection to stating the reasons that induced Her Majesty's Government to arrive at that conclusion?

MR. MATTHEWS: The hon. Member has interpreted my answer quite correctly, and the reasons which induced

Her Majesty's Government to come to that conclusion are these: The Horse Guards Parade is situated in the centre of a large number of public offices, palaces, and public buildings, and in the immediate proximity to a large and important thoroughfare, and, in the opinion of those best competent to form an opinion, public meetings there and the assemblage of large masses of people going to the meetings, would be extremely likely to cause public obstruction.

MR. CREMER: May I ask whether the attention of the right hon. Gentleman and the Government has been directed to the fact that occasionally tens of thousands of people assemble on the Horse Guards Parade to witness military reviews, and on no occasion has there ever been a disturbance such as he fears?

MR. CONYBEARE: Are we to understand that the proclamation of Sir Charles Warren is still in force?

The two latter Questions were not answered.

CONVICTIONS UNDER THE CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE (IRELAND) ACT.

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, what is the number of convictions during the year 1888 under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act (1) for intimidation; (2) for riot; and (3) for taking forcible possession.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The number of convictions during the year 1888 under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act under the heads indicated in the Question were as follows:—(1) For intimidation, 137; (2) for riot, 164; (3) for taking forcible possession, 50. I have also been asked if I would lay on the Table a Return which I quoted, showing the percentage of convictions by Jurors and Magistrates. I do not think it is a proper paper to lay on the Table, because the result was simply arrived at by a sum in arithmetic from Returns already in possession of the House. On page 24 of the Criminal and Judicial Statistics for the year 1887, it is stated that the total number of persons proceeded against under the Crimes Act was 628, of whom 414 were convicted, a percentage of 66. A little lower down on the same page it is stated that 1,991 were tried by Jury in the same year, and practically 71 per cent were convicted. These were the figures I gave to the House.

MR. T. M. HEALY: May I ask whether, in a case where the Government, for the same speech, for the same act of intimidation, frame half-a-dozen different charges—that is to say, in a speech one might be charged probably with riot, taking part in an illegal conspiracy, taking part in an illegal assembly, and also intimidation—having obtained a conviction on one charge, the Government direct the Magistrates to enter acquittals on the others?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I should like to inquire into the matter; but what I apprehend is the fact is, that if a man is tried on several charges and is convicted under one and not under the others, if the others are withdrawn I presume he would not be returned as having been convicted under them.

MR. T. M. HEALY: And the Magistrates are credited with making so many acquittals?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am afraid I cannot answer that question off-hand. My information is only taken from the ordinary statistical information.

THE SALE AND USE OF REVOLVERS.

MR. R. W. HANBURY (Preston): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, whether the Government intend to take measures to restrain the sale and use of revolvers?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am not in a position to answer the Question, but I can assure the hon. Member that the matter is not being lost sight of.

PRIVATE BILL LEGISLATION.

MR. CRAIG SELLAR (Lanarkshire, Partick): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether Her Majesty's Government intend this Session to introduce a measure to give effect to the recommendations of the Joint Committee of both Houses of Parliament, appointed last Session to examine into the present system of Private Bill Legislation, in favour of "the establishment of Commissioners entrusted with the functions of Private Bill Committees."

MR. W. H. SMITH: It is the intention of the Government to introduce a measure dealing with Private Bill legislation, based on the report of the Joint Committee.

MR. CRAIG SELLAR: I beg to give notice that on Tuesday I shall ask leave to bring in a Bill for establishing a Commission to examine and report on Private Bills in Parliament and matters relating thereto.

MINING RENTS AND ROYALTIES.

MR. CONYBEARE: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will consent to the appointment of a Select Committee to which the Bills which honourable Members have introduced, dealing with the question of Mining Rents and Royalties, may be referred.

MR. W. H. SMITH: The hon. and learned Member asks whether a certain Bill not yet drafted—and consequently not yet received at the Public Bill Office—is to be referred to a Select Committee. Under the circumstances it is impossible for me to make any statement.

MR. CONYBEARE: I will repeat the Question another day.

THE SPECIAL COMMISSION.

MR. JOHN E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury what sum of public money has already been advanced from the Temporary Commissions Vote towards defraying the charges of the Special Commission (Members of Parliament Charges and Allegations) Act, 1888?

MR. W. H. SMITH: The total expenditure to date from the Temporary Commission Vote on account of the Special Commission is as follows:—Salaries, £375 13s. 3d.; travelling, £20 15s. 7d.; shorthand-writing, £920 4s.; incidents, £27 19s. 4d.; imprest outstanding, £40: total, £1,384 12s. 2d. The payments under salaries are for the secretary and some copying clerks employed under him with Treasury authority. The only item of importance under "Travelling" is £8 16s. 2d. to the Commissioner of Police, for the expenses of officers sent by order of the Court after Molloy. "Incidents" represent, almost entirely, postage and telegrams. Besides the above, there is no doubt a heavy charge on the Stationery Vote for printing, &c. The Special Commission is being treated in exactly the same way as any other temporary Commission, with the exception that no money is being found for witnesses.

MR. C. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, whether any moneys have been or will be paid out of the Secret Service Vote to any person or persons for or in connection with the Special Commission now sitting; or for or in connection with the collection of evidence in Ireland to be laid before such Commission; or for or in connection with the investigations made in Ireland or elsewhere as to matters laid before such Commission, or otherwise in connection with the charges and allegations made by the Times against Members of this House.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I do not think it right under ordinary circumstances to make any statements with reference to the application of Secret Service money, but under the special circumstances I feel I ought to reply to the hon. Member. I assure him that no Secret Service money has been or will be spent for the purposes indicated by the hon. Member. It is, of course, the duty of the Government to use Secret Service money for the purpose for which it is principally provided—namely, the prevention and detection of crime; but, I repeat, no money has been or will be used by the Government for the purposes specified by the hon. Member.

MR. SEXTON: Do the Government intend to make any proposal in regard to the costs of the defence with reference to the forged letters which the Times admitted to-day they had falsely attributed to Mr. Parnell, Mr. Egan, Mr. O'Kelly, and Mr. Davitt.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order. That has no connection with the Question on the Paper.

MR. SEXTON: I wish to point out that the Question on the Paper alludes—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order. The Question on the Paper refers to the application of the Secret Service Fund.

MR. CONYBEARE: I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether his attention has been called to the facsimile letter published in the Star of Monday last, purporting to be a letter addressed by Joseph Soames, Solicitor to the Times newspaper, to the Proprietors, announcing the suspension of the usual dividend, and containing the following sentence:—"No provision has been made by 'The Special Commission Act, 1888,' for the payment of any part of the expense incurred by the parties to the present inquiry. What action, if any, Parliament may take in this respect remains to be seen. In view, however, of this uncertainty, and of the heavy expense," &c.; and, whether he, or any other person on behalf of the Government, has given the Times any ground or reason for thus intimating to the Proprietors that their expenses might be recouped to them by a Parliamentary Vote.

MR. SEXTON: Perhaps under this Question my Question will be relevant. I wish to ask whether the Government propose to defray any of the costs of the defence of the forged letters which the Times admit they have falsely attributed to Mr. Parnell, Mr. Egan, Mr. O'Kelly, and Mr. Davitt, and which were the product of a gross and disgraceful fraud, and also whether, as the Government intend to facilitate the detection of crime, they will aid Irish Members financially to pursue what they claim to be a foul and criminal conspiracy against them, of which the man Houston is one of the instruments.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I will reply at once to the question of the hon. Member, although I think it would have been better if notice had been given. The Government are not in a position to make any recommendation to the House until they have considered the Report of the Commission, which will be presented to Parliament; and, as regards that which is alleged to be a foul conspiracy—

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): Alleged? Admitted.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I have no knowledge of the circumstances to which the hon. Member refers. I can only repeat what I have always stated—that any exertion which the Government can use for the detection of crime and the punishment of crime will be used by the Government. In answer to the question of the hon. Member, I have to say I have not, nor has any person on behalf of the Government, intimated to the proprietors of the Times that their expenses might be recouped by a Parliamentary Vote.

MR. P. A. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): Arising out of the Question of the right hon. Gentleman, might I ask him whether he will take effective steps to secure that no documents in the possession of any officer of the Government will be destroyed?

MR. W. H. SMITH: I can hardly suppose that the hon. Gentleman is serious in asking that. Any Member of the Government who was privy to the destruction of documents which were necessary to the enforcement of justice would deserve to be impeached.

MR. CHANCE: That is not answering my question, Sir. My question was whether the Government would see that effective steps were taken that no officer of the Government—no Government official—should be permitted to destroy documents.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I think it is hardly necessary for me to answer that question.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I wish to ask whether the Government has reconsidered the offer they formerly made to Members on this side of the House—namely, to lend the Irish Nationalist Members the services of Her Majesty's Attorney-General to prosecute the Times in connection with the criminal publication of the forged letters.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I think the hon. and learned Member would hardly wish me to answer that question. At all events, if he does think it necessary, it will be desirable he should put it on the paper.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I have to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, if Her Majesty's Attorney General persists in the making of criminal charges and allegations against Members of this House, Her Majesty's Government, in view of the withdrawal by that official of the forged letters, alleged by him to have been written by the hon. Member for Cork, will continue him in his office of Attorney General; can he state what portion of his time has been devoted to his office of Attorney General during the sittings of the Royal Commission; and whether any previous Attorney General has been allowed exclusively to devote himself for several months to private practice?

Mr. W. H. Smith

MR. W. H. SMITH: It is notorious that any charges which the Attorney General has advanced have been made in his capacity as counsel for the Times, and in strict accordance with the rules which regulate the conduct of counsel. He has not departed, so far as I am aware, in any respect from the practice which has prevailed with regard to the Law Officers of the Crown. It is not in my power to say what time he has recently devoted to the special duties of his office: but he has discharged them with assiduity and to the satisfaction of the Government. Former Attorney Generals have certainly undertaken private practice to the full extent to which the present holder of that office has done.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I should like to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, whether his attention has been called to the fact that, so far back as the beginning of the month of November, now nearly four months since, the learned Attorney General, who, as he says, was discharging his functions to the satisfaction of Her Majesty's Government, had, under the hand of Richard Pigott, a statement that he was unable to bear cross-examination, and that, if produced as a witness, the most damaging admissions would have to be made by him in regard to his previous character; and whether he has referred that statement to the learned Attorney General, and whether the Government retain that confidence in the learned Gentleman to which the right hon. Gentleman has just given expression?

MR. W. H. SMITH: I have no knowledge of the circumstances to which the hon. Member refers. I must, therefore, ask him, if he desires an answer, to put the Question on the paper. I have referred to the way in which the Attorney General has discharged his duties qua Attorney General.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to give notice that at the first opportunity I will move,—Resolved, that in the opinion of this House, Mr. Attorney General has forfeited its confidence.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Attorney General, speaking as the Attorney General from the Front Bench, did not, in the discussion upon the Special Commission Bill, say as an argument for passing that Bill, that if he were counsel for the Times again he would prove one of those forged letters to be genuine.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. E. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): Mr. Speaker: May I be allowed to answer that Question myself? I never made any such statement, or anything which, by any distortion of my words, is capable of that interpretation.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I will put the words down in a Question for to-morrow.

MR. SEXTON: Will the First Lord of the Treasury ask the learned Attorney General whether he adopts the conclusion stated in open court by his clients, the Times—that the letters were the product of a gross and disgraceful fraud?

*MR. SPEAKER: ["Order, order!"] These are not proper questions to ask in the House of Common; they ought to be asked elsewhere.

MR. J. W. PHILIPPS: I wish to ask the Home Secretary what precautions he has taken that neither Houston nor any other of the Times witnesses shall be able to escape out of the jurisdiction.

MR. MATTHEWS: The practice of making suggestions against private individuals under cover of questions of this kind appears to me to be open to the very gravest objection. I must absolutely decline to state what steps I take against any individual whatever. I may inform the hon. Member that it is no part of my duty, and it is not within my power, to look after persons whom he styles witnesses. The duty of the Home Secretary and of the police of the Metropolis is to look after and prevent the escape of persons charged with crime. Whenever notice of any charge of crime comes to my ears I shall act as the law requires.

MR. PHILIPPS: With reference to the objection of the Home Secretary as to the form of my Question, I should like to remind him that the same Question—

*MR. SPEAKER: If the hon. Member will ask a question he will be in order.

MR. PHILLIPS: My Question is whether the same Question was not put to the Home Secretary yesterday, and whether he did not promise to answer it to-day.

MR. MATTHEWS: No; I gave no such promise.

MR. T. M. HEALY: May I ask the Home Secretary with reference to the steps taken to apprehend Pigott, at what hour telegrams were sent out from Scotland Yard to British agents at home and abroad to aid in the capture of Pigott?

MR. MATTHEWS: I must take leave to say that, if the hon. and learned Member desires to facilitate the escape of Pigott, the effect of Questions in this House as to the action of the police undoubtedly tend in that direction. I must, therefore, in the discharge of my duty, decline to say more than that the police are taking all the steps that are usual and proper in a case of perjury and forgery.

MR. T. M. HEALY: How will it facilitate in any way the escape of Pigott?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order. The hon. and learned Member is proceeding to argue with the right hon. Gentleman. The question is a purely argumentative one.

MEETINGS IN TRAFALGAR SQUARE.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I wish to ask the Home Secretary whether, since the appointment of Mr. Munro as Chief Commissioner, the Proclamation issued by Sir Charles Warren respecting Trafalgar Square has been withdrawn or whether it is still in force?

MR. MATTHEWS: The proclamation has not been withdrawn.

CONDUCT OF THE POLICE.

MR. PICKERSGILL: I wish to ask the Home Secretary another Question on a matter affecting my own Constituency, and it is of such urgency that I venture to put it without notice. I have a letter from Mr. James Branch, a well-known manufacturer in Bethnal Green, and a member of the London County Council, in which he says, "A policeman called here for a copy of the bill enclosed." The bill is simply an announcement of a public meeting at the Bethnal Green Liberal and Radical Club, for the purpose of hearing a lecture by a Member of this House upon "Democracy and its aims." Mr. Branch writes:—

"The policeman stated that he was ordered to call for the bill by his sergeant at the Commercial Street Station. I told him to talk his sergeant that he had no right or authority to send for these bills, and I should certainly decline to give him one. They did the same at Bow a few days since, when we instructed our printer to refuse any such application, and I think it is being done for the sole purpose of intimidation."

I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman by whose directions this is done, and why these inquisitorial annoyances are committed by the police, seeing that they were absolutely unknown until the advent to power of the right hon. Gentleman?

MR. MATTHEWS: The circumstances mentioned by the hon. Member are entirely unknown to me; but it is the well-established practice of the police to obtain information of meetings where large numbers of people would probably be gathered together, with a view to preventing any breach of the peace or disorder occurring. The object is not to intimidate, but to protect. The practice was a recognised one long before I became Home Secretary.

MR. PICKERSGILL: I beg to give notice that I will take an early opportunity of calling further attention to this matter.

MR. CONYBEARE: I happen to be the hon. Member who is to deliver this address. Will the right hon. Gentleman institute inquiries at the Commercial Street Station as to why constables are appointed to guard the street in which a club is situated, at which I have the honour of attending. Is he aware the meeting in question is held on private premises and not in an open space?

THE SPEAKER: Order, order. It will be more convenient for Questions of this character to be given notice of.

IRELAND—IMPRISONMENT OF MR. CAREW.

MR. J. J. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.): I wish to ask the Chief Secretary a Question which was put to the Solicitor General for Ireland yesterday. It is whether the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant will, by removing Mr. Carew from Kilkenny Gaol to Dublin, give the hon. Gentleman facilities for consulting his legal adviser and preparing his defence?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It would have been more convenient to have had notice of this Question. I have seen some Report, but I must say I do not understand how it would enable Mr. Carew to prepare his defence if he be removed from Kilkenny to Kilmainham.

MR. CLANCY: Mr. Carew's solicitor resides in Naas, and I have a letter from the solicitor to say that if he leaves home at 5 o'clock in the morning to see Mr. Carew he cannot get back until 7 o'clock at night. Mr. Carew's counsel lives in Dublin, and he must leave at 10 o'clock in the morning, and he cannot get home again until 7 o'clock. To keep Mr. Carew in Kilkenny means that he is to be deprived of the opportunity of consulting his legal advisers. My Question is, whether the Government will connive at that?

MR. SEXTON: Is it true that Mr. Carew has been put in a boarded cell and supplied with hospital diet, but that his clothes have not been restored to him?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am not aware of that. I believe, but I am not sure. The right hon. Gentleman had better put a Question on the Paper; it is very inconvenient to answer without notice.

MR. CLANCY: I am sorry to have to put another question on the subject, but I do it because no time is to be lost in this matter. The action is to be tried shortly, and Mr. Carew wants all the time between the present and the trial in order to consult his legal advisers. I wish to ask whether, if the right hon. Gentleman observes that the keeping of Mr. Carew in Kilkenny Gaol will practically deprive him of consulting his legal advisers, he will pass over the prison rules, and direct Mr. Carew's removal to Kilmainham.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have never yet heard it suggested that a prisoner should be removed from one prison to another in order to be near his solicitor. If, however, Mr. Carew's solicitor will lay the facts before the Prisons Board the matter will no doubt be considered.

MR. CLANCY: I am very sorry to have to interfere once more, but I beg to inform the right hon. Gentleman that the Prisons Board have already been informed of the facts, and have refused the request.

MR. J. REDMOND (Wexford, N.): May I be permitted to put a Question to the right hon. Gentleman upon the matter, of which I can speak with some knowledge, as I happened to be pro-professionally engaged in the case. It is perfectly impossible for Mr. Carew to have the necessary consultations with his professional advisers in the jail in which he is at present. The facts have been laid before the Prisons Board, and they have refused to remove Mr. Carew. I have therefore to ask the Chief Secretary whether in this state of facts he will take upon himself to recommend that the Prisons Board should at once order the removal of Mr. Carew to Dublin? The case is coming on at the forthcoming assizes at Belfast, and therefore the matter is one of the most extreme urgency.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Of course I shall be very glad to make any inquiry; but I think the hon. Gentleman and the House will feel that this is rather an extraordinary request to make. Instead of the solicitor going to the prisoner, the prisoner is to be removed from one prison to another to suit the convenience of the solicitor.

MR. J. REDMOND: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether his attention has been called to the remarks of the Lord Chief Justice of Ireland in a similar case heard the other day, which were to the effect that he and the members of his Court hoped that in all cases of that kind every facility possible would be given by the Prisons Board to enable prisoners to have the necessary consultations with their solicitors?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman may be sure that of those remarks I entirely approve.

MR. T. M. HEALY: As the right hon. Gentleman has said it is impossible to remove prisoners from one jail to another for the convenience of a particular solicitor, will he say how it is that certain prisoners have been brought from Ireland to London in the interest of the Times?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am not fully aware of the facts; but I understand that that was in obedience to some mandate of a Court.

IRELAND—MR. CECIL ROCHE.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I desire to put a question to the Chief Secretary with regard to Mr. Cecil Roche, one of the Resident Magistrates who recently sentenced Mr. O'Brien to imprisonment; it is, whether it is the fact that Mr. Houston, whose name will not be unfamiliar to the right hon. Gentleman, was before Mr. Roche's elevation to the magistracy, Mr. Houston's employer and paymaster.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I know nothing about that, nor do I think it is a proper subject to put a Question to me about.

NEW MEMBER SWORN.

Jabez Spencer Balfour, esquire, for Burnley.

STOWMARKET COUNTY COURT.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Cambridge) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, if he is aware that the clerk to the Registrar of the Stowmarket County Court has not yet been appointed by Sir Francis Roxburgh, the County Court Judge, to administer oaths under Section 83 of the Act of last Session; and if he will see that the Judge forthwith nominates suitable persons in every district to administer oaths in the absence of the Registrars?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am informed by the Lord Chancellor that he does not know whether the Judge has, or has not, made any such appointment; that the matter is left by the Act entirely within the discretion of the Judge, and does not appear to be intended as a provision for the absence of the Registrar. Any complaint on the matter should be addressed directly to the Judge.

DEFECTIVE CAVALRY SWORDS.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) asked the Under Secretary of State for India whether it was the fact, as stated by the Times Indian correspondent on 25th February, that "of 500 swords of the Madras Cavalry recently tested half were broken or bent"; if so, what number so tested were defective; and what proportion of the swords and bayonets in the hands of British and Native troops in India have been submitted to a Government test, and what proportion of those so tested have proved defective?

LORD HENRY BRUCE asked the Secretary of State for War whether the statement is substantially correct that out of 500 swords of the Madras Cavalry recently tested, half were broken or bent; and, if so, who is to blame?

goal. I might, perhaps, recommend to right hon. Gentlemen opposite a little book called "Prison Lyrics," which was committed to memory by Mr. Wilfred Blunt, while he was in prison recently. The same policy was followed in the imprisonment of Mr. O'Connell. He, convicted of conspiring to intimidate and create terror among the people, was treated in prison with extraordinary indulgence. On many days his dinner party consisted of as many as 30 people. It is stated also that Sir Charles Gavan Duffy received lessons in elocution during the time he was in gaol. I quote these instances for the purpose of showing what was the practice in the past, and I say the Chief Secretary has practically inaugurated a new policy by treating Irish Members and others in the manner he has treated them—a policy, I venture to say, discreditable to this country, and opposed to the good fame of England. It appears to me to have been the deliberate policy of the right hon. Gentleman to affix to Irish Members the status of criminals. He always speaks of offences under the Crimes Act as crimes and the perpetrators as criminals, and in a speech from which I quoted a short time ago he spoke of the offence committed by Irish Members, and afterwards alluded to those who committed such offences as "shocking criminals." It appears to be part of that same policy that has been exposed before the Royal Commission—the policy of branding the Irish Leader and his principal Colleagues with connivance, with outrage and crime. In Ireland the policy has been to treat those Members who have committed offences under the Crimes Act as criminals in every sense of the term. One part of this policy has altogether failed. It is exploded. The accused have become the accusers, and I will venture to say the policy of the Chief Secretary, in reference to the Crimes Act, will be equally unsuccessful. It was on the very day for the Second Reading of the Crimes Act that the forged letters were published, with the object of influencing public opinion and enabling the Government to carry their Act through; and I say, therefore, that forged letters, Coercion Act, and Government might appropriately disappear from the scene together. I would not even make an exception in favour of my right hon.

Mr. Shaw Lefevre

Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. In conclusion, let me say a word on the effect of the policy. The treatment of Irish prisoners and others in this matter has been foolish and wanton, and has not had the desired effect. It does not deter people from committing offences of this kind; on the contrary, it rather stimulates and induces people to do the same thing. There are numbers of people in Ireland who have been induced, by the very manner in which these prisoners have been treated, to commit similar offences. In yesterday's Freeman's Journal it appears that the evictions upon the Clanricarde estate have been renewed. I was under the impression that the Chief Secretary had refused to lend the forces of the Crown for carrying out evictions on this estate. I thought that Dr. Healy, the coadjuting Bishop of the diocese, had persuaded the right hon. Gentleman that it was not wise to do so, and I am surprised that a force is assisting the landlord on that estate. The account in the Freeman's Journal says six families were evicted on the previous day, and turned out upon the roadside. The weather was intensely cold, and snow covered the ground. It was pitiful, the correspondent said, to see old men, women, and young children shivering in the cold, while their household goods were being scattered about the yard. Twenty Emergency men, a hundred police, and a detachment of soldiers assisted at the evictions. It appears that the force assembled on the previous night. For my own part, I can only say that, having taken up the case of these unfortunate people, I will not be backward in supporting them in future, in the absence of their legitimate advisers, their Representatives, and the Leaders of the Irish Party—Mr. O'Brien and the hon. Member for Mayo, who, I am sorry to hear, is compelled to leave England for the benefit of his health. The Representatives of the country are about to go to prison, and I say that if I can render any assistance, if they desire it, by going there and holding a meeting to protest against these cruel evictions, I shall feel it my duty to do so, and I will give whatever advice to the tenants may seem pertinent to the occasion. In conclusion, I will refer to words used by my hon. Friend the Chairman of Committees. He concluded his short speech by saying that, in Ireland—

“A great system was working for equity and freedom, and an ever-increasing attempt to give the same guarantees for independence as England possessed.”

I am sorry to think my right hon. Friend is living in a fool's paradise; for that appears to me exactly the converse of what is taking place. For my part, after some inquiry in Ireland during several visits, and having paid more attention to the facts of the cases that have occurred there under the Coercion Act than most Members during the last two years, I have certainly come to the conclusion that the administration of Ireland under the present Chief Secretary is being carried out by an organized system of police espionage, supported by and supporting a system of Coercion, carried out in total contempt of Irish opinion—in total disregard of all those Constitutional principles which the English people most value and uphold.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, West): I must confess that I am somewhat disappointed by the speech to which we have just listened. When my right hon. Friend rose yesterday afternoon I hoped that he would at least introduce some novelty into the debate, and rise to the height of this great argument. My right hon. Friend has devoted special attention to Ireland and to Irish policy, and he has devoted to that question all the resources of a most painstaking intellect; and certainly I hoped that on the present occasion he would have given to the House some general principles of policy upon which we might have continued the discussion, and that he would not have confined himself, as he has done, strictly to the lines of previous speakers, and to a disquisition on all the petty details of administration in Ireland. I wish to recall to the House the fact that the Amendment we are considering consists of two branches. In the first place, this Amendment condemns in unhesitating and unqualified terms the present system of administration in Ireland; and, in the second place, it goes on to suggest an alternative policy and the adoption of such measures of conciliation as would bring about the contentment of the Irish people and establish a real union between Great Britain and Ireland. Surely the second part of the Amendment is much more important than the first, and yet, from first to last, although we have had three days' debate, no single speaker has uttered one single word upon the second branch. The line of argument hitherto has, in my opinion, not been broad enough to sustain a Vote of Censure. What is it that we are asked to do? We are asked to censure the Government, knowing that the result of that would be a change of Government; and, what is more important, an entire change in the relations between this country and Ireland. Surely, if we are to take so important a step as that, we ought to know something of the policy of the Government which is to succeed the one we are asked to condemn. It may be a good thing to make such a change; it may be that the time has come for it; but, if so, why do you argue, why do not you give us and the country an opportunity of considering what are the circumstances which should now lead us to reverse the policy at which we arrived only two years ago? In 1886 the policy of Home Rule, the policy of a separate Parliament in Dublin, was rejected in this House; and it was rejected still more conclusively in the country. It may be that our fears which led us to join in that rejection may have been groundless. It may be that in course of the two years which have elapsed you have found new arguments which will enable you to recommend more successfully the policy which was then rejected. Why do not you produce the arguments to the House? Why do you ask us to give a verdict on false pretences? Why do you ask us to accept Home Rule not by any arguments in favour of Home Rule, but by petty attacks on the Administration? I say that the course we are asked to take is too important to be decided by a side wind. The fate of the Empire, the peace of Ireland, by your own assertion, depend upon the course which you are recommending. The fate of the Empire and the peace of Ireland ought not to be allowed to depend upon the question whether one particular Member of Parliament has had his hair cut and another Member of Parliament has refused to be weighed. What are the grounds, hitherto submitted to this House, upon which we are asked to reverse the decision at which we arrived in 1886? We are to accept a Home Rule Administration—because that is the question—because it appears that under the Coercion Act, out of some 5,000,000 subjects of Her Majesty in Ireland, there are at the present time 111 persons, all told, who have been confined for short periods of imprisonment in the Irish gaols. It is not denied by anybody that these persons have committed the offences with which they are charged. They boast of it; it is made part of the case on their behalf that they have committed these offences deliberately, of course with the best intentions and motives. It is not denied, I believe, that offences of this kind must be repressed. Either you must do away with the state of things under which these offences are committed or you must repress the offenders. But it is said in a few cases—as far as I know not in more than half-a-dozen of them—the sentences which have been inflicted are harsh and excessive; and it is said that in another small number of cases, probably a score, or it may be a little more than a score, the treatment of those offenders, after they have been convicted, has been unnecessarily harsh. These allegations are all of them made on ex parte statements. They are made either on the authority of the persons themselves or on the authority of newspaper editors, and I should have thought hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway were not inclined to place implicit reliance upon newspaper statements. Yet it is upon this evidence with which the House is called upon to deal, and with which, even if it were better evidence, the House is incapable of dealing—it is upon this evidence, which is not good enough to hang a dog upon, that you are asked to turn out a Government and to replace them with what I may call a Home Rule Administration. Even if these allegations were proved up to the hilt: that there has been harsh administration of the law in Ireland; that, to accept the language of my right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle, there has been a prostitution of the law in Ireland; that there are unjust Judges in Ireland; that there are gaolers devoid of human sympathy, who actually take a personal delight in torturing their prisoners—even if all that were true, although it might be ground for an inquiry by this House, and for the condemnation of the persons concerned, and for an appeal to the Crown to remove these unjust Judges, and to the Government to remove these unjust gaolers, yet it would not of itself be a ground for removing the Government. Certainly not; and it is no ground at all for altering the policy upon which the Government have taken their stand. It is perfectly evident that the promoters of this debate feel that they are weak. They feel that it is not enough to prove up to the hilt charges against officials in Ireland, but that it is necessary to connect the Government with their malpractices, and, accordingly, they have not hesitated to impute the basest, the meanest, and the wickedest motives to the Members of the Government, and, above all, to the Chief Secretary. It has been insinuated from these Benches, and directly alleged from the Benches below the Gangway, that the Chief Secretary has consented to, and has, in fact, stimulated, the torture of political opponents who have worsted him in debate.

MR. DILLON: They have done it all the same.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: We have a precedent for action of this kind. I remember that in a previous Administration there were some abominable crimes, not alleged, but proved, against officials and persons of position in Ireland—some persons connected with Dublin Castle. The accused were brought to trial, convicted, and sentenced to imprisonment, and then the Party below the Gangway charged the Government of the day—charged Lord Spencer and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Bridgeton Division of Glasgow—with conniving at those outrageous offences. They even went further, and charged them with personal sympathy with those outrages. Now this precedent is followed, and the same Party, cheered, I am sorry to say, from above the Gangway, are charging the Government, not, indeed, with connivance with crime, for crime is not alleged, but, at all events, with motives which I should deem to be criminal. I say that the charge is preposterous. I say more. There is not a man in this House, wherever he sits and whatever he may think it fit to do in these bitter Party recriminatory discussions—there is not a man in this House who believes a word of it. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary can afford very well to disregard these charges. He knows that if he would come down here to-morrow—if he would say, like some of his predecessors, that he had “found salvation” in four-and-twenty hours—if he would say that he was a convert to Home Rule, he would be covered with the profuse adulation of the hon. Members who now abuse him, although, perhaps, in the one case as in the other, their personal admiration would not be accompanied by much personal respect. Well, Sir, supposing for the sake of argument I go further and admit, not the motives charged against the Chief Secretary—that would be absurd—but supposing I admit that he has made a mistake, and by an error of judgment done something which he ought not to have done, or refrained from something which he ought to have done, I say that again would be a reason for a representation from this House, but it would not be a sufficient reason for replacing the Chief Secretary and the Government of which he is a Member by a new Chief Secretary and a Government pledged to a policy which by hypothesis we are all bound to oppose. I complain that in this debate hitherto we have not reached the real kernel of the argument. I wish to come to the second branch of the Amendment which has been proposed. I quite admit that if there be such a policy as is here indicated, if there be a policy of conciliation which will secure contentment in Ireland, and if that policy is refused by the Government, then undoubtedly you have a sufficient reason for turning them out, and I think the sooner you do so the better. But if you have such a policy as that, why do you not put it before us? Why do you not tell us what it is? Why do you not allow us to judge of it? No; I know that that would not answer your purpose. You want us to swallow your policy with our eyes shut. We respectfully decline to do so. Now in 1886 my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian contended that there were only two alternatives before the House and the country. One was a system of Coercion more stringent than any which had previously existed, and the other was his own policy of conciliation, which was represented by his two Bills. At that time we protested against this. We said there was a third alternative, and that it was possible to continue on the ancient lines of Liberalism, and, while steadily maintaining the Union in all its fulness and completeness, at the same time to seek out and remedy any proved grievances on the part of the Irish people. But we said at the same time that it would be within your power to make that alternative impossible. We said it was within the power of hon. Members, and, above all, hon. Members from Ireland, to create such an agitation in Ireland as would make repressive measures absolutely necessary, and we all know that since that time it has been the deliberate and avowed policy of the Irish Members to make the Government of Ireland impossible, and to force Coercion on the Government of the country. But, at least, I say this. If we were to have Coercion, so far from its being the most stringent Coercion ever known, it is the mildest in the history of the country. [“No, no!”] Well, let us contrast it with some Coercions which preceded it. Under this Act, which is represented as so arbitrary and as so tyrannical, under which the whole country of Ireland is alleged to be groaning, you have just 111 men, and no more, in prison, and for short periods of imprisonment. In the time of the late Mr. Forster over 1,000 men were in prison at one time, and at that time there was very much less success attended the imprisonment of those 1,000 persons than has now attended the imprisonment of 111 gentlemen who are now, unfortunately, confined for the pacification of Ireland; because as to the result of this Coercion Act there can be no two opinions. You may say, if you like, that other things have contributed to this result; but the result itself is indubitable and undeniable. You may test the condition of Ireland by any of the usual tests, and you will find that in all respects it has been enormously improved. Since the Act was passed the number of outrages has diminished, boycotting has been immensely reduced, the number of persons claiming protection is very much less, and, more important than all, people begin to recognize that they can do what they have a legal right to do, and are beginning to take vacant farms all over the country. Under these circumstances I say there is no case where so much good in the way of pacifying the country has been effected with so little real repression and interference with individual liberty. But then it may be said that although the law can be justified, yet the administration of the law has been conducted with excessive harshness. Now, just let us look into the alleged abuses of the law, and let me point out that this kind of allegation is made against every law in every country and at all times. I am bound to say that there is not a bench of magistrates in the United Kingdom against which similar charges have not been made—charges, that is to say, of administering law in such a way as to inflict unjust or unequal sentences. These charges are very often made without sufficient proof; but, even if they were proved, you never heard anybody coming to the House of Commons and proposing a Vote of Censure on the Government because some magistrate committed a man for six months when he should only have given him two. Now we have had a number of individual cases brought before the House. Every one of these has been replied to categorically, either by the Chief Secretary for Ireland or the Solicitor General for Ireland; and with one exception, to which I will refer, the answers appear to me to be satisfactory. At all events, they are sufficient to show conclusively that there are two sides to the case, and that the House of Commons would be very improperly advised if it accepted a purely ex parte statement. Take one case as a type of the rest and as significant of the light way in which these accusations, apparently without any investigation, are brought forward. Here is a case brought forward by my right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle, and made part of his solemn indictment of the Government, for it was not like a speech in debate—it was a deliberately prepared indictment against the Government; and he quoted it as one reason why, as I have said, we should turn out the Government and adopt a Home Rule policy.

"There is one case," said my right hon. Friend, "in which I hope the Chief Secretary will give us further information, for the circumstances, as stated, are so extraordinary that I cannot believe them. But he, perhaps, can tell us whether they are true or not. Two young men were charged with obstructing a constable at Ennis on February 10th. The obstruction consisted in the defendants, while engaged in conversation, laughing at the constable. The defendants denied that they were laughing. The magistrates sentenced them to three months' imprisonment, in default of finding bail for good behaviour. I say this may not be true, but it requires investigation."

Yes, Sir; certainly it requires investigation. I cannot conceive a fairer case for putting a question to the Solicitor General and getting a reply; but is it upon an allegation of this kind, as to which my right hon. Friend does not venture to offer an opinion, even though it is a true accusation, that we are to found a great Constitutional argument and to attack the Government of the country? Now, what was the answer of the Solicitor General? In the first place, it was not a prosecution under the Crimes Act at all. It was under the ordinary law. These young men were proved to have deliberately insulted the constable. They said to him, "You are a scoundrel. You are the meanest man in Ennis, and we shall soon kick you out of Ennis." The men were ordered to give bail. One man gave bail; the other refused to do so, and he was imprisoned in default. Well, now this is the proof of the iniquity of the Government, of the arbitrary character of the Crimes Act, and, of course, of the tyrannical cruelty and injustice which is proceeding in Ireland. Why, it is the most ordinary case in the world of a couple of rude roughs brought before a magistrate and ordered to find bail for good behaviour and sent to gaol in default. The only other case to which I wish to refer is that of Mr. E. Harrington, and which, as I have said, is the exception to the satisfactory reply of the Government to the charges against them. Mr. Edward Harrington, at all events, is a man of courage. He has gone to gaol, and he has taken his punishment bravely. He has not complained about putting on the prison clothes, and he has suffered all the penalties inflicted upon him, although we are told—and I daresay it is true—they involve some physical suffering. Well, Mr. Harrington committed an offence which I do not want to depreciate, and, being brought before the magistrates, he was sentenced to what I believe is the utmost punishment allowed by law—namely, six months with hard labour. I think that a tremendous punishment, especially for a man of education. But that is not all. It is admitted that the Court offered Mr. Harrington to let him off altogether if he would give an assurance not to repeat the offence. I think two things follow from that. It shows that the Court was not vindictively inclined, but it shows that the Court was of opinion that the offence committed was of a kind which it was necessary to deter others from committing, but not of a kind which required penal infliction. There is all the difference in the world between punishment for the sake of punishment and for the sake of prevention. I confess it appears to me that this was a case in which the only punishment that was necessary was for the sake of prevention; and I do venture to urge the Government, in view of all the circumstances of the case, to especially consider the case of Mr. Harrington, and see whether it be not one to which the clemency of the Crown might be extended. I now pass to the other classes of complaint with regard to the prison treatment of prisoners under the Crimes Act. There is the case of Mr. O'Brien. I do not want to say much about Mr. O'Brien's case, especially in his absence, but I think it is fair to say this—that everyone who has seen him in this House must know, not only that he is a delicate man, but also a person of a rather excitable temperament; and it is quite possible, under the circumstances—the irritating circumstances in which he was placed the other day—that he may not have recollected all that passed. At all events we have to consider the statement, which, we are told, comes directly from him, and which was given to us by the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon). Well, but since then a paper has been laid on the Table of the House, to which we are entitled to pay some attention, and as to which all I am going to say is, that it conflicts very materially with the statement given to us the other day. This is a paper called for by the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. T. Healy), and laid on the Table accordingly. It is a statement by the prison doctor (Dr. O'Farrell), and I will read the only passages which I think are in conflict with Mr.

O'Brien's statement, and simply leave the matter to the judgment of the House. Dr. O'Farrell says—

“Mr. O'Brien was lying in bed on two mattresses, with a plentiful supply of good and new bed covering. Receiving me courteously, and affording me every facility for examining him, he expressed himself as feeling well, and seemed in very good spirits. In reply to my questions, he said he had every confidence in the skill and kindness of the prison medical officer.”

That is the gentleman against whom the hon. Member for East Mayo brought the most extraordinary and violent accusations the other day. He said, I think, that in his opinion the conduct of this gentleman was infamous. Dr. O'Farrell continues—

“And that the friction which occurred with him last Thursday was owing to a misunderstanding on his own part. He stated that he had no complaint of any kind to make regarding his prison treatment; and that if the rule depriving him of his clothing had to be insisted on, he would say no excessive violence had been used in forcing it. On my remarking that it was not easy to measure the exact degree of force necessary once a struggle was provoked, as official, like other human temper, is, unfortunately, an imponderable quantity, Mr. O'Brien at once candidly said that the officials had displayed no temper on the occasion in question.”

I shall say no more on that particular case, but I would submit that on the general question it is a fair subject for discussion whether the gentlemen convicted under the Crimes Act, or the majority of these gentlemen, should or should not be treated as first-class misdemeanants; and if a Bill or Resolution were brought before the House dealing with the subject I confess I should be inclined to support it. But it is perfectly beside the main issue to put forward as a reason for turning out the Government, that they have carried out the law as it exists at present. I think these charges are an attempt to avoid the main issue. They are an attempt to get a verdict from the country on a side issue, not by argument addressed to the understanding, but by an appeal to sensation and sentimental declamation. I do not agree for a moment with the statement in the Amendment of my right hon. Friend that the policy administered in Ireland is viewed with reprobation and aversion by the people of Great Britain. [“Oh!”] I may be blind, but I do not see the point. It is true the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle said the other day there was an irresistible voice—that the hour had struck, and that the irresistible voice would sweep the Government from power. Well, I confess I do not hear the irresistible voice. I suppose the irresistible voice is to be found in what the Gladstonian papers dignify by the name of the “National Protest.” I should like to ask my right hon. Friend whether he really is satisfied with the result of the latest atrocity agitation? I have been in a great number of agitations. I have witnessed them from near at hand. I am bound to say there is no agitation, in my opinion, in recent times which has been so little effective as this one. My right hon. Friend is more behind the scenes than I am, but it appears to me as if this irresistible voice was the voice of Mr. Schnadhorst, speaking through the Sub-Committees, the General Committees, the Executive Committees, and the Management Committees, whose operations he so ably controls. So far as I can see, the great heart of the people is beating with perfect tranquillity, in spite of all the agitation. But then, perhaps, my right hon. Friend relies upon recent elections. All I ask him on that point is to enter upon the study of comparative meteorology, and, if he does, he will find there is no case of any Government’s being in power for the time this Government has been in power and losing so little. [“Oh! Oh!”] Well, I am quite certain that the Government of which I know most lost a good deal. We never took that view of by-elections when my right hon. Friend was in power. I do not think that they are any conclusive key to the current of public opinion; and I have really more faith in the good sense and intelligence of my fellow-countrymen than to believe that they will allow their opinions upon a subject which involves the highest interests to be changed by such miserable side-issues as these by which it is now sought to influence their decision. Now, Sir, I have dealt as far as I intend to deal with the first part of this Amendment. It is the only part—or else I should not have spent my time on it—with which the promoters of the Amendment have dealt up to the present time. I say with regard to it that the allegations are not proved, and if they were proved, they would not constitute in themselves a sufficient case for turning out the Government. If you want to do that, the only way is to produce an alternative and a better policy than their policy. And, again, I ask my right hon. Friends on this bench, when they speak at the concluding portion of this debate, to tell us what their policy is. [Ironical laughter.] Hon. Members below the Gangway think that this is a most laughable request to make. They are afraid, perhaps, that my right hon. Friend behind me would fall into a trap if he told the country what he would do with regard to the relations of the Government to Ireland if he were sitting opposite. I do not think that it is an unreasonable demand to make, and I will support it by a historical precedent. In 1868 there was a Conservative Government in power. There was coercion in Ireland and discontent in Ireland. My right hon. Friend was then the Leader of the Opposition. What did he do? He put before the country and the House a remedial policy for Ireland in all its details. That was the date when he told us of the upas tree with its three branches.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Mid Lothian): I did not go into any details.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Well, he put before country the main principles of his policy. He spoke of the upas tree. He proposed remedial legislation in three branches—for education, for the land, and the Irish Church; and he promised that as the result of that legislation there should be content and union of hearts in Ireland. But my right hon. Friend did more than that. He put before the House a series of Resolutions upon the disestablishment and disendowment of the Irish Church. That is all we ask him to do now. Let him put upon the Table of the House and let us discuss Resolutions embodying the main principles of his Irish policy. We are perfectly ready to grapple with and discuss them, and possibly we may be able to agree. I say possibly. I admit that I am not so sanguine as I once was. In 1886 we knew perfectly well what my right hon. Friend’s policy was. It was put before us in two Bills, and, of course, with great detail and elaboration. But we cannot discuss with you upon those Bills, because they are dead.

Mr. J. Chamberlain

That is no longer the policy of my right hon. Friend. [Mr. GLADSTONE expressed dissent.] My right hon. Friend corrects me. Do I understand him to differ? Then what is the policy of my right hon. Friend? That is what I have been trying to get at ever since the Bills were defeated in 1886, and I have never got it to this moment. Now we know that these Bills, one of which we were told was abandoned, the other of which was to be altered in material particulars, and both of which were dead—that these Bills are now resuscitated and alive, and that they stand as the policy of my right hon. Friend. My right hon. Friend thinks that the opinion of the country or of the House is changed with regard to these Bills. Let him bring them forward again as Bills or as Resolutions, and we are prepared to discuss them again. Then it will be fair to ask the House to turn out the Government if it agrees with my right hon. Friend. But I confess that although we know now that these Bills contain the policy of my hon. Friend, we know also—because he has told us so himself—that there are to be important alterations in them. I assume that if he should challenge the House again upon this policy he will be prepared to tell us—and I do not see why he should not tell us in the present debate—what those alterations are. That is not asking for details, for the alterations affect the greatest principle—the principle which he has himself put into the forefront—the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament. I think we have a right to ask for some information with regard to this question. I know it is no use to appeal to hon. Gentlemen; but I should like to appeal, through them, to the country, to consider what is the result of this policy of silence—of this abstinence from all information of which we can catch hold. I want them to see what a situation they are forging for themselves. Suppose that upon this Amendment they were successful. That is not very likely, but they must be successful sooner or later. [Opposition cheers.] You receive that as if it were a Heaven-sent communication. I wonder whether hon. Gentlemen were so absolutely hopeless of ever getting back into power that they are grateful for an intimation from me that at some time or other they must be successful. I suppose no Government can always remain in office, and when this Government, in the ordinary course of events, gives place to the Government led by my right hon. Friend, when that time comes which is so ardently desired by Members below the Gangway, then, at all events, my right hon. Friend will have to state his policy, and not merely the main principles of it, but the full details. I will suppose that he is successful in persuading the then House of Commons to adopt it. I will also suppose that he is successful in persuading the country to adopt it on the occasion of the second general election which must take place before a great constitutional change is made, and which it is perfectly certain would take place. Assuming that my right hon. Friend is perfectly successful on both occasions, even then I would ask him to consider what chance there is of a final settlement if it is to be, as it will be on this hypothesis, forced upon an unwilling but a powerful and energetic minority in Ireland, and if it is to be carefully watched, strenuously criticized, and persistently opposed by a powerful minority in this House and in this country? I do not believe, after all, if it were possible to look on this matter apart from Party interests, that any reasonable man would deny my proposition—namely, that there is no chance of any Party making a final settlement of this question without some sort of general assent. The only chance of a final settlement is where all the moderate men of all Parties agree. It is all very well in the heat of Party discussion to forget that; but although it is unsafe to prophesy, I prophesy with the most absolute certainty of fulfilment, that if you carry the old scheme, or any new Home Rule scheme, it will break down within six months under such opposition as I have indicated. If that is so, is it not worth while once more to see whether there be not some points on which we are all agreed? I am not speaking of myself—I am speaking of the moderate men of all Parties. Are there any points at all upon which the moderate men of all Parties are agreed, and the consideration of which offers a chance of further agreement? From time to time it is worthy the attention of the House of Commons to consider whether this is the case.

Mr. BIGGAR (Cavan, W.): Lay them on the Table.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: I say that there are points of agreement upon which moderate men do agree even at the present time. Here is the first one. I believe that moderate men of all Parties agree in this—the primary importance of a settlement of the land question. Just note one thing in passing. Here we are discussing the administration of the Crimes Act, and a number of cases are brought forward. I notice that every one of those cases is an agrarian case, and has nothing whatever to do directly with the Home Rule question. I do not press that point too far. I am perfectly ready to admit that when you have settled the land question there may remain a very strong feeling in favour of Home Rule of some kind or other. I admit that, but I say if you could do away with the agrarian difficulty you would do away with the system of coercion and the necessity of such a debate as this, and all these cases of grievances which have been brought before the House. And, therefore, if my right hon. Friend has a land policy to propose which will secure these results, that would be a very proper thing to challenge the opinion of the House upon, and, if the Government did not adopt it, to turn them out. We are agreed as to the primary importance of such a question. I want to call attention to the language used by my right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Morley). This is an extract which I know expresses his present view, but it is an extract which appeared in the Nineteenth Century of November, 1882. He then wrote—

“If there were no other check, the land question would stand in the way if we are to undertake Home Rule in such a sense as would satisfy Mr. Davitt and Mr. Dillon. Are we to make terms with the landlords beforehand? If so, what is the security that those terms will be observed?”

I just note, in passing, that this is precisely one of our difficulties about any proposal for the extension of local government in Ireland. We want to know what is the security that any terms we make will be observed. My right hon. Friend says now, “Oh, you have armies and navies, and by them you can control the Irish Parliament.”

But at any rate in 1882 he did not think so, because he put this question. He goes on to say—

“If not, are we prepared to see the landlords sent flying for their lives with bag and baggage? The land is the question that interests the Irish more than all other questions put together. What value would they set upon an arrangement which excluded this from the sphere of their own control? If it is not excluded, can we expect them to handle the interests of those whom they regard as their hereditary tyrants and most cruel oppressors with respect for property and interests that is exacted by public opinion in this country, where the dispossessed class happen to be powerfully represented? If this be a well-grounded apprehension, then some form of equitable expropriation must precede any effectual form of Home Rule.”

Now, Sir, I say I agree with every word of that, and I believe it will be concurred in by every reasonable man. Is there what my right hon. Friend calls a reasonable form of expropriation which can be found and which will not involve excessive risk to the British taxpayer, because that is the only reason, so far as I know, which led any of us to oppose the Land Bill of my right hon. Friend; at all events, it was the primary reason. Well, is there such a plan? Can such a plan be proposed? I think there can be. Some hon. Members have just invited me to consider the subject of the Round Table. I observe that my right hon. Friend (Sir W. Harcourt), speaking last night at Derby, alluded to that celebrated Conference, and gave his own account of what took place there. Now, the proceeding of my right hon. Friend is very characteristic—characteristic of the proceedings of his Party in this debate. When I heard that my right hon. Friend was contemplating a statement as to the proceedings of the Round Table, I wrote to him to suggest that we should confer on the facts only—not upon anything else—in order that there might be an agreement, at least, upon the facts. It was open to each of us to make our own comments upon the facts; but I thought we might compare our respective notes of what took place at the time, and that that would avoid subsequent controversy. My right hon. Friend declined.

Sir W. HARCOURT (Derby): Why?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: My right hon. Friend says, Why? Because he preferred, as my right hon. Friend's colleagues appear also to prefer, to rely upon an ex parte statement.

SIR W. HARCOURT: The reason why I declined the proposal of my right hon. Friend was because, before he went to Scotland and demanded the publication of a secret proceeding, he never said a word to his colleagues about his intention to divulge, or to demand the divulging, of that secret, and I told him that, as he had chosen to take his own course without consulting us, we—I and my colleagues—took our course without consulting him.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: The statement which my right hon. Friend has just made necessitates a further allusion to the matter, which I had intended to reserve for discussion in the public Press. It is quite true that my right hon. Friends accused me of challenging them and forcing their hands, and compelling them to divulge something which I suppose they did not want to divulge. But I have pointed out to my right hon. Friend, in correspondence, that the cause of the remarks of which he complains is to be found in a previous speech delivered some considerable time before by my right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-on-Tyne (Mr. Morley). Speaking at Ipswich in October, my right hon. Friend, in answer to some such request as that which I have made to-day to my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian that he would disclose his policy, said,—“My right hon. Friend Mr. Chamberlain knows what our policy is. He knew it at the Round Table;” and then he went on to condemn in the strongest possible terms what he called the Birmingham plan of Irish land settlement. Now, Sir, as it is my opinion, and as I think I shall be able to show, that the only plans which were discussed at the Round Table were the Birmingham plans, I think I was justified under those circumstances in protesting against the inferences which would be drawn from my right hon. Friend's statement, and in offering them my permission, at all events, to publish anything which took place at that Conference. Now, Sir, that is only a digression. I come back to my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby. He has taken, as he has said, his own course. Well, that will necessitate my taking my own course. I cannot admit that the right hon. Gentleman's statement of our proceedings is adequate or accurate, and I shall take the earliest possible opportunity of correcting him in those particulars that I think to be material. But all I want to do now is to refer to this Conference for the sake of my present argument. I was dealing with the Land Question. I was dealing with the possibility of finding some scheme which might settle the Land Question, which might carry through an equitable expropriation without involving British credit. Well, now, one thing, at all events, is absolutely beyond dispute in connection with the Round Table. My right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-on-Tyne said, the other day, if we were not in entire agreement we were at least in sight of one another. My right hon. Friend the Member for Derby, speaking last night, confirmed that statement. He even went beyond it, and said we were in substantial agreement. Well, what were we in agreement upon? What were the plans that were discussed at the Round Table? Were they the Bills of my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian? Certainly not. Those Bills were laid on the shelf; they were never referred to. [Sir W. HARCOURT: Oh!] There was no reference whatever, and the discussion proceeded from first to last—[“Oh, oh!”]—this is my statement—the discussion proceeded from first to last as regards the land question upon a plan which I submitted, which my right hon. Friend possesses at this moment in writing, and which, if anybody doubts me, I challenge him to produce; and, as regards Home Rule, it proceeded upon a consideration of the inter-provincial system of Canada, which is totally distinct from the plan of my right hon. Friend, and which I offered to accept as a basis of discussion in the debates upon the Home Rule Bill. Well, I say under those circumstances I am justified in asserting that, at all events, the plans which were discussed there were not the plans of my right hon. Friend. But, as regards Local Government, just consider for a moment what that means. Consider what the inter-provincial system of Canada is. The discussion turned upon a system under which, in the first place, there would have been a separate treatment of Ulster. It turned upon a system under which there would have been a representation of Irish Members at Westminster, and the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament would have been maintained. It turned on a system under which the administration of the law—the appointment, that is to say, of the Judges and the magistrates—was to be in the hands of the Imperial authority, and not of the local authority; it turned on a system under which there were to be statutory provisions for protecting the private rights of every man, for preventing undue preference, either of classes or individuals, and for preventing the taking of any man's property without adequate compensation. And it provided, besides all this, for the continuance of an Imperial authority—not the Army; not the Navy—in order to see that those statutory provisions were observed by the local and subordinate authorities. I say that may be a bad system or a good system—I am not discussing that now. All I want to know is this—we were at that time within sight of one another upon that system—are we still within sight of one another upon that system? [Cries of "No" from the Irish Members.] Oh, you have changed your minds. [A Voice: "You have changed yours."] Well, who are the real Leaders of the Party? That may be the difficulty. I have my own opinion why the Round Table Conference came to an end, and it is not the opinion which was expressed by my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby. I think there was a power behind the Throne which got uneasy at the negotiations, and accordingly they were brought to a premature conclusion. But I say again, if my right hon. Friends are still within sight of me upon these points, why don't they put their propositions in the form of Resolutions before the House and let us discuss them? I think it is very likely that we might find other persons to agree with us—perhaps persons on both sides of the House. Let us go a step further with regard to the land question. I have already called attention to the fact in another place that my right hon. Friend at a dinner party at which he spoke in London about the time of the Round Table Conference stated that, although he adhered to his original intention—that is, his land scheme of perfect security—yet that he admitted the strength of the objections to the use of British credit, and that he had come to the conclusion on reconsideration that plans might be found for carrying out the object without having recourse to British credit.

MR. GLADSTONE: Hear, hear; that is so. I never denied it.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Very well; my right hon. Friend is, no doubt, still of the same opinion. I do not say—I am not alleging that the plan which my right hon. Friend had in view was the plan which I submitted to the Round Table Conference, and which my right hon. Friend considers to be too ingenious and too impracticable; but, at all events, my right hon. Friend, if he does not accept my plan, has a plan of his own. He sees his way to the general lines of a plan which would affect this object, an object—and I want to bring the House back to this—which is essential to the success of your policy. You cannot have Home Rule without an effective and satisfactory Land Bill. With an effective and satisfactory Land Bill Home Rule would be robbed of half its terrors. Well, I say that if my right hon. Friend has a plan of this kind, and if he would produce it in this House for discussion, or if he would follow the course pursued on the Irish Church Question and put forward resolutions on the main lines of such a plan—

MR. GLADSTONE: I laid down no main lines for the Irish Church Disestablishment.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: My right hon. Friend says he did not give any main lines in his resolution about the Irish Church?

MR. GLADSTONE: No.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: Well, I accept his statement. As regards what I am now speaking about, I wish—whether there be a precedent for it or not—he could see his way to give an indication to the House of the main lines upon which at least a land scheme might be carried, and I believe that by so doing he would render greater service to the House and to the country than any services that he has rendered during the long course of his political existence. If this land question were out of the way the greatest obstacle to further progress would be removed. Why? Does any one doubt for a moment that if the Land War were out of the way there would be any objection in any part of the

Mr. Chamberlain

House at once to proceed with Local Government in Ireland, at least on the lines of the English and Scotch Local Government Bill. Surely hon. Members below the Gangway would agree that in a proposal for the settlement of the Irish Question a proposal for conferring Local County Government on Ireland must form a part? [Mr. Morley here said something to the right hon. Gentleman in an undertone.] Oh, yes; but that does not make any difference in the argument that Local Government for Ireland is necessary, whether it be carried out by an Irish Parliament or by the Imperial Parliament. All I say is, that if we got a land scheme which would end the Land War, then a Local Government System for Ireland presents no difficulties either by a Local or Imperial Parliament, and so far, at all events, you would settle the question. I have never made the slightest concealment of the opinion to which my right hon. Friend referred last night, and which I gave expression to at the Round Table Conference, and again and again in public speeches, that if you got as far as this you might go farther. I express my own opinion; but I have always thought that in these circumstances it would be possible, and it might be wise, to relieve this overworked Parliament by a system of delegation of some of its business. I do not believe in that case that there would be any difficulty or difference of opinion as to the subjects which should be submitted to any local assembly which might be created. There are certain subjects which would suggest themselves to the mind of every Member of the House—questions affecting Education, Temperance, Local Government, Public Works, and many other Questions, on which we could agree, which could be, in my opinion, most conveniently dealt with by Local Assemblies in Ireland, in Scotland, and perhaps in Wales. The difficulty does not arise there. I think myself it is worth while even for Home Rule Gentlemen to consider the difficulties which they have to overcome; and the difficulties which I think they have to overcome before they can succeed in persuading the House and the country to carry Home Rule are stupendous. The difficulties are twofold. In the first place, you have to devise some plan by which the system of the control of the Imperial Parliament may be maintained. My right hon. Friend told us we have got the Army and Navy. It is not enough to tell us that we have got the Army and Navy. We do not want to be out of one difficulty into another. We do not want, six months after the granting of Home Rule, to have to reconquer Ireland. I am not so certain as my right hon. Friend seems to think that it would be so easy a thing to accomplish; but whether easy or difficult we do not want to have to do it. And before we see our way clearly to granting these local liberties we ought to see our way to a means by which the control of Parliament may be given over to local authorities. The second point with which you have to deal—indeed it is the crux of the whole situation [ironical laughter—there ought to be no jeering or laughing when this subject is mentioned; it is not the policy of wise men to jeer and laugh at difficulties of this magnitude—the next question with which you have to deal is the question of Ulster. When my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for North Armagh spoke the other day you laughed at his statement that there would be forcible resistance against the decrees of an Irish Parliament, and you seek to institute a similarity between a threat of resistance to an Irish Parliament and resistance to the Imperial Parliament. I say, at all events, that the two things stand on a totally different footing. I say that there is one thing which the Imperial Parliament has no moral right to do. If it chooses it has a perfect right to repudiate the allegiance of any part of the Empire. It has a right to send them adrift, to force them from us against their will; it has a right to say to Ulster “Go from us; we will not have you any longer among us;” but it has no right to transfer the allegiance of Ulster or any other portion of the United Kingdom against the will and the consent of that portion which is sought to be separated. Therefore, I say the case is quite different; and I say, further, that although hon. Members from Ireland ridicule in public the threats which are made they know in their hearts that those threats are serious. [“No.”] Well, they may be going blindly into the ditch; but they know, and I know, that there would be such serious resistance to a proposal to transfer the allegiance of Ulster to a Home Rule Parliament in Dublin that the whole of your work would be undone six months after it was completed. I am afraid that I have trespassed too long on the patience of the House. At all events, I have attempted to deal frankly with the Question before the House. I say that the object of my argument has been to show that the complaints of the administration of the Crimes Act are not proved, and if they were proved they would not justify a complete change of policy. They amount to an attempt to obtain a verdict from the people of this country on false issues; and I appeal to my right hon. Friends who may have to follow me in Debate to, at all events, place the future discussion on a broader, sounder basis, and to tell us, not in detail, but broadly, what is the policy which is to bring about the union of hearts which they ask us to anticipate, and to put that policy before us in a form in which we can meet them in discussion.

*MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): There has been one word constantly recurring in the able speech we have just listened to which I should like, if possible, to interpret—and that is the word “we.” The right hon. Gentleman, speaking as if with authority, said what “we” are ready to do—what “we” are prepared to meet. Speaking with some slight experience, at any rate, of England, Scotland, and Wales, I do not quite understand what the right hon. Gentleman means by “we.” I know the Party opposite; I know a strong Party in the House, though a diminishing one, which follows the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale (the Marquis of Hartington); but I know nowhere out of Birmingham the Party for whom the right hon. Gentleman speaks. In 1884-5 the right hon. Gentleman could have used the word “we” with authority, for he then spoke in the name of nearly all the advanced Liberals and the great bulk of the Radicals of this country. I was one of those who looked to the right hon. Gentleman for leadership and guidance in a more advanced policy than even that of the Cabinet with which he was connected, and I was taught so to look at him by his own words—words which, if his leisure will permit him to remain in the House for a short time I shall have to call his attention to. But since 1886 I deny the right hon. Gentleman's right to speak for either the Radicalism or the Liberalism of this country. I am afraid that if any accident happened which separated the right hon. Gentleman for a time, however short, from the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale, who now sits beside him, he will find that he has not a friend among those whom he once denounced because they neither toil or spin. Nor has he claimed a right to be the Leader of any Party among whom I mix and mingle. The right hon. Gentleman rebuked the right hon. Gentleman who preceded him in the debate for not having risen to the height of the argument with which we have to deal; but the right hon. Gentleman descended himself to the Round Table instead of mounting to any argument that at all applied to the Amendment before the House. The right hon. Gentleman complains that there has been a discussion of petty details, and yet he occupied a considerable portion of his time with petty details personal to himself, and in petty details in reference to the various incidents which he said he intended to pass by. Now, what is the issue as raised by the right hon. Gentleman himself in the speech he has just delivered? The right hon. Gentleman has taken the House back to 1886, and has stated that the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian has said that there were only two alternative policies for Ireland—Coercion, or conciliation in the shape of Home Rule. Though the right hon. Gentleman stated that the Land Question was at the bottom of the difficulty, he refrained from making any proposal himself, notwithstanding his position of great authority, a Minister without portfolio, with all the leisure to bring any proposal forward, with all his influence to induce the other side of the House to vote for it. I would venture to suggest that the right hon. Gentleman has been reticent on the subject because he knew, as we all know who sit on this side of the House, and as the bulk of the English people know, that the redemption of Ireland, if it is to be merged in the Land Question, cannot be realized by those with whom he works and whom he supports in office. If the redemption of Ireland is to be realized, it cannot be by the kind of gentleman who tampers with it on the one hand with its Ashbourne Acts, and which intimidates the people on the other with measures coercive in the highest degree. It can only be achieved by one man, to whom the Irish people have given almost their love, certainly their grateful trust. According to the right hon. Gentleman, coercion is very mild in Ireland. Three years and a half ago, the right hon. Gentleman—when he needed to make no provision against the inhabitants, when he would have been protected in the country by the love of the bulk of his townspeople—held these views:—

"Coercion is for an emergency. It is nonsense to talk of a Constitutional system and of a Constitutional Government if the Constitution is always being suspended. When the emergency is over, then it is the duty of wise Statesmen to seek out the causes of discontent and endeavour to remedy them."

Yes, but the Address says that emergency is over—that you have already had "salutary results" in the restoration of order and confidence in Ireland. But, in 1886, these were the only grounds taken by the right hon. Gentleman in the defence of coercion. He said—

"Murder, outrage, and assassination are things which no Government can tolerate. If these stalk the land, then it is the duty of the Government, at all risks and hazards to put them down, and from the measures of protection may be asked. I listened to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary introducing the Crimes Bill, and he did not pretend that the number of crimes of violence was larger than it had been. I have the memory of this House and the correction of Hansard behind me. His exceedingly able brother the Member who spoke on the Amendment to the Address, said, crimes of violence, because there was a powerful political organization in Ireland."

And this was the opinions of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Chamberlain) of the Party sitting opposite to him:—

"For myself I have very little confidence in the striking qualities of a Conservative Administration. I have had some experience on this point. The Tory Party to a man opposed the concession of equal rights and equal privileges to our Roman Catholic fellow subjects. The Tory Party to a man resisted the removal of duties which pressed upon the food of the people. The Tories to a man resisted the extension of the suffrage. I do not believe in them as directors of the British Constitution or the British connection; and I believe in them the less because I am certain that no policy can conduce to more surely separation than persistence in opposition to opposition to reform, and a stupid reliance upon the brute force of Coercion as the only remedy. The Tory prescription has been tried for centuries, and it has failed conspicuously."

And I am going to vote for the Amendment because the right hon. Gentleman wants more doses of Coercion. He says—

"There are only 111 persons in gaol under the Coercion Act just now."

But where are the 1,900, the 2,000 imprisoned since the Act passed? They probably escaped his recollection, because I am sure the right hon. Gentleman is too fair a speaker to leave out the facts which tell against his case. He did not mention, when he was drawing attention to the thousand men who were imprisoned under Mr. Forster, and I opposed Coercion then as I have opposed it all my life—that they did not have their hair clipped or their beards out, that they did not wear prison dress. He did not mention, galling and shameful as their imprisonment was, that it was very different to what it is now. There is no comparison between the treatment of prisoners then and now. While we find that Mr. Forster had the grace to let a Member out of prison on his pledged word to return, we have the answer of the hon. and learned Chief Secretary this afternoon in reference to a Member who may be ruined by legal proceedings against him and brought by one of their own agents, and who wished to see his legal advisers. They carefully sent him to a gaol away from his counsel and solicitors, and refused to allow him to be brought within easy reach of them. And the Chief Secretary, with that respect for the Representatives of the people which I hope a General Election will teach him to express in a different fashion—said he never heard of a gaol being brought nearer to the counsel and solicitors of the prisoner. But I have never heard tell of 25 Members of Parliament being in gaol, or being pursued by warrants, or about to go to gaol, or just come out of gaol. I have never heard of it under any Coercion Acts which have been acted upon. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Chamberlain) says, we are to vote against this Amendment because the allegations it makes are not true, and because the conciliatory alternative is inefficient. The allegation with the money of persons making charges, bought without inquiry as to where they came from, with a careful shutting of the eyes which, in ordinary cases, would be evidence of conspiracy? Will the Government instruct the Attorney General to lay a criminal information against the Times for a most infamous libel, used for the purpose of distorting the policy of the House and inducing it to believe that some of its Members were bad men who should not be trusted? Will the Government give instructions that proceedings be taken against that interesting gentleman, Mr. Houston, who, it is clear, knew before he got into the witness-box that there was something suspicious about some part of Pigott's case? If Houston concealed this from the Attorney General he deserves indictment. I have too much respect for the Attorney General, from whom I have received some courtesies, to believe for a moment that he had had the faintest suspicion of the truth; the contrary would be so absolutely shocking, so thoroughly terrible, that the disgrace would cling to him for life. I acquit him thoroughly—no English gentleman, with such knowledge, could have put Houston in the box and allowed him to make a statement without putting some question which would give a clue to it. But then Houston ought to be prosecuted by the Government, if only to clear themselves and the Attorney General from complicity; and if this is not done I shall make it a charge against the Government on every platform in the country that they prosecuted Molloy because they thought it would damage the defendants, and refrained from prosecuting those who stood self-convicted, because they had been associated with themselves. Office may be held at too high a price. Past Conservative Leaders would not have hesitated for a moment to have washed their hands of this business. It is not as if it did not already concern the House, for it has been used at every election to influence voters. It is no question of land redemption or of solution of the agrarian problem that has been urged so much. It is that Mr. Parnell wrote the letters; he must have written them, or he would have taken legal proceedings before. Anything, in fact, was said that was likely to secure the support of the weak-backed Liberal

Unionist; and it had its effect at some of the elections. At this moment, when we are dealing with this question, are we to be told by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham that the right hon. Member for Central Bradford did not rise to the grandeur of the debate? Was the right hon. Gentleman present when the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh spoke? Grandeur of debate! The Journals of the House record the fact that 280 years ago payments were made to various officials, including the Serjeant and the "old fool" of the House. It does not appear when the Office ceased, but after hearing the speech of the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh I understood why there was no need to keep it up. The right hon. Member has spoken of the feeling of the country. I desire to speak with all respect of the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale for his ability and integrity. It is with grief and sorrow that Liberals break from him. But, at the noble Lord's last meeting with his constituents, the vote of confidence he received and returned thanks for was coupled with the unanimous expression of the desire of his supporters for an immediate and wide extension of local government to Ireland. And when two powerful statesmen like the noble Lord, and at some distance the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, keep a Government in power whose traditions are not the traditions of those who elected them, whose desires are not the desires of those who elected them, the responsibility is rather theirs, and the country looks to them. It looks to the noble Lord in the hope that even now the judgment, which in the traditions of this House and of all those who bore his name, has usually been associated with the effectuation of English liberty, might give to Ireland the possibility of it. To the noble Lord's Colleague we do not so look. We know there is no way to agreement and Radicals desire to see that right hon. Gentleman in the Tory Government to which he belongs. They have no desire and no wish for the return of the right hon. Gentleman; for when the hour comes they do not want that in the midst of a great battle, upon which the happiness of a nation depends, the lieutenant general shall have the chance in the thick of the fight of throwing away his sword and uniform, although he is for the principle, because he does not like the fit of the epaulettes or the fashion of the hilt.

*MR. M. W. MATTINSON (Liverpool, Walton): I cannot see how the personal attack made by the hon. Member for Northampton upon the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham can help us in the consideration of this Question. The hon. Member, too, has made impassioned references to the proceedings before the Special Commission. I am not altogether surprised at it, and as far as I am concerned, speaking only with reference to the only point on which a judgment can now be arrived at, I have no hesitation in admitting that the hon. Member for Cork has been greatly wronged, and, I believe, there is a universal desire on all sides of the House—on the Ministerial side as much as anywhere else—that those who have repeated a particular charge should make ample reparation of a full and large apology. But that does not affect the facts of the situation with which we have to deal. The personal integrity of the hon. Member for Cork has nothing whatever to do with the administration of Ireland; it has nothing whatever to do with the question whether we shall have two Parliaments and two Governments. I am not going to say that during the past two years, there may not have been some miscarriage of justice in Ireland, or that changed conditions may not justify a call for some modification of the policy of the Government; but I shall vote without hesitation against the amendment because, on a balance of considerations, I have no doubt that the present course of events amply justifies the action of the Executive. The broad fact that crime has been largely reduced, and substantial progress made in the reassertion of the law is the vindication of the Government and outweighs my mistakes which may have been made here and there. The charges against the Government appear to range themselves under three heads; first, arrest in the United Kingdom of Irish politicians; second, conviction in Ireland of Irish Members; and third, their treatment in prison. As to the first, it is clear that no injustice has been done to the individuals affected. The selection of time and place for arrests may have been stupid blunders, but that is a matter between the Chief Secretary and his supporters and not for hon. Gentlemen opposite. I believe that the action of the Government in this respect has been perfectly legal and just; but I question whether it was worth while to cause an Irish Member, against whom a warrant had been issued, and who was a fugitive from justice in this country, to be brought back into the jurisdiction of the proper tribunal in Ireland. Irish Members in this country might perhaps be a nuisance to the Government of the day, but while they are here they are not disturbing the peace of Ireland, and therefore the desired results, so far as the peace of Ireland is concerned, could be obtained by allowing them to remain in England without arresting them. A Member who has a warrant out against him will not cross the Channel, because he knows that by doing so he would have to walk straight into an open prison. It has been said that what it is possible to do in England is illegal in Ireland. My answer to that is, that you can with impunity do that in England which is harmful in Ireland. The policy of the Government should be to keep persons away from places where they do mischief. I refuse to support the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, because I hold that while there may be a question as to the absolute necessity of arresting Irish Members on English soil, yet in my judgment there is no question about the legality or the justice of it. The second point is that the convictions in Ireland have been unjust. Now, I say, with regard to the charge that harsh sentences have been inflicted under the Crimes Act, it is difficult to pass a sound opinion in any case unless we have all the facts before us. In the case of Mr. E. Harrington, the penalty strikes me as being very severe. It is the maximum penalty, and it is imposed for an offence which was not one of the most aggravated kind. My difficulty in the matter has not been removed by the suggestion which has been made that, but for a technical point raised, Mr. Harrington would have been convicted of something else. Why did he not appeal? And on this question generally I must say that, so far as I can make out, there never has been any real or substantial ground for the suggestion that the County Court Judges are not perfectly fair. I think that, taken as a whole, the Resident Magistrates do discharge their duties with impartiality and average intelligence. There is one other ground of accusation taken up by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. J. Morley), and that is in regard to the treatment of Irish prisoners. I hope hon. Gentlemen opposite will believe me when I say that I personally have felt it to be a most humiliating circumstance that hon. Members of the House of Commons, men of culture, should be subjected, in the ordinary course of the operation of the law, to the treatment of which we have heard so much. But I cannot find anything in that treatment on which to found a charge against the Government. Hon. Members say that political opponents ought to be treated differently from other persons. Perhaps they ought; but, after all, that is a question for consideration of Parliament and not of the Executive Government. I take it that when the Crimes Act was passed Parliament determined that, in certain circumstances, offenders should be subjected to certain treatment. I can quite understand the agitation for a change of the law, but I cannot understand why the present accusation should be brought against the Government. If the Chief Secretary alters the treatment of Mr. O'Brien and the other Members of Parliament now in gaol, he must, in common justice, alter the treatment of every one committed to prison for similar offences. Where would that land us? In the position that the Chief Secretary must make a wholesale dispensation in respect to Crimes Act prisoners. But at present you cannot make it a ground for definite accusation against the Chief Secretary that he will not take upon himself the dispensing with the punishment prescribed by a Statute passed so recently and after full consideration. While I say this, I desire to add that I think prison treatment, not only in Ireland, but in England also, is a matter which may fairly come under review. I cannot doubt that it would be quite possible to deal with political prisoners in a way which might not be unsatisfactory even to hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway opposite. There are only a very few words more which I wish to say. Some of the hon. Gentlemen sitting around me have tendered to the Government advice. The hon. Gentleman the Member for South Belfast (Mr. Johnston) has, for instance, suggested that the Crimes Act ought to be strengthened, and another hon. Friend of mine has suggested that the administration of the law in Ireland ought to be more rigorous—that prosecutions ought to be quicker. I should be sorry to administer the Crimes Act with greater stringency than it is administered at present. I have always understood it is a maxim in the administration of the criminal law that in proportion as crime diminishes, so the necessity for stringent punishment diminishes. The case which we make against the amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Morley) is that crime has largely diminished. If that be, as I believe it is, a true representation of the present condition of Ireland, it seems to me the logical outcome is this, that the time may soon come when it may be possible for the Government, consistent with the safeguarding of the interests committed to their care, to abate the rigour of their administration of the Crimes Act.

MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucester, Cirencester): I think the hon. Member for Liverpool deserves a word of acknowledgment from this side, because I think he has been the very first—at all events, the hon. Member very frankly and very honourably did express it—to express from that side a feeling of regret, and almost of repulsion, at the treatment hon. Members had had to undergo. I congratulate him upon that, and I live in the hope that he will be followed in his expression of opinion by many of the gentlemen of England before long. He also showed the first faint indications of distrust in the policy of the Government he supports. He could not help saying that he did not like the arrest of Irish Members in England, and he said he would be glad if it could be avoided in future. Well, for my part, I hope you will go on in that way. You cannot better play our game, or bring home more forcibly to the minds of English people what your Coercive Policy means. When an hon. Member like Mr. Carew goes down to an English constituency he wins all hearts by his frankness and fairness, staying in our houses he endears himself to us all. He addresses a crowded meeting, and then he is hurried off by the police. The next thing the people who know him and love him hear about him is that he has been knocked down, stripped, and treated like a common felon. This brings home to the English people and Scotch people appreciation of what Coercion is much better than we can. If we could bring home to the people what the policy pursued for so many hundred years by Liberal and Conservative Governments alike really is, there would be a very short end made of Coercion. Then the hon. Member for Liverpool could not quite swallow Mr. Harrington's sentence of six months' imprisonment with hard labour, and, as I understood him, considered it too severe for the offence he had committed. Nor did he like the prison treatment. I think gradually you will find, as the time for the General Election draws near, there will be a good deal of discontent of this sort expressed by hon. Members who represent large constituencies and come into touch with the people of the country. The hon. Member for Liverpool said we had no right on this treatment of prisoners to found an indictment against the Government. Well, but in the first place, the Chief Secretary, has entire control of prison discipline in Ireland. We are convinced that he has power of interference, and if we needed a convincing argument in support of that conviction he has himself supplied it, by his intervention in allowing priests to wear their own clothes in prison. You will not get many people to understand why there should be an intervention of this kind in favour of parsons and not of Members of Parliament. Well, for about the five hundredth time we are again face to face with our old own chief difficulty, the Government of Ireland. Disguise it how you like, the debate may take a particular line on one occasion, and a different line on another, but every year the same question crops up, and I suppose I may say that four-fifths of the House of Commons would agree as to what they are aiming at. We recognize all of us the national danger of a continuance of this state of things, and in different ways desire to bring about a different state of things. Nearly all of us long for the pacification of Ireland, it is only upon the methods of bringing about that desired result that we differ. I say nearly all, for there is a small section of bitter Orangemen whom I would not include among those who wish and desire such a settlement. I am comparatively a young Member of the House, but I have heard Orange Members talk of putting their heel on the necks of their countrymen. I have heard the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for North Armagh, who, I suppose, I must regard as a serious politician, say that he not only rejoiced in the Crimes Act being in perpetuity, but he would like to see imprisonment under it made perpetual too. With such men, holding such opinions, there can be no truce, no parley. I do not include them in my opinion that there is an earnest desire on both sides of the House to bring this long and bitter quarrel to an end. It does not much matter what you say or do, we are but servants of the people, and our masters have made up their minds. Coercion is doomed, and you know it! You may cling to it a little longer, but there is a great difference in Coercion now to what it used to be. Coercion in the old days was with no democracy, but now you have to satisfy a democracy who are masters, with votes, of the justice, wisdom, and righteousness of your policy; and you have not satisfied them. A straw will show which way the wind blows, and there are several straws to show it now. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham has given you a little Radicalism wrapped up in a certain sort of way, and I did not notice that you cheered him much. You do not quite trust that right hon. Gentleman; you cannot quite forget the doctrine of ransom; you remember his reference to those "who toil not, neither do they spin;" yet the right hon. Gentleman knows how to turn his barque to every favouring wind. In Scotland he warned you in pretty plain language that a policy of Coercion was a negative policy, and would not commend itself much longer to the people of this country. The uncontested election at Burnley is another straw that shows the direction of the wind, and you will have other indications before long. The country has made up its mind that Ministers who will not put an end to a policy of Coercion and try something of a different character must clear out and make room for those who will, and the country will express its meaning more clearly as time goes on. It is no question of detail, of this Bill or that, it is begging the question to raise the question of the old Home Rule Bill, whether it is alive, or dead, or in a state of suspended animation. The country cares nothing for points such as these, we are long past such. The supremacy of Parliament was the great thing, and I was one of those who voted—and I would do it again under similar circumstances—who voted against the old Home Rule Bill. The supremacy of Parliament, the absolute supremacy of the Parliament of the United Kingdom, is what I and others insisted upon. I think I can show by an extract from a speech of one of the ablest of the Liberal Unionists what a hollow sham this contention of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham is. The speech I refer to was delivered by the hon. and learned Member for Inverness on May 21st, 1886. He said—

“If this demand for the retention of the Irish Members were conceded”—

“it would be found by logical sequence to be a measure to which the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale nor any other Member on this side of the House would have any objection.”

The retention of Irish Members has been given up, and the opposition of the hon. Member for Inverness has not been pacified. Why? The House knows perfectly well that all we asked for in the way of criticism on the Home Rule Bill of 1886, all the reasonable requirements—certainly all the criticisms I made—have long since been given in to by the Leaders of the Liberal Party. But where are the pledges given in the election of 1886? [Cheers.] I am glad to hear that cheer, it enables me the more easily to allude to a personal matter, with which I hardly dared to trouble the House. In my absence the hon. and learned Member for West Ham, speaking of my conduct, said I had been returned pledged to support a Government I had not once voted for, and that I was returned without a contest because I stood as a Liberal Unionist. Well, my answer is two-fold. First of all to stand as a Liberal Unionist means to stand with the support of Tory votes, and if necessary to fight a brother Liberal. I put myself in the hands of the Liberal Three Hundred, and I was asked practically unanimously to fight their battles again. I said I was a foe to coercion of any sort or kind, and that I never would be a party to it. I said that in my election address. I said, while I objected to certain details in the Home Rule Bill, I was earnestly in favour of a large and generous measure of local self-government for Ireland. Ah! we all said that. I have stood on Liberal platforms to help brother-Liberals, and I do not think there was one of them who did not pledge himself to “a large and generous measure of local self-government for Ireland.” I can clear myself in another way. One of my chief supporters, the man who preceded me in the representation of the division, the right hon. Baronet the President of the Board of Trade, had the honour and courage to state publicly and quite recently that the Conservatives had no right to find fault with me for any breach of faith; for I had said and done merely what I said I would do in my election address. I am sorry to trouble the House with such a trifle as my consistency. The hon. and learned Member for West Ham was inaccurate and misinformed; probably he had been in communication with some of the Times' witnesses. The country is not asking about this Bill, or that. With all critics and doubters, with men who are throwing clouds of doubt in the eyes of the people by saying “What will a Liberal Government do; what do you mean by conciliation?” the country has no concern. The country says, “We are sick and tired, humiliated and disgusted with this perpetual recurrence to a policy of force, and are thoroughly resolved, if you will not devise the means of carrying out a policy of conciliation upon which we have set our hearts, you must make room for those who will.” It is a policy of negation, says your ally, and he warns you it will serve your purpose no longer. It is the happy state of good will and comradeship that has sprung up between the two peoples that has beaten you and confounded all your designs. It is this feeling of goodwill and comradeship which has sprung up between the two democracies makes the Union safe to-day; it is this feeling that makes the United Parliament supreme to-day; but not to this but the next Parliament do they look forward. You have not sought their confidence; this Parliament can claim no debt of gratitude. From Irish Members, certainly, you can claim no gratitude; but they look forward with hope, belief, and confidence to the next Parliament, and the electoral battle in which the two democracies will take part. The result of your administration is fatal to all your pretensions to govern Ireland with a strong hand. You have done your best to goad the people to madness; you have imprisoned their Leaders, and treated them with ignominy when you have got them in your power. You have stifled free meetings and free expression of opinion, and having driven them from the Constitutional method of expressing their complaints, what wonder that the complaints of the people find expression in language not so Constitutional? I do not wonder; it is astounding how little outrage there has been, it is marvellous considering that the people are not educated that they have exercised so much self-control. How have you treated them in Ireland? Your Prime Minister calls them Hottentots, and your Chief Secretary is never tired of talking of them as the descendants of the rebels of '98 and '48, and telegraphs to his police, "Do not hesitate to shoot," and delights in telling the Constabulary, all of whom read his words, "If you fire be sure you kill." This is what you have done in Ireland. This is the Christian administration of the Government of a Christian people! I tell you the Christian people of England and Scotland loathe and abominate what you have done in Ireland. With the aid of the Loyal and Patriotic Union you have flooded town, village, and hamlet with pictures of horror and hateful calumnies of the Irish leaders. You have flooded every town, village, and hamlet in the country with millions of pamphlets containing the most hateful calumnies of the Irish people and pictures of horrors. You have sent down paid lecturers to blacken the character of the Irish people and of their leading men. You have resorted to calumny of the basest description, to gross exaggeration, misrepresentation and abuse, and some of those who work with the Government, and are in tune with the Government, have not stopped short of forgery itself. Yes, the Loyal and Patriotic Union has done its level best to stifle the goodwill that was growing up between the two people and giving hope for the future. That has all gone off like water from a duck's back; but in spite of it a feeling of affection is growing up in the hearts of the Irish and English nations. You have blackened the characters of the Irish Members; you have distorted their motives and done your best to favour old bigotries, but it is all of no use. Macaulay, in his essay on Milton, says—

"We deplore the outrages which accompany revolutions. But the more violent the outrages the more assured we feel that the revolution was necessary. The violence of these outrages will always be proportioned to the ferocity and ignorance of the people, and the ferocity and ignorance of the people will be proportioned to the oppression and degradation under which they have been accustomed to live."

[A laugh.] The Tories, the less educated of them, laughed at Macaulay at that time. The better educated of the Tories of this day do not, as a rule, laugh at Lord Macaulay now. Lord Macaulay expresses the feeling of the English people, and that is why you fail to arouse them by your tales of outrage and crime. They are a liberty-loving people, and they believe that liberty is far better than restraint. When you speak of law and order they reply, "Your law was obtained under false pretences; you had no mandate from us to make such a law. You told us that you were opposed to Coercion, and the moment we entrusted you with power to make law, you proposed Coercion." That is one of the answers to the argument of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham. At every Unionist platform we were told it was a calumny to say that there were only two alternatives—Home Rule or Coercion. There was a third; but the right hon. Gentleman turning to the Irish Members said, "you have made the third course impossible." They took to Coercion very quickly, like a duck taking to water. That is my first reply to the right hon.

Gentleman. The second is that you passed this law in the teeth of the protests of three of the four component parts of the Empire. The Scotch people said they would not have it; the Welsh and Irish also resisted it, and you passed it by the clôture. You passed it, denying to afford a reasonable time to discuss it, and you passed it even then under the falsest of pretences. There is a speech of the Chief Secretary to be found in Hansard in which the right hon. Gentleman said :—

“ They (the Government) always denied that it was intended by the Bill to interfere with the relations of landlord and tenant. This was a Bill to put down crime. It was not conflicts between landlord and tenant in which they desired to interfere ; it was not combinations which they desired to crush, but it was crime which would not be tolerated in any other country on earth, and which ought not to be tolerated in Ireland.”

Having got it under these pretences you have used it to put down combinations, and for no other purpose than to assist the landlord in his quarrels with his tenants. That was your position at the time of the General Election (Ministerial cries of “No”). If it was not, why do you now object to face the people. They tell you, lastly, that respect and reverence for law depends on what the moral weight of the law itself is. The law-breakers of the world have many of them been the heroes of the world. John Brown was hanged legally; Hampden, Pim, Cromwell would have been living if they had not been successful; and the same may be said of Garibaldi, who went sword in hand to Naples; Magguire and Kossuth [An Hon. MEMBER: Kossuth was not successful]. No, he had to take refuge in free England; your fathers cropped the ears of dissenters quite legally; my grandfather was imprisoned for many years in Newgate gaol, quite legally, for preaching a sermon; at present you only clip the hair and moustache of your opponents. You are getting ashamed of the old method, and your children will be ashamed of your method as you are of that of your ancestors. The prisons of the world are now objects of curiosity. If you go to Rome the first thing you go to see is the prison in which Peter and Paul were imprisoned; if you go to Bedford your first visit is paid to the prison in which John Bunyan was confined; so also at Southampton where

Isaac Watts was put. I do not defend every act that has been done in Ireland. I have never failed to say that I cannot agree with every doctrine of the Plan of Campaign, but I maintain that the Plan of Campaign was the result of your policy. You drove the Irish people from Constitutional usages into illegal courses, and then followed the old system of repression, punishment, and brutality. But, in spite of all this, there is a brighter prospect just now. It is because the people of the two countries love each other and trust each other; it is because the people have listened to Ireland's sons and believe their story, and believe in their future, that I, for one, shall vote for the amendment of my right hon. Friend.

MR. HOWORTH (Salford, S.): The speech of the Hon. Member who has just addressed the House is chiefly interesting from his references to the action of Members on this side of the House. He says that he has some difficulty in reconciling their opinions as avowed before the constituents with their practices in this House. I myself have been constrained to rise owing to the challenge which was thrown out yesterday by the hon. Member for East Northamptonshire (Mr. Channing) as to a recent incident in Lancashire; but nothing had happened in the history of this movement which had brought more discredit and ridicule upon it in the minds of the working classes than that incident. I am sure that the House will desire to get as far away as possible from the recrimination which formed the staple of the speech of the hon. Member who has just sat down. The Amendment of the right hon. Member for Newcastle seems to me to raise a false and illogical issue. It is a perfectly arguable point, no doubt, that the Act has operated harshly and severely on certain men; but I contend that it is not an arguable position to maintain in the House of Commons that the duty of the Executive is to interfere with the administration of the Crimes Act or of any other Act in order that certain classes of offenders should be given a different treatment from certain other classes. To give the Executive power to discriminate offenders would be to resort to the practices of the middle ages. How could Parliament prevent the Chief Secretary for Ireland under such conditions from treating offenders according to his private preferences and political views? To ask the House to consent to such a state of things is to ask it to consent to a very great offence against all legal and political principles. The Executive in Ireland, so far as the decisions of the Irish Courts are concerned, are in precisely the same position as the Executive in England; the treatment of prisoners is governed by Statute and if the Executive chooses to interfere with the decisions of the Courts of law, it unquestionably commits a breach of the law, and must do so at its own peril. I understand that during the late Administration there were two cases in which the Home Secretary did feel it his duty to interfere with the functions of the Prisons Board and the discipline of the prisons in favour of particular persons, but I believe myself that such action was entirely contrary to law, and that the Home Secretary did these acts at his own peril. It is said that the Irish Courts of Law themselves have interpreted the Statute in an unnecessarily cruel manner, and in a way that was never contemplated by Parliament, but I maintain that it is impossible to review the decisions of the Courts, unless you have the witnesses and the evidence before you. How is it possible for this House at any time to constitute itself into a Court of Justice? There is a proper appeal in all cases, and I think it is a great pity that when a Bill was passing through the House, one or two Amendments suggested from the opposite benches were not adopted. I think their adoption would have made a great difference in the sentimental grievance which is now alleged. It would have been a great improvement in the legal administration of justice in Ireland if the Resident Magistrates had been appointed during good behaviour, so as to avert the least suspicion of their being at the mercy of the Executive. Further, there might with advantage have been a rota of these magistrates, so that there would not have been always particular men to try particular cases in particular districts. Again, as to the question whether the victims of the Crimes Act have been treated by the prison officials with unusual and undeserved cruelty, much has been said on this subject, which is more a form of buffoonery than of serious argument. It is said, for instance, that for persons convicted of certain offences to be compelled to travel third class instead of first class is a grievous indignity. I myself always travel third class, and if those who make these complaints themselves travelled third class more frequently they would know the feelings of the British democracy better than they do. Mr. Rider Haggard, in his novel, "King Solomon's Mines," mentions a party who were interrupted by savages whilst one of the party was shaving, and had just half completed that operation. As the savages had never before seen a man with hair on only one side of the face, they deemed him to be a god and began to worship him. The difficulty of the position was that as the man had been recognised as a god by the fact that he had hair on one side of his face, he was obliged to go about amongst them ever after carefully shaved on one side only. It seems to me that this is an extremely opposite comparison to make. However much hon. Gentleman may shout "hear, hear!" the working men of Lancashire, many of whom take the same view of politics that they do, only laugh and ridicule the hero whose heroism depends on a circumstance of that kind. Having said this much, it seems to me that one has gone over the three different divisions, at all events of the difficulty as presented by my right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle. In the first place, the question of whether the Executive is justified or not in interfering with the course of justice, by apportioning penalties according to its own individual whim and fancy and not according to the rigid law, I think most Members will agree with me that a more dangerous position was never put before an assembly of politicians. In the next place, it is an equally dangerous position to maintain that this House is either a fit or a competent tribunal to revise the decisions of Irish Courts of Justice whether humble or superior. Having provided the proper machinery to prevent injustice I think they ought to abide by it. I qualify that by saying that there are some amendments which I should have liked to have seen incorporated in the Crimes Act, and, as far as I myself am concerned, it would have been a great pleasure to me to have voted for such Amendments if they had been presented to the House, because I feel that they would have been reasonable. In the third place. I cannot help thinking that when we test those cases of cruelty by the facts that we presented they are reduced to such ridiculous proportions that it is really monstrous that a great Party in the State should put them forward as grounds of grievance. I am tired and weary of this perpetual application to Ireland of a law which I feel to be necessary if the State and society are to be held together, and I wish and hope that the time may come, very speedily, when we may devote ourselves if possible to something rather more in accordance with our hopes and our ambitions. I should very much like to see, at a time not very far off, Ireland left to decide a great number of local questions such as we see remitted in this country to different localities. It would, I feel, be a great advantage if we could put aside some of those angry recriminations and approach the problem along more rational lines. Whether that comes about now or later on, I feel most certain that one thing we must maintain at all hazards, and that is the law, and whether we maintain it here or it is maintained from a Parliament in Dublin society can not exist, but will really be planted upon a basis of anarchy unless this prime factor is maintained at all hazards. It is because I feel that this is neither an English nor an Irish question, but one upon which all politicians should share the same feeling, that I shall vote with the greatest possible confidence against the Amendment of my right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle, which raises issues which are utterly false and utterly misleading.

MR. REID (Dumfries, W.): I feel no doubt that the hon. Gentleman the Member for Salford has spoken with the very best intentions, and that the policy which has been afflicting Ireland and distressing this country must be distasteful to him. But the hon. Gentleman has certainly been somewhat backward in his action on this matter, because when some of the Amendments which he himself has said he should like to see introduced into the Coercion Act as at present administered were proposed, he did not vote in favour of them.

MR. HOWARTH: The Amendments to which I refer were cut out entirely without debate.

MR. REID: They were cut out in consequence of a system of closure far more drastic than any ever proposed by a Liberal Government, and that closure was supported by the hon. Member himself. I trust the hon. Member now recognises the serious consequences arising from that Act. I am astonished that the Chief Secretary, than whom there is no man endowed with more literary grace and probably literary attainments in the House, should go down to Glasgow and Dublin and speak in the tone and the spirit that he has adopted about brother Members of the House placed in prison. If the right hon. Gentleman did not feel it himself, from his own instinct, when he dwelt upon the severity of the language with which he spoke of Mr. Mandeville after that gentleman's decease, no words of mine can convey the feeling. But I am satisfied that when the passion of this argument and controversy has a little gone by, the right hon. Gentleman himself will regret, and I think he will be ashamed of the tone in which he has spoken. I wish to say a few words in regard to the very remarkable speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham. I presume that he represents the Liberal Unionist Party, and I think after the peculiar conduct and position of Members of that Party we are entitled to know whether he does represent the opinions of the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale, or whether we have two leaders of the Liberal Unionist or dissentient Liberal Party—the one who makes speeches of a quasi-Radical kind in this House, and the other who enters into private negotiations with the Government and aids and abets them in the most Tory part of their proceedings. When the charge is made that one integral part of the United Kingdom is administered by unjust laws, unjustly applied, that men by the score are sent to prison without fair trial, and also that when they are in prison they are subjected to treatment unworthy of a civilized nation, the right hon. Gentleman appears to think that that is a matter of no importance. Without discussing whether it is true or not, I think we can gauge the true depth of the Liberalism of the right hon. Gentleman. He says we may be of opinion that the Government is grossly abusing its powers; that the Executive is in dangerous contact with the judicial officers; and that injustice is thereby wrought; and yet that is no ground, if it only applies to Ireland, for turning the Government out of Office; it is only a ground for a Committee to make inquiry into particular cases. The Solicitor General for Ireland has congratulated the House that no one makes charges against the Resident Magistrates now. Well, no one has made charges against any class so much as Resident Magistrates. We say they are persons of no capacity whatever—half-pay officers, briefless barristers, and promoted policemen; that they have duties to discharge which are not in England entrusted even to the Judges of the highest Courts; that their relations to the Executive Government are of a most remarkable character; and that they are executive as well as judicial officers. The Resident Magistrates are incompetent to discharge their duties, but the Chief Secretary speaks of them as if they were men inspired. The right hon. Gentleman has succeeded in getting for £400 a year men of extraordinary ability and judgment to discharge duties which are only intrusted to English Judges of the highest rank. How do those men act? I admit that it is difficult in this House to take case by case. The Resident Magistrates are as wise as serpents. They take care to have a fragment of evidence on one point, but to inflict punishment for offences which have not been proved. It is observed that they are not anxious to give the right of appeal; they will not state a case; they show the worst feature of a Judge in desiring that his decision shall escape review. They administer ferocious punishments, as is shown in the case of Mr. Harrington. Does any hon. Member consider that six months' hard labour is a proper punishment for publishing proceedings of a suppressed branch of the National League? Even the right hon. Member for West Birmingham is unable to defend that proceeding, and I am sure that the hon. Member for Salford will not defend it. How is the sentence defended by the Chief Secretary? The right hon. Gentleman says it is true that Mr. Harrington was guilty of that offence, but that everybody knows perfectly well that he has been guilty of the other offence of delivering a speech, and the Chief Secretary's defence of the Resident Magistrates is, that though the punishment might be too great for the offence which was committed, yet there was another offence not proved to have been committed, and in that view the punishment was not excessive.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am afraid the hon. and learned Gentleman did not do me the honour to listen to my speech. I never made any assertion so extravagant or absurd.

MR. REID: I am obliged to the right hon. Gentleman for his courtesy—for the epithets he makes use of. He attributes to me the making of absurd statements.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I did not attribute any extravagant or absurd statement to the hon. and learned Gentleman. I merely say that I did not say anything so extravagant or absurd.

MR. REID: Then I withdraw my remark. I must have misunderstood the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. I promise to read the speech in the Times again, in order to see whether or not I have made a mistake. The people of Ireland believe that the whole of this procedure is a farce; that a trial is a mockery; that conviction is practically certain; and it is because of the general discredit which attaches to the sentences and the judgments of the Resident Magistrates that they impugn the administration of justice in Ireland. Then there is the question of jury-packing. Say there are 72 men on the panel. The prisoner may challenge six and the Crown six. Then the officer proceeds to call juror after juror until 12 men can enter the box. By the exercise of a right founded on an old Statute never used in England, the Crown can order men to "stand by;" and by this means, not of selection, but of exhaustion, they can put 12 men into the jury box for the purpose of trying the prisoner. That is the system of jury-packing, and that system exists in Ireland at present; and I defy the Government to deny it. The system is in force in nearly all the agrarian and political cases, and the result is that if trial before a Resident Magistrate is a farce, trial, before a jury is a still greater farce; it is a gross fraud on the administration of justice. If the Government deny this, then there is a short and sharp method of meeting it. I am prepared to apply for a Committee to investigate my statement, and, if it is found that I am wrong, to express my regret to the House. Is such a system not a scandal and a disgrace, and do hon. Members opposite think that it is a healthy feature in any Government? Does the hon. Member for Salford believe that Lancashire men would respect, or ought to respect, the law, or should be called upon to obey it, if it were administered in such a manner to them? But what is the object of all these things? It is the most mercenary oppression that has ever existed. There has been in the history of Ireland oppression for divers purposes. We know what happened in the rebellion of 1798 and in other rebellions; but I am not aware that there has been any oppression in Ireland so utterly degraded as this oppression, because it is for the purpose of enabling landlords to get by their own combinations money out of the pockets of their tenants which in equity they ought not to have, and to use the Criminal Law in order to deprive the tenants of the only means they have of resisting those combinations. In 1885 the right hon. Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) came forward with a programme which has been condemned by many as too extreme. No one followed the right hon. Gentleman more heartily than I did at that time. Indeed, I lost my seat in consequence, and no one looked forward more eagerly than I to see the right hon. Gentleman lead the rival Party. But what shall I say now? The right hon. Gentleman has driven away thousands upon thousands of men who were earnest and sincere in following the flag which he unfurled at that time. The right hon. Gentleman has allied himself with the Party and policy of Coercion, which he has helped to carry out with relentless severity. No man in the history of the last three or four years comes worse out of this business than the right hon. Gentleman. But there are other Members of the Liberal Unionist Party to consider. The Chairman of Committees (Mr. Courtney), in answer to a speech made by the hon.

Mr. Reid

Member for the Rushcliffe Division of Nottingham (Mr. J. E. Ellis), spoke of the imperfections of the agents of the Government in Ireland. Did the right hon. Gentleman mean the Resident Magistrates or the police? Which did he mean? It is not worthy of a man in his position, if he believes there are defects in the Government of Ireland, not to come forward and assist us. It is not worthy of a man of the great position of the right hon. Gentleman in this House, when he believes there are imperfections in the agents of the Government, not to come forward and assist in endeavouring to find out where they have done wrong. If the Liberal Unionists are to maintain the Union, or to do anything else that is good, it is not by allowing themselves to become the servants out of livery of Her Majesty's Government that they will succeed. Coming to the second part of the Amendment, I am resolutely opposed to pledging British credit for the benefit of the Irish landlords, who have been allowed for a long time to plunder the Irish people, and whom I desire to prevent from plundering the English and Scotch people. The Irish landlords have made their bed and they must lie on it. If I had my will, I should wish to see an Irish Parliament dealing with the Land Question themselves; but I would not object to a settlement of the Irish Land Question being made by this House, if desired, provided British credit is not pledged for the purpose. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham demanded the plan of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian for establishing Home Rule. That plan has been given substantially already; its outline and principles are thoroughly well-known. But before the time comes for a Dissolution it is essential that further particulars should be given on some points; but unless a Dissolution is nearer at hand than it is admitted to be by hon. gentlemen opposite, I, for one, will not press the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian or his Colleagues to come forward with a plan against their will, because I do not wish to withdraw any part of the attention now being paid to the gross misgovernment of Ireland. If, however, Her Majesty's Ministers are prepared to grant a Dissolution, I will do my best to urge on the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian the propriety of bringing forward a detailed plan. Will the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham concede the propriety of consulting the hon. Member for Cork and his Friends in regard to the framing of any such measure? If he will, there is no difference in the position which the right hon. Gentleman takes up and ours. I hope the Home Secretary, who will probably speak soon, will tell us what the Government think of the policy propounded by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham. Is there any sincerity in that move? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham made a speech that was intended, of course, to catch votes if he could get them, and to divert the attention of the country from the present system of government in Ireland; and, I ask, are the Government prepared to make any approach to the views of that right hon. Gentleman, or are they to go on in the course of Coercion? Surely they could not go on spending the resources of the Empire in order to allow injustice to be done by the Clanricardes, the Olpherts, and the Vandeleurs in Ireland. That is the meaning of the policy now pursued. I believe that hon. Gentlemen opposite themselves feel that that policy could not be continued indefinitely. They are working the Constitution at high pressure, and there is danger in protracting this heated controversy. I submit it is not a healthy thing that a man like Mr. O'Brien, who was condemned by the law, should go to large meetings in England and Scotland and be received with acclamation and delight. But the law has been brought into popular contempt in Ireland, and the contamination may extend to England. We cannot be sure that we shall always be at peace; and if we continue this policy of exasperation we cannot tell how long we shall have the Members from Ireland, who I believe are now willing to take a moderate and statesmanlike view of this question, in their present frame of mind. Confident as the Liberal Party are of their triumph at the next General Election, it would be more satisfactory to them and the country if this great controversy could be closed by a national settlement. The time is opportune, and the work is pressing. Is there not virtue and wisdom enough in this great Assembly to effect such a settlement?

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): The hon. Member for East Mayo said the other night that boycotted farms in Ireland were not being taken. I wish to challenge that assertion. I have been, during the last six weeks, on ten Plan of Campaign estates. Only a fortnight ago I walked over 13 boycotted holdings on one estate which had been taken by independent men from other counties. I counted the head of cattle on each farm; I saw the leases; I investigated the previous tenancies of the men; and I say that, although the hon. Member for Mayo knows a great deal, he does not know everything, and the House had better take with a pinch of salt everything that comes from that quarter as well as from the Freeman's Journal.

An hon. MEMBER: What was the estate?

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: It was the Coolgreany Estate. The farms have been taken by responsible tenants.

An hon. MEMBER: By emergency men?

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: No; an emergency man has not 50 head of cattle. I also found on that estate 12 men who had retained possession of their farms, and who absolutely refused to join the Plan of Campaign. They had a right to do this. Because they dared to be honest men, because they claimed the right to make their own bargains with their landlord, these men found the greatest difficulty in selling their cattle at fairs, in getting provisions, and in maintaining the ordinary decencies of life. When we see how you treat these men, we know how you would treat us. Let those who are going to govern Ireland learn, first of all, to govern their own passions. Talk of tyranny and terrorism!—on one Campaign estate I had put into my hand three stamped legal documents, signed by the tenant, authorizing the landlord to distrain, the rent being paid all the while, and the documents were to protect the landlord from any subsequent action. [A VOICE: Where was this?] On the Lewis estate. I state nothing that I have not investigated to the bottom. In one case a man had actually asked to be evicted after he had paid his rent, and he asked that a good force of "peelers" should be sent, and that he should be allowed to defend himself against them. [Laughter.] Laughter is no answer to facts; he laughs best who laughs last. On that and on other estates he visited there was a system of terrorism which Home Rule Members support, because they condemned the only machinery for dealing with it. Mr. O'Brien in the speech for which he was condemned said that the presence of a land-grabber was equal to an epidemic of yellow fever, and asked the people not to rest until they had stamped out the plague. How have peasants acted on such advice in the past? In Kerry, the other day, I stood on the threshold of a man who wanted to emigrate, who consulted the agent about the sale of his tenant-right, failed to come to terms with his next neighbour, and finally sold to a man named Cornelius Murphy, who was denounced as a land-grabber, and within a few months was shot dead in his own house. This (addressing the Home Rulers) is what you are supporting. You support it because you denounce the only machinery that can cope with it. Take the case of Forhan, who took a boycotted farm and who was on his way from Tralee market with labourers when he was shot dead on the high road, and peasants who were near would not render assistance. A dozen cases could be given to show what peasants understand by the stamping-out process; and the hon. Member (Mr. O'Brien) who, knowing this, recommended it, was guilty of a criminal act, and deserved to be treated as a criminal. [Mr. MORLEY: Why did they wait four months?] That is the business of the Executive Government. [A VOICE: "What were the dates of the murders?"] The first, the 28th of January, 1888; the second, the 20th of February, 1887, and that of Fitzmaurice in 1888, two days after the delivery of a speech denouncing land-grabbers by Mr. Davitt, within 20 miles of the spot. There is no use in comparing these things with Primrose League actions. Primrose Leaguers never used such language about dissenting shopkeepers; if they did, they could be prosecuted under the ordinary law. Lord Spencer was brought to book the other day, when he was challenged to give a single instance, and could not.

Mr. T. W. Russell

As foul charges as were now brought against the Government were once brought against Lord Spencer and the right hon. Member for the Bridgeton Division. They were charged with hanging an innocent man in Miles Joyce. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir George Trevelyan) was virtuous. He could forget and forgive; smitten on one cheek he turned the other; and hated then, he was despised now. If the charges were wrong in 1882-3, what proof was there that they are right now? If they were not to be believed then, why should they be credited now? This proposed Vote of Censure was largely founded on the reports of the Freeman's Journal, which, to my own knowledge, has reduced lying to a fine art, and which has more actions hanging over it for lying than all the newspapers in the United Kingdom. I am sorry the case of Father M'Fadden has been referred to at all, because it is before the Courts; but if Father M'Fadden, had acted like a good citizen—

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I rise to order. I ask whether the hon. Member is justified in pronouncing an opinion on the conduct of Father M'Fadden, who is at present under trial, and whether former allusions had not reference solely to the manner in which the Government have treated Father M'Fadden.

MR. SPEAKER: It is not in my province to decide; the matter is one which rests entirely in the discretion of the hon. Member.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: The hon. Member for East Mayo has charged the Government with murder. If Father M'Fadden had acted the part of a good citizen, if he had obeyed the summons of the Court, no warrant would have been necessary, and Inspector Martin might have been alive to-day. Therefore Father M'Fadden, whatever he was legally, was morally responsible for the murder. I was present at the Unionist banquet at Dublin, and I was not aware of any objection to the publication of the names of the company. It is said that there were roars of laughter at the story of Mr. O'Brien's sufferings. I affirm there was nothing of the kind. I am not quite sure whether roars of laughter were not inserted by the Freeman's Journal.

MR. DILLON: The same report appeared in the Times, the Dublin Daily

Express, and all other papers, and it was a report that was furnished officially, no newspaper reporters being present.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: The laughter was provoked by the Chief Secretary's account of the manner in which the Lord Mayor of Dublin made a "holy show" of himself by sending his two ambassadors to the Castle at 2 a.m., and crediting the story of the Chief Secretary's coming down in his shirt with a star on his breast.

MR. SEXTON: My telegram was despatched at 11 o'clock and his letter at 1 o'clock, and the roars of laughter occurred long before that.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I and my friends claim to laugh even at the Lord Mayor of Dublin. We claim the right to laugh at what we think fit, even though it concerns Mr. O'Brien, and though attempts may be made to intimidate us, as attempts have been made to intimidate and ruin shopkeepers who refused to put up their shutters out of sympathy for Mr. O'Brien. This is an instance of the liberty that hon. Members believe in. Until they show a little more toleration towards those who differ from them, they ought not to claim self-government. As to the treatment of Mr. O'Brien, I would be quite willing to vote for any Bill providing that imprisonment for all political offences, as these are termed—those of the dupes who commit the crimes as well as those who instigate them—should be without hard labour, or as first-class misdemeanants. But if the law is to be altered, let it be altered on some general principle. It is a mistake to suppose that there are only two classes of offences—the purely political and those of the thief and the gaol bird. There is, for instance, the man who violates the secrecy of the ballot; he is liable to six months' hard labour, and you make him consort with criminals, and you dress him as one. If the law is to be altered, let it be done thoroughly, and not merely for Members of Parliament. The hon. Member for East Mayo stated the other night that he hated crime and did his best to put it down. I ask him this question: Who paid for the defence of the murderers of Huddy?

MR. T. M. HEALY: Ask Webster.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: You talk of your hatred of crime, yet when one of the foulest murders ever perpetrated in Ireland comes to be tried by jury whose verdict you never yet questioned, you pay for the defence of the murderers.

MR. JOHN DILLON: We pay for the defence of the murderers? I say that is a foul lie.

*MR. SPEAKER: No doubt the language of the hon. Member, and especially the way in which it was addressed—was very irritating; but I cannot allow the word "lie" to pass in this House, and I hope hon. Gentlemen will refrain from these personalities, which are derogatory to the dignity of the House.

MR. DILLON: I unhesitatingly withdraw, Mr. Speaker; but I do say the provocation was intense.

*MR. RUSSELL: I will put it in this way—— (Cries of "Withdraw") If hon. Members will listen to me, I will explain I cannot withdraw that which I know to be true.

MR. DILLON: Is that fair play, Mr. Speaker? I put it to you, Sir, when he made this charge he pointed to me.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: No I did not.

MR. DILLON: He said the hon. Member for East Mayo said he hated crime, and then he pointed at me and said, "Yet you pay for the defence of these murderers."

*MR. SPEAKER: That is the reason that I said I considered the remarks of the hon. Member to be of an irritating character. I think the hon. Member had better pass away from this matter.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I never intended to refer to the hon. Gentleman the Member for East Mayo personally as having had anything to do with the defence of these men. I say that most unhesitatingly.

MR. O'HANLON, who was sitting in one of the side Galleries: Who, then, did you refer to?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, Order!

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I now come to the question of crime on the Kenmare Estate. At the end of October last year, crime had been reduced almost to a vanishing point. In September in fact there was none at all. But then the Plan of Campaign was inaugurated on the Kenmare Estate and simultaneously crime burst out again and moonlighting and intimidation became rife. You may denounce crime but unquestionably it follows wherever the Plan of Campaign is started.

AN HON. MEMBER: Yes, Pigott for instance.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Don't mention Pigott to me. I have no more to do with him than you have.

MR. W. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I rise to say that the hon. Member who interrupted from the gallery has come down and seated himself behind the hon. Member speaking, and is interrupting him.

[At this point there was considerable disturbance behind the hon. Member for South Tyrone.]

MR. O'HANLON (Cavan, E.): I want this gentleman to apologize. I will just give him a minute to think, and if he does not apologize I will—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. H. J. WILSON (York W.R., Holmfirth): I distinctly saw the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for South East Durham personally assault the Member for East Cavan.

*MR. SPEAKER: Will the hon. Baronet explain?

SIR H. HAVELOCK-ALLAN: With the greatest pleasure. I recognized by chance the hon. Member who is now sitting next me as the hon. Member who made that irregular interruption in the Gallery just now. I had not the slightest intention of bringing myself into personal collision with the hon. Gentleman; that is a thing I should most studiously avoid; but I happened by accident when passing him to come into contact with him, and I regret having done so.

MR. O'HANLON: The hon. and gallant Gentleman—as I suppose I am bound to call him—comes over and throws himself on me, and then he offers this as an apology. It is not one, and if he does not apologize, I will not give him much time.

*MR. SPEAKER: I hope the hon. and gallant Gentleman will apologize to the hon. Member. I must say I did observe what apparently was the hon. and gallant Gentleman's throwing himself on the hon. Member. It is most improper, and the hon. and gallant Gentleman must apologize.

SIR H. HAVELOCK-ALLAN: If I have in the slightest degree—

*MR. SPEAKER: I did observe what passed. Nothing could be more improper. The best course for the hon. and gallant Gentleman to take is to apologize.

SIR H. HAVELOCK-ALLAN: For a long course of years, Sir, it has been my pride to observe your ruling with the utmost respect. I can assure you that it is a matter of extreme regret to me, and nothing was further from my intention than to hurt the feelings of the hon. Gentleman. I should be loth indeed to come into contact with him.

MR. O'HANLON: Mr. Speaker, I beg your pardon again, Sir. He says I had better get out of this.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! Really, I hope I may appeal to hon. Members on both sides of the House, and I do appeal to them with confidence, to set their faces against these interruptions. They are most unseemly, and give pain to everybody who has at heart the dignity of the House. I call upon the hon. Member to continue his speech.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: The real fact is that the area of disturbance in Ireland is exceedingly limited. Everywhere I went I perceived evidences of the improved state of things. Boycotting was diminishing, and all the scenes at the arrest and trial of certain persons were part of a carefully prepared drama. The grievances of Ireland must, indeed, be few when one of the most prominent put forward was that Mr. O'Brien was made to travel second instead of first class. I heard the speech delivered by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, and I believed everything that the right hon. Gentleman says about the land question. [A laugh.] It is very easy to laugh, no doubt, and by way of qualifying for an Irish Parliament to turn that House into a Cagers'-hall. The Land Question was at the root of this whole Irish business, and if we once removed it from the troubled arena of Irish politics, we shall remove the one question which prevents every question from being fairly approached and settled. I shall vote against the Amendment, because no attempt has been made to prove the first part of it, and because the second part had not been touched.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): The House will be very glad to see that the health of the hon. Gentleman has been so completely restored by his recent excursion to Ireland, at the expense of the Times.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: These excursions were not undertaken at the expense of the Times?

MR. T. M. HEALY: At the expense of the Loyal and Patriotic Union.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Nor at the expense of the Loyal and Patriotic Union?

MR. T. M. HEALY: I must beg that the hon. Gentleman will not turn this House into a Coger's-hall. We are all glad that the hon. Member's health has been so much restored as to enable him to deliver himself with so much energy. But the hon. Gentleman labours under great disabilities, for all the cases which he has trotted out to harrow the feelings of the House are the cases which have already been dealt with at the Times Commission; and as the hon. Member trotted them out one by one, I noticed a sickly smile steal over the face of the Attorney General. I am surprised that the hon. Member could not even wait for the Report of the Judges; but as the Report of the Judges must in this case be that it was a case, and the case of fraud be of a certain character, I can understand the natural anxiety of the hon. Member to be a little in advance of the Report. I will now ask the House to judge of the character of the statements made by the hon. Gentleman. It was stated by him that evicted farms on the Coolgreany estates had been taken, that the tenants had cattle, and that he had seen their leases. But the men who were supposed to be tenants were notorious emergency men who killed Kinsella, and who had never received a day's punishment for the murder. These were the men who were installed on the estate, and assisted by the Loyal and Patriotic Union. This is the contemptible kind of stuff which the House is asked to swallow. I am surprised the hon. Gentleman manages to work himself up into such a passion; why, he is not even an Irishman. The hon. Gentleman says that he found the Plan of Campaign everywhere to be a deadly and blighting curse. But why did he write to the Times to suggest that the head rack-renter, Lord Clanricarde, should be compulsorily expropriated? That was the first, as it was the chief, estate on which the Plan of Campaign was started, yet, regardless of that fact, the hon. Member went down to Portumna and Loughrea and passed over the estate with the police agent, and his suggestion is that, because the Marchioness of Clanricarde was not suitably buried, Lord Clanricarde's estate should be expropriated. The hon. Gentleman also visited the Delmege estate. What did he say to the tenants there? Did he not say to the tenants on that estate that they need not be a bit afraid, and that they were terribly rack-rented? [Mr. T. W. RUSSELL indicated that that was so.] And, according to the information which he had from two of the tenants, the hon. Member told them that they need not fear eviction, as he would take care that neither soldiers nor police were granted for such a purpose. I am astonished that the hon. Gentleman, being a Scotchman, should get up steam so rapidly, and work himself into a passion on behalf of a country with which he has nothing to do, except that he owns an hotel in it. He has stated that the Freeman's Journal, which he says is the most libellous paper in existence, interpolated the roars of laughter in its report of the speech of the Chief Secretary for Ireland which was delivered at the banquet in Dublin; and he remarked that that paper had had more actions against it than any other paper in the kingdom. I thought that the Times enjoyed that forensic distinction. But why are libel actions brought against the Freeman's Journal? Every one of them is brought by a Resident Magistrate, and the venue is always laid in Belfast, although the hon. Gentleman has talked about the purity of the jurors of the City of Dublin; and when the Freeman's Journal applied to have the venue changed, they went out of the frying-pan into Lord Ashbourne, and that distinguished Member of the Cabinet, who sat in the Court of Appeal, promptly disallowed the appeal. These libel actions are brought for reports and public meetings printed in that Journal, and you lay the venue in Belfast in order to get damages. Now, as to the charge that the Freeman's Journal has interpolated "laughter" in the report of the speech of the Chief Secretary at the banquet in Dublin, I have got a copy of the pamphlet issued, and I have also a copy of the Times which contained a report of the speech. It is said that the Government have on their side all the wealth, education, culture, and courage of Ireland, and that their supporters are only anxious to lead thousands of stalwart men against the Nationalists. But what is the case? These men of wealth, and education, and culture, and courage dared not have it known that they were at the banquet to the Chief Secretary. No; you won't meet us in the open. The Times report is identical with that in every newspaper. I ask this House, which is a fair assembly, to judge between my statement and that of the hon. Gentleman who last spoke. The Chief Secretary said—

"I desire not to descend into the squalid details of the controversy which are forced on the Irish Secretary only too often by the tactics of those with whom he has to deal [laughter and cheers]. The last thing I desire to do is to add any to the very many words I have had to say with regard to Mr. William O'Brien [laughter]."

"Laughter" you see at the mere mention of the name of Mr. O'Brien—it was so funny. Why, the guests bubbled up with laughter like champagne bubbles rise in a bottle just opened. Then the right hon. Gentleman said—

"The last thing I desired to do was to add another word to the many words I have had to say with regard to Mr. O'Brien [laughter] and Mr. O'Brien's prison treatment."

and then there was renewed laughter. "I take little interest in these histrionic performances," and then there was more laughter; they would not give him a chance to go on. "I take even less interest in them on the second representation [laughter]." Then he said—

"I ought, perhaps, to say a word, and I assure you it shall be a great word, on the communication I had the honour of receiving at about a quarter to one last night—[prolonged laughter]—a telegram from the Lord Mayor of Dublin—[renewed laughter]—which I allude to now, because I take it it represents the national case with regard to Mr. O'Brien's treatment in prison, and in this document, the original of which I have got in my hand, I read—I won't read it all—'Illegal and brutal violence [laughter]—that is not it [laughter]—unexampled indignation [laughter]—system of attacking and breaking down your political adversary by torture. [Laughter.] No, that is not it; here it is, Mr. O'Brien has now been naked in his cell for thirty-six hours. [Roars of laughter.]'"

What are you to think of a man who will make these utterly reckless and unsifted statements? The Chief Secretary has also said that my Friend O'Brien objected to travel second class. The only objection Mr. O'Brien took was this—

"I will insist upon being treated in Ireland as I have been treated in England. I will not allow you to act the hypocrite in England by taking me first class, and then, when you get me to Ireland, trying to huddle me in a second or third-class carriage. I will insist upon equal treatment in the two countries."

Now, with regard to the statement that Mr. O'Brien objected to the prison clothes. I wonder Dr. O'Farrell's report, which was published this morning, did not contain Mr. O'Brien's statement to me about prison clothes! Will it surprise the House that Mr. O'Brien does not object in the least to prison clothes? I will read Mr. O'Brien's statement on the point, and thus show that the stories flying about amount to an abominable hypocrisy got up to pretend that this man desires better treatment because he is a Member of Parliament. Mr. O'Brien says:—

"He (Dr. O'Farrell) asked had I any complaint of the way in which the other officials had carried out their orders? I told him that it was not the officials I complained of, but their orders. I said, 'Of course, they used very considerable force and violence, and caused me very cruel suffering, but I admit that they did not use more force than was necessary, because I resisted with all my strength, and it was undoubtedly necessary for them to use very considerable force if they were to succeed in overpowering me. They did overpower me; but I do not charge that they did so with any wilful brutality or ill-temper.' Dr. O'Farrell then asked me whether I objected to his examining me, and I said, 'Not in the least; neither to you nor to anyone else.' At the same time, I told him distinctly that I was fighting this matter, not as a sick man, but as a political prisoner. I said, 'I will contend for nothing that the poorest or the commonest man convicted under the Summary Jurisdiction Clause of the Coercion Act is not equally entitled to. With me it is not in the least a question of food or even of treatment, but of classification. I told the officials before in Tullamore—and I am quite as willing now, as then, to carry out the proposition—that this whole struggle might be obviated by the simple expedient of making all prisoners convicted under the Summary Jurisdiction Clause of this Act a separate 'class.' Whatever their treatment might be, if this was done, I, for one, would not have the slightest objection to wear whatever prison uniform would be set apart for that 'class,' or to perform any menial offices whatever that would be imposed on my comrades. Those who think us criminals could think so still, and would have the satisfaction of punishing us as much as any ordinary criminals could be punished, while we would have it established that it was under this Act, and under this Act alone, that we were criminals; but the object of our present treatment clearly is to attempt to degrade and confound us with criminals."

[An hon. MEMBER: What is the paper you are quoting from?] This statement was made to me by Mr. O'Brien on the day Mr. O'Brien was convicted in Tralee. The statement was made 12 months ago to the prison officials of Tullamore that he was fighting not for food or clothes, but that he should be put into a separate class, and should not be compelled to associate with the burglar, the thief, and the forger. You can print the broad arrow two feet long on his back if you like; Mr. O'Brien will not mind. Now, the Chief Secretary has often been convicted, especially in relation to matters arising under this Act, of mis-statement, misrepresentation, and I will say falsification of fact, as clearly as any man has ever been found guilty by a jury. I would convict the right hon. Gentleman now, and here, of as deliberate an attempt to pervert the truth in relation to this matter—[Cries of "Oh!" and "Order!"] I do not wish to put my words offensively, but I will convict him of as great a mis-statement as any man was ever guilty of. The Chief Secretary stated in his letter to Mr. Armitage that any Government which allowed Mr. O'Brien's speech to go unpunished might make itself accessory to assassination. Why, then, did the Government allow four months to elapse before prosecuting the speech? Feeling the pressure of that point, the right hon. Gentleman put up the Solicitor General for Ireland yesterday to make a statement—Pigotted him, in fact, and he Pigotted the House. The Solicitor General for Ireland said the reason of that was because the First Lord of the Treasury gave a promise that until the Irish Estimates were disposed of there should be no pursuance of any prosecution of Irish Members. That was the excuse. Will the House believe that this speech was made on the 30th of September? Two months afterwards, on the 23rd of November, the First Lord's promise was made. I call that Pigottry.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I understand that the hon. and learned Gentleman has deliberately accused me of wilful falsehood, because my hon. and learned Friend near me, in discussing this incident, said one of the reasons was that the First Lord of the Treasury had not given the pledge in question till the 23rd of November, and the speech was delivered on the 30th of September. Of course, I should be out of order in dealing with the whole of this question, which I am perfectly prepared to deal with—which I only admitted to deal with—through inadvertence, an inadvertence which the House will excuse when they recollect that I spoke for two hours. What I ask is whether it is in order to accuse me of deliberate falsehood because my hon. and learned Friend near me did not give as full and effective an explanation of the facts as seemed consistent to the hon. and learned Gentleman?

*MR. SPEAKER: Any accusation of deliberate falsehood is quite un-Parliamentary.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Quite so, Mr. Speaker; certainly. I did not use the words deliberate falsehood.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member did make use of an expression which I trust will not become common in this House. It implied the statement I have made.

MR. T. M. HEALY: In dealing with a matter like this, it is very difficult, on the spur of the moment, to capture the most suitable expression to characterize the Minister's statement. Therefore, I will content myself by the baldest recital of the circumstances. The Chief Secretary writes to Mr. Armitage that the speech delivered on the 30th of September, if unprosecuted, would involve the Government in being accessory to assassination. The point taken thereon is—"Why did you not prosecute for four months?" Reply—"Because the First Lord of the Treasury promised there should be no prosecutions pending the Estimates." Rebuttal—"Turn to the First Lord of the Treasury's statement, and you will find the date of the promise was 23rd November, two months afterwards, and Parliament was not sitting at the time the speech was made."

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN): I ought to call to the recollection of the House exactly what I did state. I only accounted for the difference of time between the date of the First Lord's pledge and the conclusion of the Session, and I said that if that period of time were deducted, that made the delay very much less than what was mentioned.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I have sent out for a record, the accuracy of which will hardly be disputed by the Colleagues of the right hon. Gentleman—namely, the Times. In the meantime, assuming the validity of the statement of the hon. and learned Gentleman—who had a very difficult position in having to make up for the blunders of the Chief Secretary for Ireland—the point I have put forward remains. While the First Lord of the Treasury was, I hope, virtuously disporting himself at Cannes or Monaco, this Speech remained unprosecuted by Her Majesty's Government. I have now been furnished with the words of the hon. and learned Gentleman as reported in the Times, and they are as follows:—

“The right hon. Member for Newcastle asked how it was that Mr. O'Brien was not prosecuted until January for the speech he had made in September. Well, the simple answer was that a pledge had been given by the Leader of the House, that Members of Parliament should not be proceeded against until the Estimates were finally disposed of, which did not happen till Christmas Eve, and then the intervention of Christmas carried the proceedings over till January.”

What is more, that pledge only applied to Members against whom warrants or summonses were then issued, and my hon. Friend the Lord Mayor of Dublin (Mr. Sexton) simply asked, after the Jeremiah Sullivan incident, that there should be no further prosecutions until the Irish Estimates were disposed of. The Government had the entire month of October in which to proceed against the Irish Members. Parliament did not meet until about the middle of November, and during all that time this virtuous Unionist Government was making itself “accessory to assassination.” That is not all, for—will the House believe it?—Mr. O'Brien was not prosecuted for the speech in question until two other summonses for different matters in Kerry had been determined upon. I will supply the House with another extraordinary fact—namely, that there was no thought of prosecuting Mr. O'Brien so long as the late Governor of Clonmel—a respectable old Catholic gentleman, who was believed to be more or less in sympathy with the Nationalists—remained alive. He was unhappily drowned about the beginning of the present year, and until the Government brought down from Downpatrick an instrument on whom they could rely for inflicting this torture upon Mr. O'Brien, they never dreamt of commencing proceedings against Mr. O'Brien. I ask the Chief Secretary whether that statement is true?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If the hon. Gentleman asks me, I will reply on the spot. It is wholly untrue—it is wholly incorrect. The speech was made on the 30th of September. In due course it came to me early in October, and I stated it was my opinion that the language ought to be prosecuted. The Attorney General thought a prosecution would lie, but desired evidence of a recrudescence of the conspiracy. As soon as he heard of it, he said that such language ought not to go unpunished. I never knew until a week ago that the Governor of Clonmel Gaol had been replaced.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Observe the present statement the right hon. Gentleman makes. I will not imitate the right hon. Gentleman by saying that the statement is wholly untrue. [Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I apologize.] The statement now is that in the month of October the opinion of the Chief Secretary that the speech ought to be prosecuted went to the Attorney General for Ireland. The Attorney General, who is not a sleepy man, allowed the matter to lie for four months. Now, what is the evidence of a recrudescence of the conspiracy? The principal witness was one W. T. Hanly, one of the Times' witnesses, who had in my presence sworn that he had not been subpoenaed by the Times, but whom, two days afterwards, the Attorney General had to interrupt Mr. Harrington's evidence to call, because he had been subpoenaed for a long time, and was waiting to give his evidence. William P. Hanly, of Thurles, land agent, deposed, in the presence of Mr. O'Brien—

“I was acting in 1887 and 1888 as agent for Mr. Cormack, over the lands of Modeshill, County Tipperary. I am the person referred to in Mr. O'Brien's speech given in evidence to-day. I see the Civil Bill Decree produced. It is Mr. Wall's signature to it, and the handwriting of Mr. Boyd, Clerk of the Peace. The Sub-Sheriff wrote the name of Andrew Carden in my presence. Captain Andrew Carden was High Sheriff, and Mr. Gerald Fitzgerald Sub-Sheriff, that year. That is Mr. Fitzgerald's hand-writing to that decree. I received possession under the Sheriff's warrant on that decree. I have still the lands mentioned in that decree in my hands. I got possession under the four other ejectment decrees handed in. All those are for the lands of Modeshill, and are signed by the County Court Judge and Clerk of the Peace, and the warrants are signed by the Sheriff of the County Tipperary. The decrees are at the suit of Michael D. Cormack v. Michael Power, Michael D. Cormack v. Patrick Funcheon, Michael D. Cormack v. Martin Drennan, Michael D. Cormack v. Patrick Funcheon and Bridget Keefe."

That was the entire evidence given on behalf of the Crown. That is the evidence of the recrudescence of the conspiracy. I beg the House to listen to this man's cross-examination to see how much Mr. O'Brien's speech, made on the 30th September, had to do with the prosecution:—

"Cross-examined by Mr. Healy—When were the lands evicted? In May, 1888. Did you make any effort to tenant the lands? I have made no effort to get them tenanted since. It was in 1884 there was a feeling against land-grabbing, and it increase in 1889. The Land League was just dying out until the recent agitation about two or three months ago.

"Re-examined by Mr. Ryan—I attribute the revival of the Land League to the Thurles Convention. Boycotting was revived. The Convention was on the 24th October. No one would take the evicted farm until the tenant settles. A great number of them I could not get tenants for, and that continues up to the present in Tipperary.

"To the Court—Modeshill is about 14 miles from Carrick-on-Suir. I don't know where Ballyneale is."

Such is the evidence upon which you have sentenced Mr. O'Brien to four months' imprisonment, and to be assaulted in the abominable way he has been assaulted. It is said Mr. William O'Brien was put in the charge of officials. Were Protestant officials put in place of Catholic officials? Were Catholic warders removed from the prison where Mr. O'Brien was to be taken, and were Protestant warders put in their place? Above all, I have to ask with regard to this man, whom your own doctors, Dr. Barr and Dr. Ridley, said was a delicate man, and as to whose state of health the Chief Secretary says he has lots of evidence, whether he has been put in charge of a doctor who has been recently liberated from a lunatic asylum? Is Dr. Hewetson a liberated lunatic or not? There is no answer from the Treasury Bench. This accounts for your waiting four months. So long as the old Governor of the gaol lived—a quiet, respectable, decent man—no attempt was made against Mr. O'Brien in Clonmel gaol, but then you bring a warder from Downpatrick and make a prison doctor of a liberated lunatic, who boasted he would soon put Mr. O'Brien into prison clothes. Would it not be desirable that, for your own self-protection, you should take some measures of precaution to prevent these terrible accusations being made against you? The hon. Member for South Tyrone says we made desperate charges against Irish officials in Dublin. Yes; and, what is still more melancholy, we proved every one of them. Where are the men we attacked in '83? Where is Cornwall, the Secretary of the General Post Office? A hunted felon! Where is Detective Director French? A hunted felon! Where are all the rest of the gang, some of whom have been playfellows of Lords Lieutenants in the past? Perhaps if Mr. Richard Pigott could be produced we might get some further evidence as to his trade in obscene literature. [An hon. MEMBER: Photographs.] We proved all the charges we made in 1883. Not a single official we attacked in connection with these desperate crimes but has been hunted out of the country like unclean things as they were. The hon. Member for South Tyrone gets up and, tearing a passion to tatters, declares we have been attacking white-robed angels, when you know you did not dare to allow Cornwall or any one of them their pensions. There are men whom we have met before the Commission against whom we have said no word in relation to this very matter; but if we should, you will see whether two years hence a Government will get up and say we made the accusations with absolutely no foundation. I tell the Government this thing is not through yet, and when the hon. Member for South Tyrone talks to us about making false accusations, I think the less said on the subject of false accusations by a paid pamphleteer of the Times the better so long as an unsavoury odour lingers around the employés of that respectable journal. Now, I take up another matter to test the accuracy of the Chief Secretary's statements in his letter to Mr. Armitage, I assert it as a positive fact that he is unable to prove a single statement he made therein. He says that it is not true that five warders attacked Mr. O'Brien, and in O'Brien's account. The doctor placed a stethoscope to his heart, felt his pulse, placed another instrument to his breast, and struck him lightly on the stomach. Mr. O'Brien told the doctor he was at perfect liberty to examine him, but he declined to answer questions because of the perversions of his answers on a previous occasion when the Chief Secretary stated the hon. Member had sheltered himself under plea of a weak heart. What are we to think of the statement of an official who says Mr. O'Brien threw every obstacle in the way of medical examination? There is not a shred or tittle of truth in the statement. When caught out in this statement, when gibbeted at the cross roads of public opinion, he comes with his letter to the Times, saying this statement was excessive. I do not think it was excessive, it was Balfouresque. 'It would be more correct to say,' said the Chief Secretary, 'that Mr. O'Brien threw very serious obstacles in the way of medical examination.' "

This is equally unfounded. He threw no obstacle in the way; he simply declined to answer any question as to his previous history, because the Chief Secretary, when he was imprisoned in Tullamore, made the most atrocious misuse of statements made, declaring that Mr. O'Brien sheltered himself behind the plea of a weak heart. This is the Gentleman who has charge of five millions of Her Majesty's subjects, who has the liberties of every man in Ireland at his disposal. This magnanimous Gentleman, who has the fate of Irish Members in his hands, gets up and makes a statement that is absolutely unfounded, and when it is shattered and riven, withdraws it with about as much grace as the Attorney General withdraws the forged letters from before the Royal Commission.

It being Midnight, the Debate stood adjourned.

THE SALE AND USE OF REVOLVERS.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

*THE EARL OF MILLTOWN, in rising to ask Her Majesty's Government whether they propose to take measures to restrain the indiscriminate sale of revolvers, and the custom of carrying these deadly weapons, which now appears to prevail, said:—My Lords, the Question of which I have given notice divides itself into two heads, first with regard to the sale of revolvers, and secondly to the constant and growing custom of carrying these deadly weapons. As regards the first head, I believe I am perfectly correct in saying that there are no regulations whatever in existence in regard to the sale of revolvers. They may be and are sold to anybody or everybody who desires them. Now, there are considerable precautions taken—although even they are not stringent enough—with regard to the sale of poisons, and I cannot help thinking that homicide by misadventure is quite as likely to occur from the incautious use of revolvers and such like firearms, as it is from drugs, and intentional homicide is still more likely. Whether it would be advisable to enforce in the case of the sale of revolvers all the regulations, or the principal of the regulations, which now exist with regard to the sale of poisons I really cannot say. One which I have chiefly in my mind is that the names of purchasers should be entered in a book, and that the articles should not be sold to any persons not known or recommended to the vendor. But there is one precaution which certainly might be taken, and which I think ought to be taken, and that is that the sale to children should be absolutely prohibited. It is quite fearful to think of the number of these deadly weapons which can be and are purchased by boys for a few shillings. Since I put this notice on the Paper I have received the following letter from a gentleman in Manchester with whom I am unacquainted. He says—

“A few weeks back I called at the Post Office, where I was horrified by seeing a telegraph boy with a revolver pointed at his temple, explaining some point to another telegraph boy. I cannot say that the revolver was loaded or not, but I do know that these boys in Her Majesty's Service are in the habit of carrying these dangerous weapons. The great cause of all this is the unseemly show bills posted on our public streets.”

I cannot help saying that those murderous incidents which are now illustrated everywhere in bold characters on our dead walls seem most calculated to do enormous injury amongst the juvenile, and even amongst the adult population. I have also had sent to me an advertisement which appeared in a newspaper, which offers six-chamber breech-loading revolvers, warranted to kill at thirty yards, at 6s. 8d., and gives a catalogue of other firearms which are sold at a still smaller price. Now, to come to the second point of the question, the practice of carrying these weapons through the streets and in public places, I venture to suggest, ought to be absolutely prohibited. It is a detestable American practice, which may be well enough suited to the half-civilized towns of the New World, but it is wholly inappropriate to the streets of London. Only the other day an American gentleman in a state of intoxication or excitement "emptied" (to use their own word) a revolver in a crowded thoroughfare and shot one man dead and wounded another. Two or three days ago a man armed with a loaded revolver was riding in a hansom cab, and on the cabman looking at him through the trap he pointed the revolver at his head. On the man being taken before the magistrates the utmost fine that could be inflicted upon him was 40s. for having a loaded firearm in his possession while drunk. I venture to think that is wholly inadequate. Not long ago a Times witness discharged five or six shots from his revolver at one of his companions, with whom he had had a little difference, across a crowded street—the Strand—and it is inexplicable how the passers-by escaped. Any person carrying a revolver is supposed to have a 10s. licence, but, as a matter of fact, the great majority of people have not these licences, and now steps are taken to enforce this law. There is another point in connection with carrying revolvers to which I would like to allude, and that is the new and growing custom of the criminal classes carrying and using revolvers when performing their various depredations. We continually find that where an attempt is made by the police to arrest a burglar, the burglar, to avoid capture, unhesitatingly discharges his revolver, and frequently wounds, and sometimes kills, his pursuer. On this point I hold in my hand a resolution which was passed on the 15th of February by the Grand Jury at the Norwich Assizes—

"Where persons convicted of burglary are found in possession of fire-arms, the Judge should have the power to add corporal punishment to the sentence."

The Earl of Milltown

It seems to me a strange thing that if a highway robbery is committed with violence—that is, if the robber knocks a man down—he can be sentenced to severe corporal punishment, but if a burglar is armed with one of these fearful weapons, he has no more punishment than if he carried an ordinary stick in his hand. One thing is very certain: unless this habit of the criminal classes carrying and using revolvers is put down, you must be prepared to arm the police with a similar weapon. It is monstrously unfair to send forth a man, no matter how brave—and I quite agree that the Metropolitan Police are amongst the bravest men in the world—armed with a short stick to attack and capture a desperate ruffian armed with a six-shooter. It is neither fair to the public nor to the police; it is not fair to the police, because you are asking them to engage in what may be a deadly struggle on wholly unequal terms; it is not fair to the public, because you are affording a ready means for desperate criminals to escape justice. I beg to ask the Question of which I have given notice.

EARL BROWNLOW: My Lords, a Question similar to that which is put by the noble Lord behind me (the Earl of Milltown) was put, in another place, to the Home Secretary a few days ago, and I am afraid that I shall be able to do very little more than give the answer which was given on that occasion by the Home Secretary, in another place. That answer was—

"That the Government had for some time had under consideration the question of taking measures to restrain the sale and use of revolvers. He (the Home Secretary) was not yet in a position to say whether legislation would be proposed to Parliament on the subject."

I should state that the points which have been urged by the noble Lord to-night have been under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government. There seems some difficulty about applying the Acts relating to poisons for this reason. The person who orders a revolver may have a perfect right to have it, but that revolver may be passed on to other persons who would make bad use of it, and who ought not to have it. With regard to the sale of revolvers to young people, I think that is a very strong point, and what has been said by my noble Friend will receive the greatest attention at the hands of Her Majesty's Government. As to licensing, the noble Lord will of course be aware that it is necessary for persons possessing a revolver to have a gun licence which costs 10s., and the penalty for carrying a revolver, or pistol, or gun, without a licence is £10. I cannot help thinking that if there were more activity shown in the matter of those licences, it would have some effect in diminishing the evil complained of. I can only say, my Lords, that the whole matter, which is one of importance, will have the most careful attention of Her Majesty's Government.

LORD FITZGERALD: My Lords, I am sure your Lordships generally are agreed in viewing this matter as one of the greatest importance, and are glad to learn that it will receive the attention of Her Majesty's Government. It cannot be questioned that some legislation is necessary, and I think the principle upon which that legislation would proceed is to be found in the Explosives Act of 1883. By Section 3 of that Act it is provided that—

“Any person who has in his possession any explosive substance tending to endanger life or to injure property, whether the explosion does or does not take place, and whether injury is caused or not, shall be guilty of felony and punished accordingly.”

Then the 4th section is—

“Any person who has in his possession any explosive substance under such circumstances as to give rise to a reasonable suspicion that he does not have it in his possession for a lawful object shall also be guilty of felony, unless he can show that he has it for a lawful purpose.”

I do not suppose that in reference to the possession of revolvers the same degree of severity would be adopted, but I think the same degree of stringency ought to be applied, and when persons are found in possession of revolvers, either in the course of committing a criminal act or under such circumstances as to lead to the conclusion that they have it, not for a lawful purpose, but for some unlawful purpose, a heavy punishment should be imposed. Of course, the preparation of a measure of this kind is a matter of great complication, and requires great care. It is a subject of such magnitude that the initiation of any legislation upon it should lie with the Government, and I am glad to learn from the answer of the noble Lord opposite (Earl Brownlow) that the careful attention of Her Majesty's Government will be given to it.

HACKNEY CAB REGULATIONS.

OBSERVATIONS.

LORD DE ROS, in rising to call attention to the inconvenience and danger caused by hackney cabs plying for hire in the public thoroughfares, said:—My Lords, although this question deals with a subject which has not the merit of novelty, I think I need offer no apology to your Lordships for bringing the matter to your notice, because, unless something is done, the thoroughfares of London will be rendered absolutely impassable through the number of crawling cabs in the streets. In Bond Street, where, as your Lordships know, there are a number of very valuable shops, picture galleries, exhibitions, and so forth, I counted the other day no less than seven hansom cabs following each other and blocking up the road so that no carriage could pass without the greatest inconvenience; and even in less important thoroughfares the evil is also very great. Another matter which I think depends entirely on the public themselves is one which, I am afraid, will not be very well received. I allude to the servants standing at the doors whistling for cabs. Cabs come tearing in from all points, and it is only a wonder that there is not a collision. It is all very easy to find all these faults, but it is not so easy to suggest remedies. I would venture, however, to shadow forth one or two points which, I think, might possibly tend in the end to mitigate the evils of which I complain. In the first place, my Lords, I think that there are far too many cabs, and the granting of licences might be checked till the number of cabs is considerably reduced. Another point is that there should be more cab-stands, and I would suggest that after a cabman has set down his fare he should then proceed, under a penalty, to the nearest cabstand, and, in order to indicate that he is doing so, I think that some sort of sign, a little flag or something, might be hoisted on his cab. In the next place I may point out the cruelty to which the horses are subjected. In the hot weather some cab-horses are very hardly worked indeed; it would be a very great advantage to them to have a rest between each fare. I know that there are very great difficulties in all these matters, and I have been told over and over again, "Oh, it is a very great convenience to be able to jump into a cab at a moment's notice;" but I cannot help thinking that the advantages which would be gained by the absence of these cabs would greatly outweigh the convenience of their presence. I feel certain that, unless some steps are taken in this direction, the London cabs will very soon establish a complete monopoly of the principal thoroughfares of the Metropolis.

EARL BROWNLOW: My Lords, I thought it would be well for your Lordships to hear the opinion of the Chief Commissioner of Police, as being the Chief of those men who had to attend to the traffic about the streets. Therefore, I asked the Chief Commissioner to give me a memorandum on the subject, and in the communication which I have received from him he says that the evil of crawling cabs is one which will exist just so long as the public continue to take up cabs in the streets instead of from cab-ranks; and he suggests that there should be an increase in the number of cab-stands. The whole question has been discussed over and over again. I can only say that I think the matter is one that must be left entirely to the police. I am quite sure that the police will do whatever is possible to mitigate the nuisance. This is one of those things which I think must be given some latitude, and I really do not see any way beyond proposing to increase the number of cab-stands by which whatever evil there may be can be remedied.

LORD COLVILLE OF CULROSS: My Lords, without any intention to prolong the discussion, I would just say that I think it very desirable that all licensed vehicles should, after dark, be compelled to carry lamps. I am quite aware that at present hansom cabs do carry lights; but four-wheelers and other vehicles are not compelled to do so. I think a regulation to this effect would obviate a great deal of the danger which undoubtedly does exist at present.

QUESTIONS.

MAJOR HARSTON.

CAPTAIN SELWYN (Cambridge, Wisbech) asked the Financial Secretary for War whether he is aware that Major Harston, an officer of the Canadian Militia, gave up important business in Canada on receipt of a letter from the Surveyor General of Ordnance, telling him "to convert three Martini rifles on his plan, and to send the bill for the work to the War Office"; whether his attention has been drawn to a letter of 11th June, 1888, in which the Director of Artillery told Major Harston to "work out the alterations and send them the bill for the work"; whether this work was under the supervision of the Special Committee on Small Arms, which recognized that Major Harston had successfully converted the Martini Henry rifle into a magazine rifle; whether the rifle so converted is fired with twice the rapidity of the new Government rifle; whether Major Harston has repeatedly applied for but received no payment for the work done under instructions from the War Office Authorities; and whether he is aware that the sum actually expended by Major Harston amounts to £1,395, and that the Special Committee on Small Arms expressed the opinion that the charges were most moderate?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY FOR WAR (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): All the circumstances connected with Major Harston's claim have been submitted to the Secretary of State, who has referred the case to the Solicitor to the Treasury. As soon as his opinion reaches the War Office, the case will be settled without any unnecessary delay.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): May I ask the hon. Gentleman whether, considering the necessity of securing the fair treatment of inventors, he will lay on the Table the correspondence which has taken place in this case, and give Members an opportunity of seeing it?

MR. BRODRICK: I think the hon. Gentleman had better give notice of that Question.

CAPTAIN SELWYN: How long is this unfortunate man to remain without payment?

MR. BRODRICK: I can assure the hon. Member that no delay will take place.

POST OFFICE OFFICIALS.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury) asked the Postmaster General what number of Post Office officials were dismissed last year for irregularities, and what number of Post Office officials were convicted of offences in connection with

IRELAND—ALLEGED OUTRAGE BY A JUSTICE OF THE PEACE.

MR. MATTHEW KENNY, Tyrone, Mid., asked the Solicitor General for Ireland if the Lord Chancellor has had under his consideration certain letters addressed to him by Mr. James H.

IRELAND—THE QUEEN'S COLLEGES.

MR. BLANE, Attorney-General, asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if his attention has been called to the fact that the Queen's Colleges of Belfast, Cork, and Galway, which receive amongst them a Parliamentary grant of over £5,000 a-year for medical teaching and the repairs and maintenance of buildings, were, at the last examinations of the Royal University of Ireland, beaten in award of first-class honours by the Catholic University School of Medicine, and that those Queen's Colleges were again defeated in the higher test of first-class exhibitions by the Catholic University School of Medicine, which carried off as many exhibitions as the Queen's Colleges of Belfast, Cork, and Galway combined; and whether, under these circumstances, he will consider the advisability of recommending a Parliamentary grant to the School of Medicine of the Catholic University?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The Report which I have received, in replying to this Question, suggests that the result of one examination cannot be taken as a fair test, and it would further appear from them that each of the institutions between which a comparison is made could establish a fair claim to pre-eminence if allowed to choose its own test.

CRUELTY TO PAUPER CHILDREN.

Mr. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) asked the President of the Local Government Board, whether his attention has been drawn to the unduly severe flogging of a pauper boy at Ulverston. Whether it appears from the proceedings before the Ulverston Board of Guardians that similar charges of cruelty to pauper children had been preferred against the official guilty in this case. And, whether he will direct an inquiry into the matter.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, St. George's, Tower Hamlets): I have communicated with the Guardians of the Ulverston Union on the subject of this Question. I learn from them that the pauper boy referred to was attending a Board School, and that the punishment was by the master of that school. The boy was examined by the medical officer of the workhouse and by four of the Guardians, who considered that the boy had been severely and unduly punished. There had, however, been no previous charge made to the Guardians of cruelty to pauper children by the master of the school, and the Guardians, after inquiring into the case and hearing the statements of the schoolmaster, appear to have been satisfied that although the boy had been very severely punished, there had been great provocation on the part of the boy. The Guardians, after fully discussing the subject, determined to proceed with the next business. The Local Government Board have no jurisdiction whatever with regard to the master of the Board School, but I have drawn the attention of the Education Department to the facts, and they have informed me that they will communicate with the managers of the school, and, if necessary, direct further inquiry.

THE CUSTOMS DEPARTMENT.

Mr. HENNIKER HEATON asked the First Lord of the Treasury whether, before filling up the office of Chairman of the Customs Department, vacant through the lamented death of Sir Charles Du Cane, he will consider the advisability of carrying out the reforms suggested by Sir Algernon West, given before the Select Committee on the Revenue Estimates last year?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand): The question of the amalgamation of the Customs and Inland Revenue is still under the consideration of a Royal Commission, and I am unable to say more than that pending their Report it is not probable the vacancy will be filled.

IRELAND—RELIEF OF ASSIGNEES OF LEASES UNDER "THE LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACT, 1887."

Mr. LEA (Londonderry, S.) asked the Solicitor General for Ireland if his attention has been directed to a recent decision of Mr. Commissioner Greer, reported in the Belfast newspapers, whereby it was decided that the assignee of any lease bearing date between the years 1826 and 1832 could not obtain relief under "The Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887," unless he could produce the consent in writing of his landlord to such assignment; and if such be a correct interpretation of the prohibitive Statute 7 Geo. IV. c. 29, as referred to by Mr. Greer, what steps the Government will take to amend its provisions so as admit the assignee of such leases within the operation of the Irish Land Law Acts 1881, 1887, and 1888?

Mr. MADDEN: I have not yet been able to obtain a copy of the decision referred to. I have asked for it however, and hope to receive it shortly.

IRELAND—THE LAND COMMISSION.

Mr. M'CARTAN (Down, S.) asked the Chief Secretary whether his attention has been called to the strong protests made by the different Boards of

for the Home Department, did he, on 7th January, when speaking at the Govan Election, promise that the naval work of this country should be put out to contract instead of relying on the Dockyards; and, if so, on whose authority he made the promise?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. STUART-WORTLEY, Sheffield, Hallam): I had no authority to make, nor did I make, any promise either verbally or substantially corresponding to that attributed to me in the hon. Gentleman's Question.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): May I on this subject ask the hon. Gentleman if he is accurately reported in the Scotsman of January 8, the day following the meeting at Govan, when he is stated to have used these words—

“Mr. Stuart-Wortley said he had come down from London to say that Lord Salisbury's Ministry favoured Sir John Pender's candidature, and were anxious that he should be returned. From a conversation he had had with the First Lord of the Admiralty and the Secretary for War, he knew it was the policy of the Government to place Dockyard work out to contract on a large scale.”

MR. HANDEL COSSHAM: I took my information from the Glasgow Herald.

MR. STUART-WORTLEY: The report in the Glasgow Herald does not sustain the allegation in the Question of the hon. Member for Bristol (Mr. Cossham). As to the extract from the Scotsman, read by the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Buchanan), of which he has not given me notice, and which does not profess to be a verbatim report, I must decline to be made responsible. What I did say at Govan referred to present policy and to past indications of it, and I expressly disclaimed knowledge of Admiralty programmes. I announced no future change of policy, and certainly I did not, as some London newspaper reported me, say that something about to be done was to be conditional on the election of the candidate in whose support I was speaking.

MR. BUCHANAN: The hon. Gentleman is reported to have stated that a few days before he went down to take part in the Govan election he had a conversation with the First Lord of the Admiralty. May I ask the noble Lord if that is the fact?

Mr. Handel Cossham

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): As I saw that certain language was attributed to my hon. Friend, I asked him to send me a verbatim report of what he said, and from that report it would appear that the summaries that were given of it totally misrepresented his speech. What he did say was, that he had seen the heads of the War Office and the Admiralty, and that the policy of the Government was not to run up Government establishments, but to keep them at a certain level, and to put certain work out to private yards. That is the policy of the Government, and I venture to say that it will be the policy of every future Government.

MR. BUCHANAN: Are we to understand that before the hon. Gentleman went down to Govan he had a conversation with the noble Lord as to what he was to say?

LORD G. HAMILTON: Certainly not.

IRELAND—JOHN LAVERTY.

MR. M'CARTAN asked the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he has received a memorial from Archibald Lavery, of Collyer Street, Belfast, with reference to his only son, John, who, in September 1882, when only 13 years of age, without the consent of his parents, enlisted in the Royal Navy, and who was some time ago arrested as a deserter for not having returned to his ship on the expiration of his leave of absence: whether he is aware that the prescribed forms of engagement were presented to John Lavery for signature, and that they were never signed by him: and, whether, considering the circumstances under which the boy was brought from his home, the dangerous state of health into which his mother has fallen in consequence of his absence, and the other facts mentioned in the memorial, he will consider the prayer of the father and advise the discharge of the son?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Letters were received from Archibald Lavery in July and August, 1887, asking for the discharge of his son on the plea that he entered the Navy without the consent of his parents. This, however, is not the case, as the paper bears his mother's signature. Neither is it the case that the forms of engagement were not signed by John Laverty. The continuous service paper is in the office, duly completed and signed by him. No application for the discharge of his son was received from the father until five years after his son joined the Navy, or until July 1887, when he deserted from the Duke of Wellington. He was arrested last month, and is now undergoing his punishment for desertion on board the Duke of Wellington. I do not propose to interfere with the ordinary course of the service, or to sanction his discharge except under conditions contained in the Queen's Regulations.

ADMIRALTY—H.M.S. "NILE."

MR. HANBURY asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, for how long H.M.S. Nile, launched on March 27th last, remained at Pembroke before being brought to Portsmouth for completion; whether she was allowed to retain her launching gear the whole time and until after her arrival at Portsmouth; whether, on her being docked at Portsmouth, the red lead with which her bottom was coated was found to have peeled off in large patches, and the submerged platings and rivets of this perfectly new vessel were found to be seriously corroded, especially along the water line, the heads of the rivets in many instances being completely eaten away; whether the Narcissus was lately found to be in a similar condition; whether red lead was used upon the bottoms of both these ships; and, if so, was it recommended by the responsible dockyard officials, and, if not, by whom; and, if the damage was not due in either case to the use of red lead, to what was it due?

LORD G. HAMILTON: There was an interval of ten months between the launch of the Nile at Pembroke and her being docked, that period having been occupied in putting in her machinery and getting her sufficiently completed to proceed to Portsmouth. A portion of the launching gear could not be removed until her arrival at the latter port, owing to there being no dock at Pembroke of sufficient size to admit a ship of her dimensions. The red lead coating was found, on the ship being docked, to have peeled off in places, causing some oxidation of the plates and rivets where this had occurred, but in no case could the corrosion be called serious. The

Narcissus suffered much in the same way. Any damage that has occurred cannot be attributed to the use of red lead as a protective, but to the fact of its not having, in the present instances, afforded the protection that previous experience had given cause to anticipate. As a protective it has given hitherto sufficient satisfaction for the Admiralty to sanction its use. Endeavour will be made to detect the cause of failure in the present cases, and the necessary steps will be taken to prevent a recurrence of the circumstance.

MR. HANBURY: Was the use of red lead recommended by the Dockyard officials?

LORD G. HAMILTON: Yes; it is almost the invariable custom to use red lead.

IRELAND—POOR LAW OFFICERS.

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, having regard to the additional and very onerous duties imposed upon Poor Law Officers in Ireland under the Franchise Acts of 1885, and to the great reluctance manifested by Boards of Guardians to vote adequate remuneration in such cases, the Government proposes to make a Grant on this account for the present year, as was done in 1885?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I quite sympathize with the Poor Law Officers in the matter mentioned; but, as I have explained in reply to former Questions, it is one which concerns not Ireland alone, but the whole of the United Kingdom, and could only be dealt with by a general measure of legislation.

IRELAND—CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT ACT.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has made any inquiries into the antecedents or character of the persons being Resident Magistrates, Crown Solicitors, and others intrusted with the administration of "The Criminal Law (Amendment) Act, 1887;" and whether, in view of recent events, he will cause such inquiries to be made?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have instituted no such general inquiry into the private history of any servants of the Government as the hon. Member seems to desire. Nor can the hon. Member be serious in suggesting that I should do so. A particular charge against Captain Seagrave is, as the hon. Member is aware, being investigated at the present moment.

MR. CHANCE: I do not ask as to any particular inquiry, but whether any general inquiry has been made into the antecedents or character of these persons.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: My reply is that I have instituted no such inquiry.

MR. CHANCE: Has the right hon. Gentleman made no inquiry?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I thought I had answered that Question. I have made no inquiry.

MR. CHANCE: Does the right hon. Gentleman intend to make any inquiry?

No answer was returned.

IRELAND—FATHER M'FADDEN.

MR. WILLIAM SUMMERS (Huddersfield) asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland whether he will state to the House who was responsible for the arrangements made in connection with the arrest of Father M'Fadden?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am informed that the County Inspector was responsible for the arrangements in question.

MR. SUMMERS inquired whether any action had been taken in regard to the matter?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If the hon. Member means with regard to the County Inspector, I am not aware that any action is required.

IRELAND—MR. MORONEY.

MR. SUMMERS asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland whether, in view of the statement on the subject of Mr. Moroney's health, that were contained in his letter to Mr. Armitage, he will consent to lay upon the Table of the House the Reports that were made by the medical officers who examined Mr. Moroney during the period of his confinement in gaol?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The statements in my letter to Mr. Armitage related solely to the different versions of the Moroney affair, which the Nationalist Press and others gave before and after Moroney's release, according as it suited the controversial exigencies of the moment to describe Moroney as a suffering martyr or a triumphant hero. No light would be thrown on this question by the production of the doctors' Reports.

MR. C. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): Do I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that no light could be thrown on the actual condition of Moroney while in prison?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I was not discussing the actual condition of Mr. Moroney, but the relative versions of his condition given before and after his arrest.

THE EDUCATION CODE (1888)—SCHOOL TEACHERS.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe) asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether membership by the principal teacher of any public elementary school of a County or Town Council, or attendance at its sittings when held during the hours in which the school open, is compatible with Article 96, Section (d) of the Education Code, 1888?

SIR W. HART DYKE: Membership by the principal teacher under the circumstances mentioned is not compatible with Article 96, Section (d) of the Code. If this Rule is violated by any school, the result would be the forfeiture of the grant.

INLAND REVENUE—BEER AND WINE LICENCES.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.) asked the Secretary to the Treasury, with reference to the case of a person who was summoned by the Inland Revenue authorities at West Ham Police Court, on Wednesday last, for selling intoxicants without a licence, whether the samples upon which the prosecution was instituted were taken so long ago as October 18 last; upon what date those samples were analyzed; what proportion of alcohol was found in them; and why proceedings against the seller were delayed for more than four months?

MR. JACKSON: Samples of so-called beer and wine were purchased on October 18th last as stated. The samples of beer were analyzed on October 19th, the day following, and found to contain 3·8 per cent. of proof spirit. The samples of wine were analyzed a few days later, and were found to contain 15·6 per cent and 17·5 per cent of proof spirit respectively. Proceedings were directed to be instituted early in December, but have been delayed, owing to the indisposition of the analyst concerned in the case.

THE CHIEF JUSTICE OF THE BAHAMAS.

MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.) asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Chief Justice of the Bahamas can legally sentence any person to be flogged for contempt of Court; and, if so, under what Statute or authority has the power to pass such a sentence been conferred?

BARON H. DE WORMS: There is no local Statute authorizing such a sentence; and the Colonial Law Officer is of opinion that, in inflicting it, the Chief Justice exceeded the summary powers of punishment vested in him.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: What course does the Secretary of State for the Colonies propose to take with respect to the Chief Justice of the Bahamas, who has illegally caused a subject of the Queen to receive 36 lashes? What remedy would he afford an Englishman under such circumstances, in order to recover damages?

BARON H. DE WORMS: The Secretary of State, on hearing the details, sent a letter to the Chief Justice informing him that the most serious consequences would ensue if any breach of the law were committed.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: I do not want to know what would happen to the Judge if he repeated his offence. What would happen to him for the illegal act which he has already committed?

MR. PICKERSGILL: Is it a fact that the victim in this case was a black man, and that that is the ground for the absence of effective action against the Chief Justice?

BARON H. DE WORMS: I do not think it was a question of colour. The offence committed was of a very serious nature. It consisted of a murderous attack upon the Judge in Court.

MR. PICKERSGILL: On an early day I will put a Question to the Attorney General on the subject.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. E. WEBSTER, Q.C., Isle of Wight):

As I have been appealed to, I will at once state that, although there are old authorities which say corporal punishment might be inflicted in gross cases of contempt of Court, I do not think those authorities should be binding in Courts in which English law prevails. In my opinion, the Chief Justice acted illegally and in a way that was not justified by law. It appears, however, from the papers, that a murderous attack had been made upon the Judge by this particular man. The Attorney General of the Colony said the offence was so serious that it had been intended to indict the man for felony—that is, for the attack upon the Judge.

THE SPECIAL COMMISSION.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department the following Question: Did Head Constable Preston visit the prisoners James Mullett and Patrick Nally in Millbank; if so, on what business; how did he secure access to them; and by whose orders was admission granted; were those men brought over from Ireland by judicial process; and, if so, what was it; was there in Millbank, or any English gaol, a prisoner named Tracy brought over from Ireland since the Times Commission began; would he state what was his sentence and offence; by what process and at whose instance was his removal from an Irish prison obtained; was Tracy visited by Head Constable Preston; and under what circumstances was the visit obtained?

MR. M'CARTAN had on the paper the following Question:—To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, whether he can state on what date Thomas Tracy, a bail prisoner now in Millbank Prison, was removed from Belfast Gaol to Millbank, and by what authority he was removed; whether he was accompanied from Belfast by a prison warder, who still remains here; whether he will give the names of the persons who visited him since his arrival, and by whom, and for what purpose the application to visit was made in each case; whether and how often Tracy has been visited by Head Constable Preston, of the Royal Irish Constabulary, and if Preston visited him on behalf of the Times to procure evidence for the Special Commission;

to desire. Nor can the hon. Member be serious in suggesting that I should do so. A particular charge against Captain Seagrave is, as the hon. Member is aware, being investigated at the present moment.

MR. CHANCE: I do not ask as to any particular inquiry, but whether any general inquiry has been made into the antecedents or character of these persons.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: My reply is that I have instituted no such inquiry.

MR. CHANCE: Has the right hon. Gentleman made no inquiry?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I thought I had answered that Question. I have made no inquiry.

MR. CHANCE: Does the right hon. Gentleman intend to make any inquiry?

No answer was returned.

IRELAND—FATHER M'FADDEN.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.) asked the Secretary to the Treasury, with reference to the case of a person who was summoned by the Inland Revenue authorities at West Ham Police Court, on Wednesday last, for selling intoxicants without a licence, whether the samples upon which the prosecution was instituted were taken so long ago as October 18 last; upon what date those samples were analyzed; what proportion of alcohol was found in them; and why proceedings against the seller were delayed for more than four months?

MR. JACKSON: Samples of so-called beer and wine were purchased on October 18th last as stated. The samples of beer were analyzed on October 19th, the day following, and found to contain 3·8 per cent. of proof spirit. The samples of wine were analyzed a few days later, and were found to contain 15·6 per cent and 17·5 per cent of proof spirit respectively. Proceedings were directed to be instituted early in December, but have been delayed, owing to the indisposition of the analyst concerned in the case.

THE CHIEF JUSTICE OF THE BAHAMAS.

MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.) asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Chief Justice of the Bahamas can legally sentence any person to be flogged for contempt of Court; and, if so, under what Statute or authority has the power to pass such a sentence been conferred?

BARON H. DE WORMS: There is no local Statute authorizing such a sentence; and the Colonial Law Officer is of opinion that, in inflicting it, the Chief Justice exceeded the summary powers of punishment vested in him.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: What course does the Secretary of State for the Colonies propose to take with respect to the Chief Justice of the Bahamas, who has illegally caused a subject of the Queen to receive 86 lashes? What remedy would he afford an Englishman under such circumstances, in order to recover damages?

BARON H. DE WORMS: The Secretary of State, on hearing the details, sent a letter to the Chief Justice informing him that the most serious consequences would ensue if any breach of the law were committed.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: I do not want to know what would happen to the Judge if he repeated his offence. What would happen to him for the illegal act which he has already committed?

MR. PICKERSGILL: Is it a fact that the victim in this case was a black man, and that that is the ground for the absence of effective action against the Chief Justice?

BARON H. DE WORMS: I do not think it was a question of colour. The offence committed was of a very serious nature. It consisted of a murderous attack upon the Judge in Court.

MR. PICKERSGILL: On an early day I will put a Question to the Attorney General on the subject.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. E. WEBSTER, Q.C., Isle of Wight):

As I have been appealed to, I will at once state that, although there are old authorities which say corporal punishment might be inflicted in gross cases of contempt of Court, I do not think those authorities should be binding in Courts in which English law prevails. In my opinion, the Chief Justice acted illegally and in a way that was not justified by law. It appears, however, from the papers, that a murderous attack had been made upon the Judge by this particular man. The Attorney General of the Colony said the offence was so serious that it had been intended to indict the man for felony—that is, for the attack upon the Judge.

THE SPECIAL COMMISSION.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department the following Question: Did Head Constable Preston visit the prisoners James Mullett and Patrick Nally in Millbank; if so, on what business; how did he secure access to them; and by whose orders was admission granted; were those men brought over from Ireland by judicial process; and, if so, what was it; was there in Millbank, or any English gaol, a prisoner named Tracy brought over from Ireland since the Times Commission began; would he state what was his sentence and offence; by what process and at whose instance was his removal from an Irish prison obtained; was Tracy visited by Head Constable Preston; and under what circumstances was the visit obtained?

MR. M'CARTAN had on the paper the following Question:—To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, whether he can state on what date Thomas Tracy, a bail prisoner now in Millbank Prison, was removed from Belfast Gaol to Millbank, and by what authority he was removed; whether he was accompanied from Belfast by a prison warder, who still remains here; whether he will give the names of the persons who visited him since his arrival, and by whom, and for what purpose the application to visit was made in each case; whether and how often Tracy has been visited by Head Constable Preston, of the Royal Irish Constabulary, and if Preston visited him on behalf of the Times to procure evidence for the Special Commission; and whether there is any limit to the time during which a prisoner from an Irish gaol, alleged to be required as a witness in a trial here, may be kept in a prison in England without being produced at such trial?

MR. MATTHEWS: I will answer the Question of the hon. Member for North Longford and that of the hon. Member for South Down at the same time. Mullett and Nally were not visited by Head Constable Preston. They were brought over from Ireland under order of the Special Commission for the purpose of giving evidence. A prisoner named Tracy is in Millbank. His offence was making use of threatening language, and his sentence was to find bail to keep the peace and be of good behaviour for 12 months, or in default to be imprisoned for that time. The removal of Tracy took place, I understand, under similar circumstances to that of Mullett and Nally. He was accompanied by a prison warder, who still remains here. He has been twice visited by Mr. Preston, in pursuance of a request of Mr. Soames. The purpose of the application to visit was not stated. These visits were allowed in accordance with the ordinary rules. I am not aware of any limit of time during which a prisoner may be detained if his presence is required by the Court.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I wish to ask whether it is the view of the Government that a subpoena from the High Court has the effect of a habeas corpus, and that it withdraws prisoners from the gaols, and compels their production in Courts of Law in England?

MR. MATTHEWS: I must ask for notice of that Question.

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I understand the Home Secretary to say that this prisoner was visited by Preston, agent for Mr. Soames, the solicitor for the Times. Was that under an order of the Commission? I want to understand by what practice of prisons in England Mr. Soames, the solicitor to the Times, had a right to send an agent in to a prisoner to communicate with him in the prison?

MR. MATTHEWS: The Question refers to Tracy. Tracy is a surety prisoner, and, according to the ordinary prison rules, he is entitled to receive a visit, I think once a week, and the practice of the Prison Commissioners in England is, with that frequency and not more, to admit any solicitor or other visitor to see a prisoner, provided the prisoner does not object to see him.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Do I understand from the Home Secretary that the visits made by friends of the prisoner under these rules are construed to mean a visit of an Irish constable under the order of a solicitor?

MR. MATTHEWS: There is nothing in the rules to prevent an Irish constable from visiting any prisoner.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Has the attention of the Chief Secretary for Ireland been called to the answer of the Home Secretary—namely, that Preston, an Irish constable, at the instance of Mr. Soames, as private solicitor for a paper called the Times, and acting under his instructions, visited a particular prisoner, and took his statement? I wish to know how that came to be, and what it is that brings Head Constable Preston to London?

MR. MATTHEWS: The hon. Member has mistaken my answer. The person I mentioned who came as the representative of Mr. Soames was a visitor of Tracy, and not Mullett.

MR. T. M. HEALY: How comes it that Head Constable Preston, an Irish constable, at the instance of Mr. Soames, visits any prisoner?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not see, on the face of it, the cogency of the Question. The hon. Gentleman ought to put the Question on the Paper.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I do not wish to misunderstand the Home Secretary. Do I understand him to say that this constable visited Tracy at his (Tracy's) own request and desire, which is what is meant by the prison rules?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have no information on that subject.

MR. M'CARTAN: Was the application made by Mr. Soames or by Preston, and was Preston's interview in the presence of a warder or not?

MR. A. B. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucester, Cirencester): I wish to ask whether any private solicitor, practising in England, may employ a constable to visit a prisoner for the purpose of getting evidence?

MR. MATTHEWS: The application to visit was made by Mr. Soames. In regard to the person whom the solicitor employed, solicitors are not, of course, entitled to the services of police constables while they are on duty.

MR. M'CARTAN: Did the visit take place in the presence of a warder?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am not informed whether the interview was in the presence of a warder.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I wish to know whether you can inform me that a warrant or subpoena from the Special Commission can produce Irish prisoners from the Irish gaols practically without habeas corpus? I wish to know whether we can see these orders? Are they at the Home Office, or at any place where inspection can be had, or has Mr. Soames got them?

MR. MATTHEWS: The Home Office acts at the request of the Lords Justices of Ireland. The only information I have from the Lord Lieutenant is to inform me that certain persons were required to be witnesses in England, and I was requested to name an officer to receive them and keep them in safe custody while here.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Is there power under the Special Commission to issue habeas corpus?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am afraid I must ask for notice of that Question. As I read the Act, I think it is clear that the Special Commissioners have the same powers as a Judge of any of the High Courts of Justice.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I wish to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether any officials of the British Museum agreed to give evidence in the Special Commission Court of the genuineness of the letters now admitted to be forgeries; if so, who those officials were; upon what terms they agreed to give such evidence; and whether the acceptance of such engagements was compatible with their official obligations?

MR. JACKSON: The Treasury has no information, nor have I, of the circumstances referred to in the hon. Member's Question; but I have learnt from the authorities of the British Museum that two members of the staff were consulted on behalf of the Times as experts. They acted, however, entirely in their private capacity, and entirely in their own time.

MR. SEXTON: I will call attention to the subject on the Vote.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I would ask the Home Secretary on whose authority

Mr. Robert Anderson handed confidential papers in his possession, in his official capacity, to a man calling himself Le Caron (a witness for the Times newspaper), to be taken away by him and examined and used by Le Caron and Mr. Houston?

MR. MATTHEWS: Mr. Anderson's action in the matter referred to by the right hon. Gentleman was without my cognizance; but, so far as I am acquainted with the circumstances of the case, he acted in accordance with what was due to the Special Commission. I am informed that Mr. Anderson has been summoned as a witness before the Commission, and his evidence will no doubt fully explain his conduct.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Did the Commission direct Mr. Anderson to hand over confidential papers to Le Caron through Houston?

MR. MATTHEWS: No, Sir. I conveyed nothing of the kind, and did not intend to say anything of the kind.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Then he did hand over the papers without authority from the Commission or the Home Secretary.

MR. MATTHEWS: I have nothing to add to the answer I gave.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I do not wish the Home Secretary to add anything. I ask him to say something.

MR. H. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the Attorney General whether the following words are correctly reported in "Hansard," vol. 329, p. 426, as used by him in debate upon the Parnell Commission Bill, second reading, July 24, 1888:—

"That whole case (the 'O'Donnell v. Walter' suit) which I opened, I was prepared to prove, and if I am counsel for the Times again, shall be prepared to prove. The evidence (is) available when it is wanted, but I should be unworthy of my position if I allowed myself to use it for any other purposes."

And whether, in his opening speech in the case of "O'Donnell v. Walter," he did not include the fac simile letter now proved to have been a forgery? I will supplement that by the following:—Whether he took any steps to repudiate responsibility thrust upon him by his client, Mr. Walter, in the article in the Times of July 7, which stated that these charges against Mr. Parnell were formulated by the head of the English Bar, which was a guarantee that in his Committee to consider Police and Sanitary Regulations.

THE SPECIAL COMMISSION.

MR. J. T. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): I wish to ask, Sir, whether it is a fact that the libels contained in "Parnellism and Crime" are still being sold at Messrs. Smith and Son's book-stalls at railway stations?

MR. W. H. SMITH: I appeal to you, Sir, and to the House, whether, whatever differences of opinion exist, it is right that such a Question should be asked of me?

THE DEBATE ON THE ADDRESS— PERSONAL EXPLANATION—

MR. MORLEY.

MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle): I desire, Sir, by the indulgence of the House, to correct something which I said in the course of my remarks on Monday last. I was referring to occurrences in Killarney, and which related to something affecting Col. Turner. I have this morning received a letter from Col. Turner, which I hope I shall be allowed to read. It is as follows:—

"Dear Mr. MORLEY,—You are reported as having said in the House of Commons last night that I, from a garret window, ordered the police to charge, and that four policemen, armed, did charge in a most unmerciful manner, using their rifles as clubs. As it is absolutely without foundation that I ever gave such an order, directly or indirectly, you will, I have no doubt, see the propriety of correcting your statement."

Of course, I accept Col. Turner's statement, and I regret that I was misled.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): With reference to the letter which has just been read, I wish to ask whether, as every word stated by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle can be proved, and as Col. Turner did give the order referred to, the Government will grant a sworn inquiry into the circumstances of the case?

The Question was unanswered.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HER MAJESTY'S MOST GRACIOUS SPEECH.

Order read for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [21st February]—[See page 41.]

And which Amendment was,

In paragraph 8, line 4, to leave out all the words after the word "Country," to the end of the paragraph, in order to insert the words,—“But we humbly represent to Your Majesty that the present system of administration in Ireland is harsh, oppressive, and unjust, that it violates the rights and alienates the affections of Your Majesty's Irish Subjects, and is viewed with reprobation and aversion by the people of Great Britain :

“And we humbly represent to Your Majesty that such measures of conciliation should be adopted as may bring about the contentment of the Irish people, and establish a real union between Great Britain and Ireland,”—
(Mr. John Morley)

—instead thereof.

Question again proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question.”

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, C.): Mr. Speaker, I had not quite con-
MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Mid Lothian): My first duty, Sir, is to thank the hon. and learned Member for Longford for his great courtesy in according me an opportunity of addressing the House at this time which I should not otherwise have enjoyed, and now, Sir, I observe, in the first place, there are three main issues raised for discussion by the Amendment which has been moved by my right hon. Friend. The first of them is this—that he called upon us entirely to disclaim, and as strongly as possible, the present system of administration in Ireland. The second is that he asserts this system of administration to be viewed with reprobation and aversion by the people of Great Britain. The third is that we are asked to represent to Her Majesty that measures of conciliation should be adopted, meaning, I believe, measures of conciliation in the administration of the country, but undoubtedly also measures of legislative conciliation. With regard to the measures of legislative conciliation upon which I propose to touch in the first instance, I feel, for my own part, that perhaps we seem to owe some apology to the people of Ireland for having allowed the great questions connected with the domestic government of that country to remain unnoticed, or without, at any rate, any definitive notice in Parliament during the whole of the existence of the present House of Commons. The reasons of this reticence and abstention I take to have been these—in the first place a remarkable self-denial on the part of those who are known as Nationalist Members representing Ireland; and in the second place a very great desire on the part of those who are representatives of the British people to make progress in British legislation; and in the third place I cannot omit to state, as that without which the previous motives might perhaps have been insufficient, that we are tolerably well satisfied with the progress which, without Motions in this House, the question has made in the opinions and favour of the country. But now, Sir, we have been told in a speech of considerable authority that my right hon. Friend has been altogether wrong in assailing the administration of the Government in Ireland, and that our duty was to have propounded the legislative measures which we deem necessary for the welfare of the country, including, of course, in the first place the measure we should desire to see adopted for the purpose of giving to that country control of its own domestic affairs. This is the claim of my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham. I shall endeavour to examine the validity and equity of that claim, but I wish to point out that if we had taken that course, undoubtedly the effect must have been to draw attention away from the very facts we wish to bring into prominent notice in connection with the present Government of Ireland; and, likewise, it must have been to afford the broadest grounds for an immediate appeal to the majority, to this effect—"You are simply discussing the question of Home Rule in Ireland, which you were sent to this Parliament to oppose." But, Sir, the Amendment moved by my right hon. Friend, in referring to measures of legislation, proceeds upon the basis that measures of legislation were, at the General Election, countenanced and promised, not only by us, but by those who are now the Government, and by those who are now the most effective supporters of the Government. Why have not they brought forward these measures? Our contention was that all those promises which were given would vanish into thin air, and that contention has been miserably fulfilled, in no case more conspicuously than in that of my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham. The counter contention which carried the country and incapacitated us from the direction of affairs—the counter contention was that those who opposed the grant of Home Rule as a thing dangerous to the supremacy of the Empire were prepared for the extension of local liberties in Ireland, and for that extension in such terms and to such an extent as did undoubtedly raise very seriously for our consideration whether, when such measures were proposed, though they might fall short of what we believed to be requisite, yet we ought not thankfully to accept them as an instalment, at any rate, of justice, and as fraught with partial advantage to the Irish people. That, Sir, is the object of the Amendment of my right hon. Friend, and that is the question which has been, I will not say evaded—it is not evaded—but treated in a peculiar manner, by my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham. Now, Sir, what said he upon this subject? Our Amendment is an invitation for the production of those measures which were postponed from 1886 to 1887, which were postponed from 1887 to 1888, which were postponed from 1888 to 1889, and which, according to the Speech from the Throne, are now again postponed from 1889 to 1890. Well, Sir, some of the more courageous among that band to which my right hon. Friend belongs occasionally wind up their courage to so high a point that they say that measures of Local Government and privilege for Ireland ought not to be indefinitely postponed. My hon. Friend the Chairman of Committees the other night, being in a valiant mood, he, too, I think, declared that those measures should not be indefinitely postponed. Let me do justice to the noble Lord the Member for Paddington, who said they ought not to be postponed at all, but that they ought to have accompanied the harsh and severe legislation against Ireland you have introduced. But, passing from that just tribute to the noble Lord, let me ask what is the meaning of "indefinitely postponed"? Evidently it is a phrase of considerable elasticity. It has already done such good service that it has postponed to the year 1890 everything in the nature of privilege to Ireland, everything in the direction of self-government. Well, Sir, it is not for me to interpret that phrase, but I am shrewdly inclined to suspect that the meaning of it is that this Parliament has nothing to do with such measures, but that in a future Parliament possibly those gentlemen who term themselves Liberal Unionists may be inclined seriously to consider them. Well, Sir, the present votes of that portion of the House of Commons are matters of extreme interest and importance. We have looked for them with the utmost anxiety; we admit the vast effect that they have produced; we recognize the fact that they are the true pillars, the only effectual mainstay of the present policy; and, therefore, recognizing their power, we pay them the compliment which is their due. But that is with regard to the importance of the votes that they give and the influence which they exercise in the present Parliament. With regard to their votes in the next Parliament—I do not speak of anyone in particular, and least of all do I speak of my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham; but speaking of that body of 70 Gentlemen who now convert the Tory minority into a large majority of the House, and secure the charter of that Government—with respect to that body of Gentlemen, I must own that, whether it be owing to the obtuseness of my perceptions or not, I regard the manner in which they will vote in the next Parliament as a question of the smallest possible importance. I come to the argument of my right hon.

Friend, who faced this question about the promises of legislation that have been made, and gave the reason which, in his judgment, had set aside the force of those promises, and his reason was this—that the agitation in Ireland had been resolved upon with a view of making the government of Ireland impossible. With regard to making the government of Ireland impossible, we are told that the government of Ireland has been splendidly and remarkably successful, and there appears to the ordinary understanding to be some difficulty in reconciling those contending phrases. The meaning, however, I take to be, when we part from rhetorical phrases, that there was an intention to place difficulties in the way, and to raise excitement in Ireland, which would render the task of governing that country more arduous than it need otherwise have been. Now, what have those difficulties been? I admit that there have been difficulties placed in the way; I do not doubt it for a moment; but what have those difficulties been? Difficulties in connection with the question of Irish land. And who has placed those difficulties in the way? No one more than my right hon. Friend. Let my assertion be tested as I am endeavouring to test his. In 1886 the Parliament met under the auspices of the present Government. The land difficulty in Ireland was then fully before us. A large number of rents were known to be impossible to pay, and in order to meet that difficulty every suggestion was made on this side of the House. The Government were implored by so humble a person as myself to take the very moderate measure—I might say the almost insignificantly small measure—of introducing a Bill to give time for the payment of those rents until the inquiries of the Commission should be concluded. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Cork went boldly to the front and to the root of the evil, and proposed a Bill for the very purpose of removing this great land difficulty and meeting the case of vast numbers of tenants known and admitted to be unable to pay their actual rents. What was the course taken by the Government? What was the course taken by my noble Friend who has just entered (Lord Hartington), and by my right hon. Friend beside him (Mr. Chamberlain). It was this—

to refuse to take any measure whatever, and to oppose and throw out on the second reading the Bill proposed by the hon. Member for Cork. They, therefore, were the creators of the land difficulty, and if the government of Ireland has been rendered impossible, it was by their action that that impossibility was created. So much for the temporary difficulty arising out of the crisis of 1886. But then there was the Land Question. Who is it that has neglected the Land Question? Were impediments placed in the way of the Government in that great undertaking? On the contrary, I am in the recollection of the House when I state my clear remembrance that at the commencement of the Session of 1888 the hon. Member for Cork spoke to this effect—

“You are in the habit of saying that the Irish Question is the Land Question; that there is no national question of serious moment apart from the Land Question. Then settle the Land Question, and test your own doctrine and your own declarations, and when the Land Question is settled, then the national question will dwindle into insignificance.”

Every effort was used to induce the Government to settle that question. They made no effort whatever, and it is under those circumstances and when the difficulty of the present distress was met by an actual proposal from the Irish Members and when the whole of this side of the House, the whole at least of the Liberal Members on this side, urged the Government to settle the Land Question, when the Government themselves have done nothing except what is admitted does not settle the Land Question, and when they have taken no measure to effect that settlement, and when they have actually refused to entertain proposals to deal with the distress of 1886, then it is that my right hon. Friend thinks it equitable, rational, and just to charge upon the Irish Members that they, forsooth, have created the difficulty of governing Ireland. No, Sir; it was created by those who, when the facts of the distress of 1886 were patent and clear, obstinately refused to deal with them. Of course that refusal was followed by the Plan of Campaign. Yes, of course; the Plan of Campaign was the direct and necessary offspring. I have never vindicated it, or vindicated breach of the law in any shape or form whatever, but I have said this, and will say it again, that there are many cases in which the law-makers are far more responsible and far more guilty than the law-breakers, and this is one of them. From the evidence I possess, more good than evil, more peace than disturbance, and greatly more, have followed from the Plan of Campaign. But, whether that be correct or not, if the Plan of Campaign has been the unmixed mischief which you describe it to have been, it is the majority of this House, and especially it is those on this side of the House who make up that majority, that are responsible for that Plan, because, when the facts were patent and the proposal was pressed upon them, they obstinately refused either to legislate themselves or to allow others to legislate. And what does my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham do now? He says, in very conciliatory tones, that he is most anxious for the settlement of the Land Question. Well, Sir, when I heard my right hon. Friend say that, I anticipated with the utmost confidence what his next sentence must necessarily be, that it could only be a fervid appeal to Her Majesty's Government—to point out the splendid position in which they stand; to point out that they have a majority in this House which still is a large majority: that they have a minority in the House most anxious to promote the settlement of the Land Question; and therefore I considered that my right hon. Friend must necessarily in his next sentence apply to those who in the first place possess the indispensable condition of official information, and who, in the next place, possess the indescribable pleasure of the confidence of my right hon. Friend. My astonishment rose, I must say, to the very highest point when my right hon. Friend turned pointedly to me, and exhorted me, forsooth! representing what he often calls a discomfited and discredited minority; me, forsooth! divested of all opportunities of information which are absolutely necessary for a settlement of the Land Question; me, forsooth! to make this effort. I began to think—Am I, then, the person who is so happy as to possess the political confidence of my right hon. Friend? I think, Sir, I have shown that the responsibility for the land difficulties in Ireland, and the agitation connected with them, does not lie with the men who made the first, and the most strenuous, and the most eager efforts to dispose of that difficulty in 1886 when it might have been averted; that the responsibility of an unsettled Land Question necessarily lies with the majority of this House, especially in the case where that majority would have had the willing assistance of the minority to attain its object. Well, Sir, but pray recollect that this interposition of the difficulty in Ireland, this making the government of Ireland impossible, is the whole and the sole plea under cover of which my right hon. Friend and those who act with him have retreated from every pledge that they have made. This is their plea, the shallow plea, the paltry plea, the untrue plea, the plea which is the direct reverse of the fact that the difficulties of the Government in Ireland have been created by a majority, and the efforts of the minority to meet the case have been defeated by the majority. These are the circumstances under which all those brilliant and copious promises have been dispersed and dissipated. My right hon. Friend (Mr. Chamberlain), who is himself, I think, the most prolific parent of one scheme after another, has around him the greatest multitude of these shattered and ruined promises, all of which, perhaps, some day he will have picked off from the ground and cast into his waste paper basket. When I think of that case, of the engagements undertaken in regard to Ireland in 1886 in order to get rid of the Home Rule policy and the Home Rule Ministry, and of the manner in which those engagements have been disregarded and trampled wantonly under foot, I recollect that there is a place which is said to be paved with good intentions. It occurs to my mind that if at any time, in repairing the pavement of that place, a deficiency in the supply of these good intentions should be felt, they can fill the place and make up the deficiency with broken Irish promises, of which the supply will be inexhaustible, and of which the material will do just as well. Now, this Amendment is an invitation to the majority of this House to produce their legislation. It is an implied pledge that this legislation if produced, though we may think it insufficient, will have our fair and candid consideration. But it is also an invitation which, if disregarded, will tend still further to expose in the eyes of the country the utter hollowness and the utter shallowness of the pretexts which have been set up, and the real determination of those who constitute the present majority—on whichever side of the House they sit—to do nothing in redemption of the pledges which have been made by the majority, and the pledges which gave to them the control of the destinies of Ireland. Now I must take a brief notice—and it shall only be a brief notice—of the second point raised in the Resolution. That is to say, we assume the responsibility of declaring, and of inviting the House to declare, that this policy which now prevails is viewed with reprobation and aversion by the people of Great Britain. My right hon. Friend contested this proposition, and gave us his own opinion of the views of the people of Great Britain, tested, as he said, by the moderate diminution which has taken place in the numbers of the majority now ruling the House since the General Election. That majority, which stood originally, I believe by confession, at 117, now stands at 93; and my right hon. Friend considers that so satisfactory a state of things that he says he is not aware of any occasion on which a Government—I think he said a Government, but I am not sure whether he did not mean a Government with which he has been connected—has suffered so little in the period—namely, two-and-a-half years. Well, Sir, I differ entirely from my right hon. Friend. I think that that is a serious diminution in the majority. But the importance or the non-importance of that diminution is not tested by the figures themselves. Ninety-three is a very large majority. It may prove to be perfectly adequate to sustain the fortunes of the Government for a considerable time yet to come. But my right hon. Friend says that the bye-elections, as they are called, afford no real or substantial key to the opinions of the country. What can these bye-elections mean? How far have they gone? This I believe to be entirely indisputable. Since the end of August, 1886, 60 constituencies have pronounced their judgment upon the policy of Her Majesty's Government, either once or more than once. In cases where they have pronounced more than once, such as Burnley, the seat which was won against a Liberal in 1886, was won by a Liberal within the last few days. But I entreat the House to listen to what is a very simple and, I believe, a perfectly clear and undeniable statement. I, in this statement, divide the House entirely as Home Rulers and anti-Home Rulers, as being clearly the most convenient method of distinction. In 1886 these 60 constituencies returned 23 Home Rulers and 37 anti-Home Rulers. These 60 constituencies now return 30 of each. My right hon. Friend says that this is a very insignificant change. The proportion of 37 to 23, according to the arithmetic of my right hon. Friend, differs only immaterially from the proportion of 30 to 30. But the fact which the House ought to observe is this—that the choice of these constituencies depends, in some degree, upon the impartiality of pale death, who knocks with equal foot at the door of the cottage and upon the fortresses of kings; but it depends also, in some degree, upon the choice of Government. This choice has, no doubt, under the direction and advice of the highly esteemed Gentleman who directs that department of the affairs of the Government, been judiciously made; but I want to point out by indisputable facts that these 60 constituencies form a sample of the House of Commons not insufficient in quantity and in quality, most unduly favourable to Her Majesty's Government. They are not insufficient in quantity, because the amount is one-eleventh part of the entire constituencies of the country. But in quality, how stand they? They returned, being an eleventh part of the constituency, in 1886 a majority of 14 for the Government. Had the whole country been of the same complexion it would have returned a majority, on 11 times the number of constituencies, 11 times as large—that is to say, that the majority of 117 would, if these constituencies had been a fair sample of the whole, have been 154. I do not think hon. Gentlemen opposite will pick a hole in that arithmetic; and if they would like one other indication I will give them it. What was the representation of these constituencies in 1885? In those happy days we Liberals were all of one mind; and I am going to put with the Liberals, for the purposes of this computation, the Irish Nationalists of that day, who, unhappily, were not altogether at the moment of the election in the same way as ourselves. They had been offered such inducements, such marks of confidence, from hon. Gentlemen opposite, and especially from their most distinguished Leaders, that they were for a moment seduced by these favours, which are not, I think, very likely to be at present or for a very long time renewed. Well, here is a singular fact, and I speak of these constituencies and of no other. What did these constituencies do in 1885? After the General Election of 1885 there were 250 Tories in the House, and there were 420 Gentlemen who were not Tories; and yet these 60 constituencies returned in 1885 33 Tories, whereas of Liberals, Dissident Liberals, and Home Rulers they returned only 27. I think I have made good my statement that, if it be true that these by-elections are a very imperfect indication of the sense of the country, the reason of their being imperfect in these 60 constituencies is that they would, if taken alone, have returned a most striking answer, yet not one nearly so striking or nearly so condemnatory of the Irish policy of the present Government, as the whole country would, if it had the opportunity of doing it. Well, now, we are told of a great improvement in Ireland, and we all, in our own way, rejoice in that improvement. I must own myself rather surprised when I find that the increase of agricultural values is coolly set down to the credit of Her Majesty's Government. Undoubtedly in 1886, when there was a tremendous depression of those values, I am not aware that anyone set down the depression to the discredit of the Tory Government. I push lightly aside the preposterous pretensions that are now founded on this increase in agricultural values, including railway traffic, which of course in Ireland depends mainly upon agriculture. Doubtless there is another improvement in Ireland of which we may well congratulate ourselves—an improvement with regard to crime. But as to that crime I shall have presently to draw a distinction. There is unquestionably an improvement, and a great improvement, with regard to the substantial crime, with regard to the atrocious crime, and with regard to the crime generally menacing to society. You say it is consequence of Coercion. Of that we shall have more to say by and by, but I wish now to express my firm conviction that it is directly the reverse. It is a consequence of the efforts made by those in whom the Irish people have confidence that they have abstained from crime; it is a consequence of the hope and confidence definitely and confidently reposed—perhaps for the first time—in the people of Great Britain. This is a matter which remains for argument, and I shall endeavour by - and - bye to throw further light upon it. In the meantime I want to say that here, as upon all occasions, we suffer, and suffer most seriously, from the apparent reluctance of the Government to supply us, and above all to supply us in time, with information exhibiting the real state of things in Ireland. Crime shows, apparently, a large diminution. I deduct threatening letters, because it is better to do so for the purpose of getting at the heart of the case, and then I find that in 1886 there were 512 reported agrarian crimes in Ireland; in 1887 there were 469; and in 1888 there were 386. Now arises the question what has this so-called Crimes Act, an Act called the Crimes Act because it really had nothing to do with crime—what has the so-called Crimes Act to do with this decrease of crime? Looking over the reports of these agrarian charges, you will find there are 20 columns of reports, and there are but three of these columns that are in the slightest degree within the purview of the so-called Crimes Act. It has nothing to do judicially and legally with crime except in a few particulars. What are those particulars? As far as I can make out, there are only three categories of agrarian crime upon which the Crimes Act can be brought to bear. These are intimidation, riot, and forcible possession. The crimes of these descriptions numbered 122 in 1886 and 69 in 1888. I want to know what has become of all those crimes which have been shifted out of the higher Courts under the machinery of the Crimes Act, and which are now dealt with under that Act as matters of summary jurisdiction? Can the Government give me this assurance—that every case of intimidation, every case of riot, and every case of forcible possession which is included in the Returns under the Crimes Act is also included in the Agrarian Returns? If they cannot, it is evident that we are open to this danger—that a multitude of cases which would have appeared, and which ordinarily do appear, in Agrarian Returns, have been removed from our notice, our privity, and our investigation by being disposed of by way of summary jurisdiction before the Resident Magistrates. We heard yesterday from the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. A. J. Balfour) that there were in 1888 137 convictions for intimidation, 164 for riot, and 50 for forcible possession, making in all 351. But the whole Return of agrarian offences under these three heads was in 1886 only 122. We are aware that the number of cases reported will probably be smaller than the number of convictions named to us by the right hon. Gentleman, because more than one person may have been engaged in a number of cases, but, prima facie and until the matter is explained, we have no evidence at all in these Returns of any decrease in crime in regard to crimes with which the Crimes Act deals. The decrease is in crime outside the Crimes Act; and apparently, as far as the evidence goes, in those descriptions which are touched by the Crimes Act—intimidation, riot, and forcible possession—there has not been a decrease, but there has probably been even an increase of crime. Be that as it may, the satisfaction with which we admit a decrease of the more serious crime is an unqualified satisfaction, and we adhere with firmness to our belief as to what is the cause of it. It is said by my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) that this aspect of the case is altogether too thin and too small—that the field opened up by the Amendment is too narrow. Is that really the case? What do we challenge? We challenge, on the part of the Government, the total abandonment, and, virtually, the total prohibition of all attempts at measures on behalf of the local liberties of Ireland. We challenge the Coercion Act, as well as the administration of that Act. We challenge it upon the old grounds, confirmed, strengthened, and enlarged

by what is daily taking place. We challenge it as condemned by the people; we challenge it as introduced for the first time in defiance of the Irish protest that there was not what may be called a surfeit of agrarian crime. There is no instance on record of the introduction of such a measure in defiance of Irish protest, at any period known to me in our history, without a surfeit of agrarian crime; and small as is my faith, derived from experience, in the coercive system, I recognize the broad and vital distinction which would be established by the presence or absence of such a state of things. And, further, we challenge this Act as being in this respect entirely a new-fangled Act aimed not at crime at all, but aimed at combination—at combination which is the only weapon in the hands of the poor for adjusting their grievances, at combination which is expressly protected and sanctioned by the law of England, Scotland, and Wales. That is a broad challenge. We challenge, perhaps most of all, the doctrine laid down by the Government and frankly avowed by the Irish Secretary, but which is avowed by none of those near me, that Ireland is best governed by Coercion—of course, I do not mean for all time or for all eternity—but that Ireland is best governed by Coercion now. I have no doubt that the right hon. Gentleman himself cherishes a hope that there will be some period between this time and the Day of Judgment when the Coercion Act may be repealed; but for actual Ireland, Ireland as she is, he frankly avows that Coercion is the proper mode of government. And his distinct avowal is not to be cancelled by a shake of the head. He told us that Local Government is an excellent thing when people are prepared for it; and the withholding of Local Government I call Coercion. This I call part of the system of Coercion—not the most direct and vital part, but a serious and important part of it. We are told in the Queen's Speech that coercive measures have improved the condition of Ireland, and therefore Ireland is to be governed by them. These are the propositions which we challenge, and I think they are broad enough, if not for the capacious minds of the Dissident Liberals, at any rate for the limited faculties of ordinary mortals such as the discomfited and discredited

Party who now occupy these benches. We are told in bland and soothing tones that perhaps we have got a case for inquiry. I have here a report of a speech made by my hon. Friend the Chairman of Committees (Mr. Courtney) so long ago as October, 1887. He, as an upright man, was shocked at the facts disclosed about Mitchelstown, but he took no heed of the circumstance that everything that had been done by the authorities at Mitchelstown was defended and glorified in by the Government. He took no heed of that, as he takes no heed now of the language of the Government in regard to all their worst acts which we charged upon the Administration in Ireland. But still he was shocked at the facts, and said there ought to be inquiry. He said—"There must be inquiry, and I may go a little further, and promise you that there shall be inquiry." That was the promise of my hon. Friend; and he is a man of his word; there is no more sincere and upright man; but the most sincere, upright, and courageous man cannot for a moment contend against the limitations and fetters of the position he has chosen for himself. What is the use of saying that there ought to be inquiry, of saying that there must be inquiry, and of saying that there shall be inquiry, when you know that so often as the Tory Government choose to say, "It is a question of our holding office to maintain the Union, or of letting in others to relax the Union," as they call it, there is no choice? I am very glad my hon. Friend shakes his head and so does my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham. But I must ask my hon. Friend the Chairman of Committees, who is so admirably placed, and has such great influence from his character for impartiality, why, having promised his constituents that inquiry there should be, he did not move for such inquiry?

MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin): I certainly made the declaration quoted by my right hon. Friend, and I made it with the fullest confidence that he would move for such inquiry. It appeared to me at the time and it appears to me still that that would be the logical and Parliamentary consequence of the action he has taken. If he or anyone sitting beside him had made that Motion

I should have voted for it; and if any right hon. Gentleman opposite had resisted it by saying it was a question of the Union, I should have laughed in his face.

MR. GLADSTONE: My right hon. Friend, it appears, makes a promise on my behalf. He says he made this statement in the belief that I would bring forward such a Motion, and, believing that I would do it, he entered into this promise with his constituents. My right hon. Friend is an able, a prudent, and experienced man, and he had no doubt of our action. But you will observe on this and questions such as these that when a question arises as to which these Gentlemen are deeply committed, some question upon which they have pledged themselves to their constituents in the open face of day—then, when they know that their vote against the Government on that subject will be totally insignificant and be harmless to Her Majesty's Government, they come forward with great independence and record their votes, just as in former days an occasional Tory used to vote for the ballot when he knew there was a preponderating majority against it. This is a very ancient form of Parliamentary strategy which really requires no further consideration. This observation applies to my right hon. Friend on my right hand, and on my left the Member for West Birmingham. The plain meaning of it is this—with all his projects, plans, and schemes—some compute that he has launched some five-and-twenty of them—but in matter of figures I seek to be careful; and, believing there may be some exaggeration, I will not say even if he has turned the score—but whatever the number, it does not signify a rush—1, 2, 3 plan—A, B, C, D, all the alphabet down to Z—down they must all go, the moment Her Majesty's Government gives the order that the Union is endangered. My hon. Friend the Chairman of Committees says that I ought to have moved for this inquiry. Now in these matters I think I am a little more cautious, even a little more Parliamentary, than my hon. Friend supposes. Before I move for a Committee of Inquiry, I want to be assured of my ground for so doing. I am not willing to proceed on newspaper reports alone, and in the Mitchel-town case, and in almost every other case, we have asked, begged, entreated, and besought the Government to give us officially the facts, but without result. [Several hon. MEMBERS: Dopping.] Being unable to get the facts and thus make this preliminary step, no doubt I have abstained from bringing a Motion forward for a Committee of Inquiry. What is such a Motion? My hon. Friend talks as if it were an easy matter. What would have happened? In the first place there was no evening on which such a thing could be done; and secondly, if, as necessary for the purpose, a day were asked for, could I go from Mitchelstown and Killeagh to Kinsella—from one case to another, asking for a Committee for each? What would have been said? It would have been said: Here is patent palpable obstruction. Now, with regard to this point, I desire to make one observation. During the Session of 1888 we rendered to the Government the most important services it was in our power to render in the prosecution of public business, but whenever I read the speeches of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite, I found that they were either silent as to the assistance we rendered or actually charged us with obstruction. What would have happened had I brought forward such a Motion as my hon. Friend suggests? There would have been vehement charges against us of obstruction. Nobody but partizans and bigots believe them for a moment; but they confuse the issue, and draw off the mind of the people from the grand question before us—namely, the question of the fortunes and the fate of Ireland. Our object is to have this issue clear, and therefore I will not, unnecessarily, expose myself to such charges. But, Sir, most of these cases have been cases of prison treatment; that has been the great subject—the greatest, I think—of discussion, anxiety, and misgiving in this House. What has happened in respect to prison treatment? When the Coercion Bill was under discussion in Committee, notice was given on this side of the House of a new clause, which would have provided that all persons convicted under the Act should be treated as first-class misdemeanants, and so disposed of this whole matter. What became of that clause? It was closed out. And what has happened since, whenever complaint has been made of the prison treatment of any prisoner? Her Majesty's Government have not only refused inquiry, but have adopted the thing complained of. It is now too late to grant any Parliamentary inquiry. That would have been very well while judgment was not foreclosed. The heaviest matter of accusation has been adopted by Her Majesty's Government as matter of praise and commendation. Yes; the time for inquiry has gone by; the issue is fairly joined, and we ask the verdict of the country upon it. Now, I own I heard with some pain the remarks of my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham upon prison treatment. He, too, adopted the course not only of minimizing the complaints that have been made, but of indulging in something very near jeering at these cases of prison discipline, matters of cutting hair, refusal to be weighed, and the like. Well, this business of cutting the hair would have been of smaller importance, perhaps, fifty years ago; but if the business of involuntary hair cutting is to be applied impartially in all cases, I do not know what section may escape disagreeable consequences. In my opinion, to enforce compliance in these cases is, in the first place, totally against the spirit of the prison rule. The prison rule recognizes the necessity of cutting the hair for purposes of health and cleanliness. In these cases nobody pretends that the cutting of the hair or the prison dress are necessary in the interest of health and cleanliness; and if the practice is not necessary for such purposes it becomes a personal indignity, and ought not to be inflicted on Members of Parliament or Irish priests, or anybody else, and when it has been inflicted it ought not to be made light of by men in our station. Now, I put these charges together. I am not going to be entangled in arguments as to what are and are not political offences. I know very well you cannot attempt to frame a legislative definition of political offences; but what you can do, and what always has been done, is this—you can say that in certain classes of cases the imprisoned person ought not to be treated as if he had been guilty of base and degrading crime. What does the ordinary sentence of imprisonment import? The deprivation of literature and visitors—well, I am not quite sure whether it is not better to have visitors shut out than to have them sent in at the instance of somebody else for the convenience of somebody in a legal action—the plank bed, the prison dress, the odious, the disgraceful incident of the company of felons; there is the business of cleansing the cell, the clipping of the hair, and there is—and I refer to it as it has happened—the production of a prisoner in prison dress to give evidence in open Court, actually in sight of his constituents; within the precincts where he has obtained the confidence of the people, he is made to appear in a position of degradation. There is no need for any inquiry in cases such as these. They are adopted by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary and his Colleagues—and in their view they constitute the true and best permanent method of dealing with Ireland. Right hon. Gentlemen must know well that changes such as these violently imported into manners, habits, and conditions of life of hon. Members and others, must expose them in many cases; but the off-handed answer is that there is a prison doctor who will look after them. I do not enter into the facts of the statement made by the hon. Member for East Mayo as to the very different treatment in certain cases of prisoners who have been convicted of degrading crime, because the facts are disputed; and, consequently, I shall await elucidation, which, I take it, will be granted. But, Sir, I say that though sensitiveness to indignities of this kind may be a matter on which men will differ according to their temperament and their ideas, yet such sensitiveness is a sensitiveness rather to be encouraged than to be repressed, for it appertains to that lofty sentiment—that spirit which was described by Burke in immortal language when he said, "The spirit which feels a stain like a wound." Now, Sir, what are the merits of this case? Have we before us a Conservative Government or not? I know there is a Liberal Chancellor of the Exchequer. We cannot expect from him—he has been reared in such a bad school—much regard for precedent. But I take it for granted that the bulk of the Gentlemen opposite are bound to have regard for precedent. We condemn this prison treatment in the mass, and not because one man was not weighed and one man had his hair cut. We condemn it in the lump and in the gross, and as it is defended, vindicated, and justified, we decline to potter about Parliamentary inquiries, and we want to carry the issue to the country. Now, as for precedents, has there been a feeling on the part of different Governments in good times, aye, even in bad times, that offenders of the class and under the conditions I have described ought to be treated with leniency, consideration, forbearance, and indulgence? Yes, there has. I ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer to confute it. Let him confute the statement that Liberal and Conservative Governments have, until the present pseudo-Conservative one, endorsed these principles, and apply them first as to a Liberal Government. When the treatment of Mr. Harrington was discovered by Lord Spencer, he at once applied a remedy, although the Chief Secretary for Ireland has never yet had the grace or decency to make Lord Spencer an apology for what he has said upon the subject. He offered something instead of the apology, and said that he did not know and could not know; then, if he did not and could not know, why did he make a positive statement upon the subject? The right hon. Gentleman has no answer to make to that; he does not spring to his feet so lightly as my right hon. Friend near me. "His bosom's lord sits"—generally—"lightly on its throne!"—possibly not on every occasion. We protest against this prison treatment as being condemned by the country, and as being in itself unwise, inhuman, and brutal. I have not sought to multiply epithets of this kind, but I cannot altogether withhold them. Finally, I say, it is entirely contrary to the usage of other Governments. Now, I challenge the Chancellor of the Exchequer upon that question. What has been the usage of other Governments in this important respect? An hon. and learned Friend of mine, who sits behind me, adverted to this subject in a letter to the Times some time ago—a valuable letter—and I gave some attention to it. Take the case of Mr. Cobbett. He was in prison for a very serious offence in a most serious time—namely, in the most agonizing time of a great war. But he was treated with the utmost indulgence in prison, of which I could, if required, give the House some detail. Sir John Hobhouse was sent to prison, and he likewise was treated—both these by Tory Governments—with the utmost indulgence. Mr. Feargus O'Connor was sent to prison, and Lord Normanby, under a Liberal Government, wrote that nothing ought to be done—I forget the words, but this is the substance of them—which was harsh in itself, or which was injurious to his feelings. Mr. Smith O'Brien was imprisoned, and he was treated exactly on the same principle. Mitchel, after his condemnation, upon his voyage across the Atlantic, was treated with the utmost and peculiar leniency. But there was one case above all—a case in which I myself may not have been free from responsibility—but of course of a secondary kind, and that was the case of Mr. O'Connell. You say sometimes that the ringleaders are the men who ought to be severely punished; and you say, "Do not punish severely the unhappy victims whom they delude and mislead." And on that principle you attempt to justify what you are doing in defiance of all usage and precedent. Was O'Connell a ringleader or not? As Saul slew his thousands and David his tens of thousands, if Mr. W. O'Brien has addressed his thousands Mr. O'Connell addressed his hundreds of thousands. Was the offence of Mr. O'Connell in law a serious offence—an offence of the gravest character? He was condemned, I think, to one year's imprisonment or to pay a fine of £2,000. I am not quite sure whether it was the converse of that, but I think I am right, and to very heavy pecuniary recognizances for seven years, the imprisonment to be prolonged until those recognizances, which, I think, were for £10,000, were complied with. What was the condition of O'Connell in prison under those grave circumstances and for this grave offence? I will not read the whole details published by Sir Charles Gavan Duffy; but he says—

"When O'Connell arrived at Richmond Bridewell, the governor and deputy-governor were authorized to sublet their houses and gardens to the State prisoners. Members of Mr. O'Connell's family and of the families of the other prisoners came to reside with them. They employed their own servants from the first day. Presents of venison, game, fish, fruit, and the like flowed in upon them."

There is the statement that these men, under the Tory Government of Sir Robert Peel, enjoyed comfort and even luxury, such was the determination of the Tories in those days not to inflict upon them any indignities. Now we have a Government who, reversing all precedent as they despise all propriety, inflict upon these men, for offences which they have themselves created, and which they know are not esteemed to be offences at all by many persons in this House and by millions of people out of this House—they completely reverse and subvert ancient rules of action, and make themselves as responsible for these proceedings as if each one of them had proceeded from their own independent initiative. The Chief Secretary for Ireland has said that he is not responsible for the Prison Department, or that the Prison Department is not in his Department, and therefore that he has but a secondary responsibility for these matters; and the Solicitor General for Ireland, endeavouring with friendly hand to help out his right hon. Friend, said that they might alter the prison rules, but as long as they were rules they must be obeyed. Father Ryan was one of the first of the reverend gentlemen who fell into the clutches of the Government. When Father Ryan was dispensed from putting on prison dress were the prison rules altered? I think I am justified in saying that they were not. So it appears that without any cumbersome process of sub-legislation the Chief Secretary can do what he likes in such a matter. But the Chief Secretary says it is not in his Department. I never heard in my life, which has been a tolerably long one, a more frivolous and more ludicrous excuse. I have had the honour of holding for twelve or thirteen years the Office of Chancellor of the Exchequer in this country. I do not know how the case is with my right hon. Friend, but I may say that during those twelve or thirteen years, five-sixths of my work—probably nine-tenths—were not in my Department. Does the Chief Secretary think that a Member has no primary responsibility except for the routine work brought before him in the official mill? Why, the most important duties of a Member, especially of a Chancellor of the Exchequer and a Chief Secretary, sometimes lie entirely outside their Departments.

The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary is sometimes supposed to labour under a surfeit of bravery. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, I think, applied that epithet to him, and it has been reported so often that it must have become adhesive and can be no longer separated from him. Let me recommend him to exercise his bravery and expend part of the superfluity in owning that he is responsible for the prison rules. One other case I ought to have mentioned, the case of Mr. Davitt. He came under the view of my right hon. Friend near me (Sir W. Harcourt) as Home Secretary, and I can bear testimony to the fact that in point of decency and indulgence his treatment was everything that could reasonably be desired. Therefore I decline entirely to go back to the point at which we might very rationally have stood if this had been the first opening of this question, and to ask for a Parliamentary inquiry upon a matter upon which we have already the definite conclusions of the Government that they have adopted everything, even the worst and most disgraceful in these important particulars, in the established rules. The right hon. Gentleman and the Government have come to the conclusion that Ireland is best governed by Coercion. We hold exactly the reverse, and when my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham thinks this anxiety upon the administrative system in Ireland is but a narrow subject, I differ from him entirely. I doubt whether, if they knew Ireland, they would ever give utterance to such sentiments. It is the anti-national spirit lurking in the administrative system that constitutes the greatest immediate and pressing danger. History supplies us with a most interesting exhibition of the truth of the proposition I have stated. It is so interesting, and so important, that, though I will not detain the House by giving all the details, which I have made it my study to collect, yet I will at least give a sample from one period of Irish history in this century, which fairly brought to issue how much could be done even without remedial legislation to mitigate the condition of Ireland, and to attract the confidence of her people by good administration. It was in times much worse than these, in times when Ireland had not been relieved, as, thank God, she has now been relieved, of most of her very worst grievances; it was at a time when the Irish people were in a far greater degree than now, a crime-committing people. It was in the time of that eminent man whose name I am glad to sound through this House to the admiration, the gratitude, and the reverential appreciation of his countrymen, Thomas Drummond. In Dublin Castle from 1835 to 1840, when his life ebbed away, a sacrifice to his labours, to his incessant anxieties, and possibly to the calumnies and persecution to which he was subjected, Thomas Drummond not only sat at Dublin Castle, but for those years he walked Dublin Castle, and Dublin Castle came to be in those years in the mind of the Irish people the very reverse of what it is now. During those years the Melbourne Government was able to do nothing in the way of remedial legislation for Ireland, with the exception of the Poor Law Act, passed in 1838, when the time was nearly over. There was no remedial legislation for Ireland, but there was administration in a soothing, a conciliatory, and a national spirit. Thomas Drummond's system of conciliation in Ireland was defended with great skill and courage in the House of Commons by Lord Morpeth, and Viceroy, when occasionally attending in the House of Lords, used to defend it. It will be best understood when I say it was a system which in the main satisfied the desires and demands of O'Connell. What were the results of that system in Ireland? I want to bring to trial the issue whether Coercion is the proper means of putting down mischief and improving the condition of the country. What was done between 1835 and 1839? The question was the subject of inquiry by a hostile Committee sitting in the House of Lords, and the facts were clearly brought out. They were summed up under these heads—diminution of crime, confidence of the people in the law, aversion to crime, and measures taken to put down crime among the people themselves. In those days Lord Plunket, notwithstanding his great eloquence—I know that, in the opinion of Lord Russell, I should not be exaggerating if I said his unrivalled eloquence—was regarded by O'Connell as almost the plague spot of the Government; they were in sharp opposition; but he said in 1836, "I have never known Ireland in such a state of tranquillity as at this moment." What was the case with regard to crime? I give all the serious categories of crime—and I find that whereas in 1834 these crimes amounted to 4,289, in 1838, without the use of coercive powers, although I believe there were some coercive powers on the Statute Book, which could be used, they were reduced to 2,294. What was the attitude of the people towards the agents of the law? Well, it was this. A case happened in Tipperary—which was the great centre of criminal activity—a case happened where a police pensioner was murdered, and that police pensioner was a Protestant. The murderer fled, the police went after him, they brought him back, and Mr. Drummond bore testimony before the Lords' Committee that when the police brought back the murderer to the scene of the crime the people gathered together and cheered the police. Still more remarkable, in those days, in Tipperary a society was formed among the people for the prevention of crime. A society of whom? A society of peasants in Tipperary between 1834 and 1838. Its members entered into pledges one to another; inter alia, they were to communicate to a magistrate or some member of their own Committee any facts likely to lead to the prevention of outrage. But there was another thing. They were determined to discourage bad characters. But there was another thing they were to do—to refuse to employ such persons. If those who now exercise power exercised it then, those persons who associated together for this laudable purpose might themselves be brought before the removal judges of the right hon. Gentleman and imprisoned for six months with hard labour, on the ground of having entered into an illegal conspiracy of exclusive dealing. Such were the facts in the time of Thomas Drummond. There, as regards confidence, was confidence then in the Stipendiary Magistrates, confidence in the police, aversion to crime, diminution of crime to one-half, an increase, a considerable increase, in the proportion of convictions to committals. Is that the present state of the case? I say again the acts of Her Majesty's Government ought to be tested by their results. In my opinion, the right hon. Gentleman has succeeded in widening if it existed before, the breach between the people and the Constabulary. That such a breach now exists I cannot doubt for a moment. The confidence in the Stipendiary Magistrates which in Drummond's time was almost a vital principle of their life—where is it now? I am far from saying that the bulk of the Stipendiary Magistrates are either incompetent or unfair; but we say that men like Captain Seagrave, Mr. Cecil Roche, Mr. Gardiner, and some more whose names I am not anxious to unfold, are enough to destroy, and do destroy, the national confidence. Though the right hon. Gentleman shook his head when I said I feared there was now a breach between the people and the Constabulary, he does not shake his head when I say that I fear the confidence of the people in the Stipendiary Magistrates is greatly shaken, and in, I think, many cases almost gone. Ireland is governed now, almost for the first time in my experience, in flat contradiction to the opinions of five-sixths of her entire representation, and one-fourth of her entire representation have been within prison doors and sentenced under the Crimes Act. In what respect are such sentences valuable? They are not valuable on account of the pain they inflict; they are valuable on account of the moral effect they produce. You find it necessary to imprison a fourth of the whole Irish representation—I do not know the exact figures, but I believe I am not setting the number too high when I say that a fourth have been sentenced under the Crimes Act. Well, what is the effect of such sentences in a well-constituted country under a sound system of Government? A sentence of imprisonment marks the man upon whom it is passed as a man whom his neighbours ought to view, and generally do view, with misgiving. In Ireland it is distinctly the contrary—it is a title to public confidence. A prison is becoming under the rule of the present Government a temple of honour. We say now, what will not be doubted, if there were another General Election, and if there were presented to many Irish constituencies gentlemen as candidates of whom they know little, except that they had been imprisoned under the Crimes Act, they would be accepted with favour. I do not know whether the House recollect how this subject was handled in sarcastic verse by Lord Byron when Sir John Hobhouse was sent to prison. Lord Byron wrote—

“ Let Parliament send you to Newgate.
Newgate will send you to Parliament.”

That is literally true in relation to Irish feeling at this moment. But it is not Irish feeling only. Would an Irishman, an Irish criminal, be received in England just now with misgiving, or, at the very least, with suspicion and provisional condemnation? If they were men who were only known to have been sentenced by one of these notorious Magistrates under the Crimes Act, there is hardly a town in England or in Scotland where they would not be hailed with acclamation. And that is the state of things which the right hon. Gentleman and the Government have brought about, and upon which they found their title and their demand to the confidence of the House and the confidence of the country. Sir, as far as we are concerned, we shall go forward upon our course, I will not only say with unabated, but with daily-growing, confidence. To us, Sir, it matters not who is to lead. The strength lies not in the leader, but in the cause. Unfold the pages of history and see what, unaided, without support, sympathy, or confidence on this side of the water, Ireland has in other days, and through long generations of men, achieved for herself in shaking off her yoke and gradually establishing her title to honour and freedom. Alone she has done these things; alone she has made this enormous progress, ratified and crowned in 1782; is she likely now, if she did these things with her own right arm, either to recede or to fail of her purpose, when she has acquired the unhesitating support of a body in this country whom my noble Friend the Member for Rossendale (the Marquess of Hartington) has described, and only too modestly described, as possessed of half the voting power of the constituencies? Such is her power, such are her prospects; and is it to be supposed that half of the constituencies of this country really think, as you do not scruple to declare, that the union of the kingdoms ought to be destroyed and the supremacy of Parliament abolished? You know as well as we know that one moiety of all the constituencies firmly believe that in giving local liberty to Ireland they are giving life and permanence to the Union, and seeking to establish between the two countries such a state of things that, when it has once been brought into active existence, those who may have been its opponents will by degrees be ashamed of, and will at last forget, the resistance which they have offered to a most blessed and a most beneficial change. Now, I do not deny your power; you have the power in your hands aided by the Septennial Act—you have, perhaps, the power in your hands which will enable you to postpone the solution of this great controversy for two or three years. You have the power to continue to present lists of more than a thousand persons in prison under your so-called Crimes Act; to continue the state of things in which nearly one-sixth of the representatives in this House—say, one-seventh—are placed under ban and proscription, excluded from the service of the Crown, excluded from all those hopes which any other among us is entitled to entertain. You may deprive of its grace and of its freedom the act which you are asked to do. But avert that act you cannot. To prevent the consummation is utterly beyond your power. It seems to approach at an accelerated rate—come it slower or come it quicker, surely it is coming and will come. And you yourselves, many of you, must in your own breasts be aware that already you see in the handwriting on the wall the signs of coming doom.

*The CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): There are some words of the speech just delivered by the right hon. Gentleman in which we shall all cordially agree. The right hon. Gentleman said the Opposition had a cause, and that whoever the Leaders might be that cause would grow. We, too, are in the same position. We, too, have a cause, and, whatever the imperfections of the Leaders may be, we believe in our cause, in the maintenance of the Union with just as strong a belief as that expressed by the right hon. Gentleman in his. The right hon. Gentleman says we all know the act will come. What act? This great consummation! What consummation? The consummation is carefully concealed, not only from us, but from the supporters of the right hon. Gentleman. It is often interesting to watch how, when the right hon. Gentleman uses a phrase to content his supporters above the Gangway, there is immediately a significant abstention from cheering by hon. Members below the Gangway. I trust that the House will permit me, although still under the spell of the right hon. Gentleman, to attempt to follow him through the main portions of his speech. I do not propose to follow him in those extraordinary arithmetical problems with regard to bye-elections which he put before us. Hon. Members opposite will find that these figures will be answered. But I think there are far more important matters to deal with, and I should be sorry to devote to that question the time which was given to it by the right hon. Gentleman. There is one respect in which, if I can do so without offence, I would like to draw a favourable contrast between the speech of the right hon. Gentleman and many of those—almost all of those—which preceded it. The whole of the debate up to this time, so far as it came from that side of the House, has consisted of a long-sustained and venomous attack upon my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary. The right hon. Gentleman on the other hand properly held, not my right hon. Friend, but the Government as a whole, responsible for what is going on in Ireland. We have never shrunk from that responsibility. We are associated with my right hon. Friend, and if the right hon. Gentleman says that I have used the word "bravery" with regard to my right hon. Friend outside this House, I am prepared to support it here, and I know that it will be endorsed in their hearts by every single Member sitting on the opposite Bench. Those who have been here during the whole of these proceedings will know how bitterly my right hon. Friend has been attacked. It is, of course, the recognized procedure of Members opposite below the Gangway of the Nationalist Party to attempt to worry Chief Secretaries into physical collapse. They have had some successes in the past with Irish Chief Secretaries not all alive now; there are some who have borne in their constitution the permanent results of the calumnies, worries, and attacks to which they were persistently exposed. I think the right hon. Member for the Bridgeton Division (Sir G. Trevelyan) might tell us a somewhat pathetic story of the way in which those whom now he is covering with fulsome oratorical caresses in this House inflicted upon him moral and almost physical torture. But it has been found that my right hon. Friend the present Chief Secretary wears a coat of mail, from which the daggers of calumny glance off. His imperturbable temper has been able to defy all the attacks which have been made upon him. Hence the ever-increasing violence, hence the symptoms which we have seen in this debate of men hitting out wildly, frantically, and at random at my right hon. Friend. But we believe on this side of the House that the great majority of those who sit opposite do not believe for one moment most of the charges brought against my right hon. Friend. No, not even the right hon. Member for Sheffield believes in half of that which is said against my right hon. Friend. I will test this. Do hon. Members opposite below the Gangway, and the majority of those on that bench, believe that the Chief Secretary inflicts indignities on prisoners for the mere pleasure of venting his spite? [Mr. T. M. HEALY: On O'Brien; yes, certainly.] Do they believe it? [Home Rule cries, "They do."] These charges are put forward on public platforms, but they are not really believed in by any responsible man in this House. Let me follow the right hon. Gentleman into the question of the treatment of prisoners. The right hon. Gentleman, with great dialectical acumen, prefaced his introduction of this part of the question by saying that he would not be entangled into any argument with regard to the definition of prisoners. Well, he was extremely wise in avoiding that subject, because all authorities are agreed that political prisoners ought to be treated differently from ordinary prisoners. But the right hon. Gentleman proceeded to quote precedents of men who had committed political offences, and then he applied the precedents to prisoners who are condemned for ordinary offences. The right hon. Gentleman quoted certain cases. In most of those cases the offences were unquestionably political. The case of O'Connell, for instance, was distinctly a political offence; and if these offences were committed now, I apprehend that those who committed them would be treated as political prisoners and as State prisoners, as they have been treated in the past.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE: Let me remind the right hon. Gentleman—[Cries of "Order!"]

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I am coming to the right hon. Gentleman presently. I do not think the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian was interrupted in the course of his speech.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE: I am only going to remind the right hon. Gentleman — [Cries of "Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: The Chancellor of the Exchequer is in possession of the House.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I shall have something to say to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford presently. I know he has taken a great interest in this question, and therefore I waited to hear what he had to say. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian went back to State prisoners and political prisoners of former times, and I think he dealt with one contemporary case. He spoke of the treatment of Mr. Michael Davitt. Is he aware that Mr. Michael Davitt was treated as a convict in the first instance, and that it was only on his return to prison, after he had had a ticket-of-leave, that the treatment began to which the right hon. Gentleman alluded? I should like to know whether the case of the right hon. Gentleman will break down if Michael Davitt was treated as a convict at any time. The right hon. Gentleman said he would quote precedents. He should not care much for precedents, but he has not taken the pains to examine the case of Mr. Davitt.

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): It was not a political offence the first time.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Listen to the Member for Derby. He says it was not a political offence at all the first time. Neither are these political offences which have been committed more recently by Members of this House and others. The right hon. Member for Mid Lothian does not care to entangle himself, but the Member for Derby is bolder, and

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: Yes; because there the language was extremely strong.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER: I think the right hon. Gentleman will agree with me that he had another reason for suppressing that interesting part of the quotation. Mr. Byrne, the House will be interested to learn, was the most prominent member of the Reception Committee of the right hon. Gentleman himself.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: Allow me to say I never saw and I never heard of him before in that connection. [Cries of "Oh."] Never.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER: I think the right hon. Gentleman is a little ungrateful.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I said I never heard of him, and I do not know him.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER: Well then, Mr. Byrne knows the right hon. Gentleman, and I do not know what view Mr. Byrne will take of the right hon. Gentleman's repudiation. It is not always that Members of this House present the belligerent and bellicose appearance here that they assume when in Ireland as representatives of the British democracy. I think I have dealt sufficiently with these allegations, both as regards precedents and as regards the allegations of cruelty. I have shown that the precedents quoted do not apply, because they are precedents of political prisoners, and, in regard to ordinary offenders, I have shown that they are treated now precisely as they were treated before. They were treated by the right hon. Gentleman opposite precisely as they are treated now. If there is to be a change, I repeat what has been said by my right hon. Friend—it must be a change all round. It must be a change which applies to men of culture condemned for similar offences in this country as well as in Ireland. Our contention is that men who are sentenced for these offences, which are not political, are not entitled to exemption from the prison rules. One word more as to the nature of offences. It is not a political act or offence to refrain from paying a debt. It is another kind of offence altogether—an offence of a very different character; and if so, then language inciting to that offence cannot surely be described as political.

There may be a political motive behind. Very probably there is, but the acts themselves are not political. I pass from the treatment of political offenders to the general charge which is brought by the right hon. Gentleman, and by other speakers, against the Irish Constabulary generally, of harshness.

MR. GLADSTONE: I brought no charge against them.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER: I think the right hon. Gentleman did abstain from attacking the police on the occasion, but he accuses the Administration of harshness; and I presume he endorses part of the accusation brought from the opposite bench against that gallant force. I do not think it can be too often repeated that the Irish Constabulary, under great and constant provocation, have behaved with as much restraint and prudence as any body of police in the world have ever done. I presume the Irish Police cannot be expected, more than any other body of men, to maintain an angelic temper, and, when they are wounded and blinded with stones, to wield the baton with softness and graduated force. To expect that would be going too far. We ought to give these men, who, after all, are Irishmen themselves, credit for having on the whole behaved with admirable self-restraint. ["No, no."] Well, I will put an argument to hon. Members below the Gangway. I will assume that the hon. Members who constitute the Nationalist Party had to be sworn in as special constables and to act under the guidance of the Member for Longford (Mr. T. Healy). Do they pretend that if they had then to deal with a crowd of Orangemen, they would show as much temper and restraint as has been shown by the Irish Constabulary? There is no country in Europe, certainly not in America, where anything like the same moderation would have been observed as has been observed by the police in Ireland. The next charge brought in this long indictment has been against the Resident Magistrates. But it has been shown that appeals against their decisions have been successful in a less proportion of cases than appeals against decisions under the ordinary law. [MR. T. HEALY: Hear, hear.] I observe that the hon. and learned Member for Longford cheers that. On the other hand, their freedom from vindictiveness has been constantly shown by their not inflicting punishment if the prisoners promised not to offend again. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian has said that the Magistrates do not enjoy the confidence of the people as they ought to enjoy it, and that there is a wide gulf between the population and the Resident Magistrates. If that charge is well-founded, at whose door rests the blame? A great part of it must be at the door of the Party opposite, who appointed many of these Magistrates. I am not sure that they have not appointed the majority of them, though they are now forward in all parts of the country in denouncing them. [An hon. MEMBER: Law and order.] Yes, you are anxious to upset law and order in Ireland. We are not surprised, but we are sorry for the treatment which these men are receiving at the hands of those who have been responsible Members of the Crown. I cannot follow the right hon. Gentleman over the whole of what he said in his references to the Coercion Act and the treatment of crime, but I come to a point—and a most important and significant point—in his address. He dealt, not for the first time, but certainly in a novel manner, with the Plan of Campaign. He said it was the direct and necessary result of what had preceded it, and then he said, "I do not vindicate the Plan." Well, I think you cannot vindicate a plan more strongly than by saying it is absolutely necessary. The words, "I do not vindicate the Plan," will, very likely, be forgotten, but the fact that the right hon. Gentleman said the Plan is a direct and necessary consequence of what has preceded it will pass current in Ireland, where that wicked system exists which has laid desolate so great a part of the country—that wicked system under which many thousands of acres of Irish land, to the contentment of hon. Members opposite, continue to lie waste.

An Hon. MEMBER: Are they all let now?

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER: Not all let; but more and more let from day to day, and more will be let from day to day, if the hon. Member for East Mayo does not send out his band of warriors to endeavour to check the desire of the Irish people once more to cultivate those farms. The right hon. Gentleman dealt with the Plan of Campaign, and thought it was the direct and necessary result of what had preceded.

MR. GLADSTONE: Of your conduct.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER: Of our conduct—I understand that. The right hon. Gentleman went through several years—1886, 1887, and 1888—and in dealing with 1886, I think the right hon. Gentleman used the words that the misery commenced in 1886.

MR. GLADSTONE: I said that the effects of the agricultural crisis were fully established in 1886.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER: Yes; and therefore it commenced before. I do not care whether it was commenced or established—at all events it existed before. What I want to point out to the right hon. Gentleman and the country is this, that the misery having commenced before and been established in 1886—I do not want to misrepresent the right hon. Gentleman—he proposed at that time an immense system of land purchase founded upon a normal rate of 20 years' purchase on the rents—the unjust judicial rents—those rents the arrears of which are now always, by a stretch of language, and judged by a subsequent standard, denounced as unjust. Those rents were to be stereotyped in the year 1886 by an immense system of purchase which was to cover the whole of Ireland, and under which the credit of this country would have been strained to the uttermost. The Irish tenants would have continued to pay on the basis of those unjust rents which, now that the Conservative Government is in office, are considered to be the ruin of Ireland, and to have led up as a direct and necessary consequence to the Plan of Campaign. Which alternative does the right hon. Gentleman choose—he who is a master of finance, he who has had at heart, as much as any man that ever lived, the credit and resources of the country? If this plan had been adopted would there have been wholesale repudiation, or would the unhappy tenantry of Ireland have continued—under his auspices, and at his initiation, and by his draft on English credit—to pay those rents which are considered now to be unjust rents, and for which the landlords are not only to be denounced, but are to forfeit all their rights as citizens of the country? I want to roll away from us the charge which the right hon. Gentleman brings, that it is we who are responsible for this state of things. What would you have said if your present Leader had fastened these rents upon you? It would have taken a great deal of ingenuity on the part of hon. Gentlemen opposite to enable them to regard him as having bestowed a blessing on Ireland; or would they have rewarded his efforts for Home Rule by repudiating the terms he had settled? Well, our attitude towards rents is totally different from that of the right hon. Gentleman, who wanted to stereotype those rents for ever. He charges us with not having dealt with the question of arrears, and says it is that question which has led to the present difficulty, and to the recrudescence of agitation and crime. Well, but there have been other Arrears Acts passed, and I deny the assumption that the passing of an Arrears Act has satisfied, or ever would satisfy, the Irish tenants. It would demoralize them and keep up that attitude of expectation which discourages the payment of rent and the fulfilment of contracts, and teaches those who have paid that they have been foolish in their day. I ask, therefore, is it fair to say that the non-fulfilment of the wishes of hon. Members opposite with regard to the Arrears Act is at the bottom of this difficulty? I have no doubt that on some estates, if you had wiped out all arrears and allowed tenants to pay what they liked, there would have been on those estates less trouble than at present; but how about the neighbouring estates, where the example would have been seen? It must be patent to every mind that the passing of periodical Arrears Bills is no settlement but an opening up of the agrarian question in its worst form. I say again, therefore, we were not only within our right, but it was our duty also, notwithstanding the pressure put upon us, to act as we did. The right hon. Gentleman forgets that he omitted from his catalogue of events the fact that we did in 1887 pass a measure for the relief of the Irish tenants—as liberal a measure as could be passed—a measure which at least he ought not to have omitted from his enumeration of the doings or misdoings of Her Majesty's Government. The right hon. Gentleman contends—it is an argument which has been used many times during the course of this debate—that though we claim that there is an improvement in Ireland, and an improvement in every direction, nevertheless that improvement is not due in any way to the action of Her Majesty's Government. Some improvement is now admitted by all; in spite of the efforts of hon. Members opposite, rents are beginning to be better paid, the tenants are beginning to be more satisfied, the relations between the constabulary and the population are improving. I wish I had time to cite all the symptoms of returning prosperity to Ireland. They are sneered at by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, who speaks of the efforts of my right hon. Friend for the material development of Ireland with some contempt; but I do not think that is the view of the bulk of the Irish people. When that Front Bench was entirely empty—I do not know whether it was because it was empty—an hon. Member from Ireland complained of the neglect of the material interests of Ireland by various and successive Governments. Well, then there was this marked improvement—an improvement recognized by all; and what happened? The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland has told you the improvement was going on too fast, and measures had to be taken to prevent its continuance. Hon. Members opposite ask “Why, if there is this improvement which you claim in your Address to the Crown, is there also an increase in the number of prosecutions?” That seems a very logical and natural question to put; but the answer is that the increased number of prosecutions is due to the attempts of those who thought improvement was going on too fast to check that improvement—to make a despairing effort once more to defeat, if they could, the process of contentment which had begun to dawn—a dawn which did not smile upon the political prospects of the Nationalist Party. They know that prosperity is Unionist. Yes, prosperity is Unionist; I do not say prosperous persons, but I say that the prosperity of the country would be one of the greatest destructives of the policy of hon. Members opposite. They love to point to the miseries of the Irish people, and they endeavour to work in that way upon the generous impulses of the constituencies of this country. Therefore, when we were able to go and tell the constituencies that there was progress, that farms were being taken, and that men were again in a position wherein they could follow their own bent and use their own liberty, then this effort had to be made; then came the recrudescence of agitation in Kerry and elsewhere; then came the emissaries of the National League to spread abroad again their baneful influence, with its usual baneful effects, and again there was crime in Ireland. [An hon. MEMBER: Quote.] Do you wish me to quote? Do you want me to harrow the feelings of this House with outrages, which I think even the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian would be willing to treat as crimes? He spoke of the nature of those crimes; did he know that they included the maiming of cattle? Did he know that they included some of the most brutal acts that can disgrace a population? And, if so, why does he cover up these offences or crimes—call them what you will—spreading over them a kind of veil, and speaking of these agrarian crimes as if they were of an ordinary character? Crime re-appeared, and what was the duty of the Chief Secretary? It was to endeavour to lay hold of the men who were once more applying the torch to the combustible material. He imprisoned them, and he was right in imprisoning them; and I do not believe the conscience of the country can revolt against the laying hold of and putting in prison the men who are endeavouring to thwart that very process of conciliation which right hon. Gentlemen opposite declare that they are so anxious to see carried out. The Chief Secretary was aware of this campaign—I do not know whether the right hon. Member for Newcastle approves of it—and counteracted it, and did his best to incarcerate the men who were once more endeavouring to produce agitation in Ireland. It was sought to carry out this campaign on some of the best estates in Ireland, on the estates of men who have granted reductions to a point far below the judicial rents which would have been stereotyped for ever in Ireland by the action of the right hon. Gentleman. It was some of the best landlords in Ireland whose estates were selected for attack, and it was with respect to them that hon. Members endeavoured once more to inflict misery and ruin. Yes; misery and ruin, for which I am afraid even their resources will not be able to compensate their victims, because I must say that I think it is misery and ruin for tenants to live in campaign huts rather than on the comfortable farms from which they have been evicted, and I would like to know the result of a vote by ballot among the evicted tenants, evicted under the orders of the National League—I would like to know the opinion of these men who have been unable to utilize the rise in prices, whose hopes are diminishing day by day, of never being able again to occupy their farms, because their position has been utilized for the political purposes of hon. Members opposite—utilized to bring about Home Rule. They will pay a heavy price for the futile efforts which are being made to bring about a consummation which will never arrive. [Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR: Burnley: Ayr Burghs.] You may have your new Parliament, but your new Parliament will not give the Home Rule you desire. So much with regard to the material prosperity in Ireland. But I do not like to sit down without meeting the challenge of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian on the question of local government in Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman responded to the appeal of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham. For the first time in this debate the right hon. Gentleman said, "We invite you to the consideration of measures of conciliation and contentment." The invitation came from the right hon. Gentleman on the fifth day of a long debate, but up to this time, and until the right hon. Member for West Birmingham had delivered his speech, we heard little but a tedious repetition of particular instances where it was maintained that the Resident Magistrates might have given wrong decisions, or where the police behaved with some violence. It is only to-day that the Leader of the Party opposite opens up this idea of conciliation and contentment, and he invites us to express our view on the subject. But I am bound to say that it was extremely little he told us of the measures of conciliation which he himself would be able to propose. He made a long indictment against the Unionist Party, and mainly against the Liberal Unionists, that they had neglected local government in Ireland, and that they had refrained from carrying out the instructions which they had received from their constituents. [Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR: Your pledges.] I propose in a very few words to deal with that charge. What is the primary mandate which the Conservative and the Liberal Unionist Parties have received? It is the mandate to maintain the Union. The right hon. Member for West Birmingham dealt admirably with this point the previous day. Now, the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian said that he would not accept the explanation that the agitation had had anything to do with the non-fulfilment of what he called our pledges. I would ask hon. Members, if they are reasonable, to say in what year and at what time we ought to have begun dealing with local government in Ireland? I admit the enormous interest of the Irish Question. We have given proof of our interest in it, in and out of this House; but I do venture to put in one single humble word for the other portions of the United Kingdom. We are entitled to consider the order in which we should deal with England, Scotland, and Ireland. We are reproached with not having been able to deal with local government in Ireland; but I want to know when we ought to have given it? In 1886? I should like to know what chance there was of carrying it in that year? In 1887 we had enough work to do with Ireland. We had to deal with the land question, and in 1888 we had to deal with local government in England. I do not think we could possibly have undertaken to deal with local government in Ireland before England. That being the case, we dealt with local government in England at the earliest possible date we could, and I think, on the whole, hon. Members from Ireland will agree that the turn of Scotland comes next. That reminds me of the exclamation of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian—that the denial of local government to Ireland was equivalent to coercion. I never heard a more extraordinary sentence in my life. We have heard many definitions of coercion; but I am sure that a queerer one than that has never been given. Do they maintain that we are coercing Scotland at this moment because she has not been able to receive local self-government? Now, hon. Members opposite are entitled to ask, “Do you repudiate the pledge, the desire to extend local self-government to Ireland?” I reply, “Certainly not.” What right has the right hon. Gentleman to say that it would certainly not be dealt with in the present Parliament? It must depend to a great extent on the right hon. Gentleman himself, and upon hon. Members from Ireland. If I rightly read the attitude of the Nationalist Party, when they prevent Bills from passing which aim at increasing the material prosperity of their country, I doubt very much whether we shall receive much support from them in any measure of local self-government for Ireland, I mean, of course, in the sense in which it is applied in Scotland and in England. Witness the attitude of hon. Members opposite to the extension of Lord Ashbourne's Act. What chance would there have been; what chance would there be this year or next year that any efforts on our part would receive even fair treatment? I have constantly observed that when hon. Members opposite have heard allusions to local self-government in Ireland they have abstained from any expression of a desire to see such local self-government established. They may want it after they have got their National Parliament; they do not want it before; and if not before, I should like to know whether there is any chance that an honest effort on the part of the Government would meet with any kind of response from those who guide the counsels of the Front Opposition Bench? My right hon. Friend the Member for Bodmin made a proposal for which there is much to be urged. It is that local self-government should be granted to Ireland, but that all local self-government should be suspended in disturbed districts. How would a proposal of this kind be received by the Opposition? It is a proposal which may be good; it is a proposal which I do not at all condemn; but I think it would require a considerable amount of Parliamentary time in order to carry it into effect. But what are the conditions now for establishing local self-government in Ireland? What do we wish, in establishing it, in all parts of the kingdom? What we wish is that the people in each locality should take an interest in local life, and that they should rise to the performance of municipal duties. But what would happen if you established local self-government in Ireland tomorrow? It would be entirely controlled by a central political clique and worked for political purposes. It would be throttled in its cradle at once by the political turn which would be given to it from its very birth. Have we proofs of that at the present time? [Cries of "No!"] No? Why, you boast of establishing a political citadel in every Municipality in Ireland, in the Boards of Guardians, and the Corporations. There is the Lord Mayor of Dublin himself. Ask him whether the Dublin Municipality is not tinged with a strong political colour? Municipal institutions would not be worked at present for the true development of local self-government in Ireland. They would be worked for the purpose of furthering the political designs which it is our business to oppose. So soon as we can take securities that local self-government shall not be perverted in this way to political and Separatist purposes we shall only be too anxious to give that local self-government to Ireland which we intend and are anxious to extend to all parts of Her Majesty's dominions. But we must bear our general mandate in our minds. In carrying out that great task which has been put into our hands, the task of governing Ireland in face of an opposition such as no Executive Government has ever had to encounter, hon. Members opposite may think that we are discouraged. But we see hope through the clouds. The right hon. Member for Mid Lothian turned to history, and spoke of the attitude and difficulties of previous Governments. But I should like him, with all his historical lore, to be able to cite, either from his own experience or from the annals he has read, one case where a Government, struggling for the maintenance of law and order, endeavouring to enforce and maintain the law, has been met in the manner in which we have been met by men who are responsible as much as the Government not only for the happiness of this Kingdom, but also for its traditions and its character. But we have the surest signs that we are making progress. We have the evidence of our opponents themselves, the evidence afforded by the frantic efforts which are made to kindle an agitation into flames again when that agitation has ceased to be spontaneous, and has ceased to be spontaneous because contentment prevail. You say "No," but I can quote a witness whom, perhaps, you will not reject. What said the Member for South Tipperary to his friends there? He said—

"Has it come to this, that Tipperary, the very name of which in the past has made landlordism quake and fear; that Tipperary, whose name has many a time and oft compelled the oppressor to lay down his arms, should be the snug and comfortable home of the emergency man and the land-grabber; has it come to this, that even to Tipperary an emissary must come down and exclaim. Has it come to this!"

Yes; it has come to this, that the tenants of Ireland now require to be lashed into agitation, and that is our answer to the indictment which is made against us. It has come to this, that in these signs and symptoms we see grounds for confidence and for hope. Our duty we must firmly persist in; but I maintain that at no time in the history of the present Administration have we had more ground for confidence and hope than exists at this moment.

*MR. RATHBONE (Carnarvonshire): In the very few words to which I have to ask the attention of the House I shall not lay myself open to the censure of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham for neglect of the second part of the Amendment now before the House. It was inevitable and right that the Government and the Leaders of all Parties should be first called to account before this House for all that has been said or done and omitted to be done during the Recess, and this has been done with great ability, thoroughness, and severity. I am sure the House and the country will consider with great interest the significance of the treatment of the right hon. Gentleman of the question of the future, as throwing some gleams of light upon the ideas of his Party and that with which he is allied. His challenge, however, ought surely to have been

they then proceeded to spring Home Rule upon the country, and to relegate their Radical programme to a distant future. Then, if it lies in the mouth of either Party to accuse the other of fraud on the constituencies, I think we could very well retort upon right hon. Gentlemen opposite. I should like to read a short and interesting document which bears upon this point. It was issued in November, 1885, and is addressed to our "countrymen" by the Leaders of the National Party. It earnestly advises "our countrymen" to vote against the men who were coercing Ireland, that is—right hon. Gentlemen opposite, and it was signed by T. P. O'Connor, J. E. Redmond, J. O'Kelly, J. Biggar, T. M. Healy, and others. Taken in connection with this debate, I think it is an interesting and instructive document, because it illustrates better than anything else the false attitude of right hon. Gentlemen opposite who have moved and support the Amendment to the Address. The conversion to Home Rule of the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Cirencester Division of Gloucestershire has been so recent that I see that in the Parliamentary Guide the letter "U" still appears against his name. Last night the hon. Gentleman explained the reasons why he has changed his mind, and endeavoured to account for his chequered political career. I do not think he need have taken so much trouble to explain his inconsistency. He is not the only Member sitting opposite who has changed his mind very recently and very violently on the Irish question. One thing I was rather surprised at, and that was, that the right hon. Gentleman should have spoken so confidently about the mind of the country. Personally, I am rather loth to accept information on the subject filtered through a mind which it has taken so long to make up. I listened with some astonishment to the speech of the hon. Member for Northampton. The hon. Gentleman devoted a considerable portion of the time he occupied to flinging across the floor of the House the extraordinary taunt that the Conservative Party have sought to make much political capital out of certain famous letters which have now been proved to be forgeries. I am most heartily glad that those letters have been proved to be the production of a clumsy forger, but I was surprised that the hon. Member should, without producing the chapter and verse for it, have made the charge I have stated. I repudiate his assertion, and challenge him to prove that any member of the Unionist Party has ever endeavoured to make political capital out of the forged letters. Now, I intend to give a most hearty vote in support of Her Majesty's Government, and I desire to give another reason for doing so. In my opinion the policy of Her Majesty's Government has resulted not only in the maintenance of law and order in the Sister Isle, but has tended very greatly to promote the prosperity of the country. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. Gladstone) sneered at the thought of the present prosperity of Ireland resulting from the Unionist policy. I do not suppose this policy is responsible for such things as a good harvest or a fine summer; but there are many things on which the policy of the Government always has a direct bearing. The increases, for instance, in the deposits in the Post Office Savings Bank in Ireland and of the Irish exports show that the people of the country are not now so much under the dominion of the Irish National League. The farmers of Ireland are now turning their attention more to their own proper avocations and less to political agitation. That is a result of strong, firm, and just government. There is another fact of still greater importance which I do not recollect having been quoted in the debate. £610,000 has been advanced during the last year out of the Imperial Exchequer in the form of loans to public works in Ireland: in other words, the credit of the British taxpayer has been pledged to the extent of £610,000 for the benefit of the Irish people. How much of that money would have been expended supposing Ireland had got a Home Rule Parliament? Here is a direct and substantial benefit which she derives by her present partnership with the United Kingdom, and which I venture to say beats the record of any other country in the world. The subject of local government in Ireland has been alluded to this evening. I think we shall all accept the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer as a most complete refutation of the attack made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian regarding the delay in the extension of local government to Ireland. Personally I shall, whenever the time comes, support an extension to Ireland of the same measure of local government that has been extended to England, and is being extended to Scotland provided only that security is given for the proper protection of the loyal minority in Ulster. Firmly believing that the Unionist Party is as ready to grant a large measure of local government to Ireland as it is to do anything else which can tend to the welfare of the country, I shall to-night gladly support the Government by my vote.

MR. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, E.), on rising, was interrupted by an hon. Member directing the Speaker's attention to the number of Members present. The House having been counted and 40 Members being present, the hon. Member proceeded: The Amendment which is before us for discussion comes very aptly in the paragraph in the Address we are asked to adopt, thanking Her Majesty for proposed measures for amending the constitution of the various tribunals which have special jurisdiction over real property in Ireland, and for developing the material resources of that country. Her Majesty's Government seem to think that attention to the claims of real property in Ireland, and measures for developing the material resources of the country in aid of real property, comprise the full duty of the Government. To this point the Amendment aptly calls attention, declaring the present system of administration harsh, oppressive, and unjust. This declaration, in my opinion, is applicable to the entire system of administration in Ireland since the Union, and it is treating the Amendment in that sense I propose to say a few words. If we had been from the period of the Union governed by English laws administered in the English fashion, and in that spirit which centuries of freedom have impressed upon the judiciary of this country and upon all the offices of Government, at any rate for the last half-century—if the laws had been applied in this way to Ireland, then I can assure the House the material grounds we have for discontent in Ireland would have been much less, if they existed at all. I do not say that other grounds of discontent and arguments in favour of national aspirations would disappear; but undoubtedly, if English administration, as we know it in this country—if the Judges had administered English laws in Ireland as they are administered in England—we certainly would have had much less reason for discontent in our country. But the law which is administered in Ireland is neither Irish nor English; its administration is worse than Russian. If we had had the opportunity of passing our laws for our country in our own way, without also having the power to administer them, or even without having them administered somewhat in sympathy with our people, I do not believe the grant of legislative power would be of any service to us, or worth any considerable struggle to obtain. It is not the want of legislation, but the want of sympathy in the administration of laws, that we have to complain of in Ireland. I have frequently talked with gentlemen who believe they have the right by birth to govern, and who have a habit of talking of us as "the natives," including the vast majority of the people and the race from which I spring. It is in this spirit of class power, as expressed in that word, the laws are administered, administered as they would be by the dormant faction in a colony in ruling a territory forcibly occupied. We are ruled exactly as those people are ruled whose country is overrun by a Foreign Power. The whole Administration is "run" for them and their families; the whole spirit of the laws is imbued with this prejudice, and they are carried out in deference to the wishes of a class. This I defy anyone acquainted with the administration of the law in Ireland to dispute. We are practically really governed by the agents of the Orange Society. What votes are they that support Her Majesty's Government in Ireland? Where is the Government able to get a single Member returned but in those parts of Ireland where the influence of the Orange Society is paramount? What do we see here? We have two Members professing to be Ulster Liberal Members who owe their return as much to the support of the Orange Society as hon. Members opposite. In all vicissitudes of Government, in every change of Administration, the pervading influence in Dublin Castle is Orangeism, and in that spirit most extraordinary circumstances. Well, what happened in the case of the Rev. James M'Fadden, against whom no one could be found to say, "I suspect him"? A warrant is issued at night and handed out at a time when it is discovered that Father M'Fadden's sister and house-keeper are away at the police barracks, endeavouring to obtain an interview with him. There is no one in the house when the search is made for the rev. gentleman's papers; therefore, all his private documents, it is fair to assume, are ransacked—and it is well known that Father M'Fadden has been in correspondence with the political Party on this side of the House. The search is made at night in total violation of the spirit of the law. In this matter we might, I think, take a lesson from France in administering our English law, for I find that in the action taken by the French Government against the League of Patriots, when the authorities were making their search for documents, they required the Members of the League to be present. In Ireland, however, the thing is done in this way. An official bursts into the presence of his chief with the announcement, "Miss M'Fadden is now with her brother at the barracks." Instantly the word goes forth that a search is to be made, the police take to their cars and rush down to Father M'Fadden's house and ransack his papers, and when Miss M'Fadden returns she meets the police on the threshold who say to her, "Oh, we have just taken one or two letters; good morning." There is little confidence to be reposed in the letters and documents obtained by the Government from their agents in Ireland as evidence against Nationalists. We have seen what a dismal failure the last move of the Government has been in relation to letters and correspondence. But we do not know what use may be made of letters found at Father M'Fadden's house, and here is where the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Morley) comes in. One of the letters alleged to have been taken was a letter from another priest. That priest has now been arrested under the Coercion Act. The Crown will have to show that the law gives this power of domiciliary visit. But, whether it does or not, who will justify such action? I have been careful to abstain from saying whether, by any legal quibble or in any other way, there is any possibility of bringing home to my friend, Father M'Fadden—for I am proud to proclaim him my friend—any complicity in the murder of the police inspector. On that the rev. gentleman is ready to take his trial. But with regard to the poor people who are being raided and subjected to martial law, and on whom the baton and bayonet are being constantly used, I contend that the state of things is such that some such Amendment as this is absolutely necessary. I declare that the Habeas Corpus Act is distinctly at an end in County Donegal; the public rights are at an end. The county is filled with military from one end to the other. Because the Government have been hauled, and because of the desire of Orangemen to insult the Catholics, everything possible in the way of stretching the law has been practised. These things have burnt themselves into the souls of hundreds of thousands of people in Ulster; they will never forget the action of the Crown in Donegal. What is the object of that action I leave the House to determine. Whether it is for the purpose of dragooning the people, and in that way bringing about what is called "the material prosperity of Ireland"—namely, the payment of rent—I do not know; but I do say it is an instance of the Orange colour and Orange spirit and Orange feeling with which English law has been administered in Ireland—spirit and feeling which have brought all law into contempt.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN (Dublin, College Green): During the course of this debate much has been said as to the treatment accorded to political prisoners in Ireland. It is very natural that a good deal should be said on the subject, because it is a subject in relation to which the Irish people feel very keenly. Well, Sir, I myself have had the honour to be sent to prison under the provisions of the Crimes Act. I do not, however, whine about my treatment, nor do I want to pose as a political martyr. I was treated as a first-class misdemeanant, but then I was not tried by one of the removable gang of Irish Magistrates, and consequently I was not subjected to the treatment which has been inflicted on some of my friends. I desire, however, to mention a fact which

I have never mentioned before. The 18th rule of the Prison Code entitles first-class misdemeanants to carry on their ordinary trade, calling, or avocation, if not inconsistent with prison discipline. Under this rule Mr. E. D. Gray, when confined in Richmond Prison, Dublin, and Mr. Stead and Mr. Yates, when confined in Holloway Prison, London, were enabled, while in prison, to carry on to a certain extent the business of their respective journals. But, by a dirty trick, I was cheated by the Prisons Board and by the Chief Secretary out of the privilege, or rather right, to which I was entitled. After I had been four days in Richmond Prison, I was removed to another prison 60 miles from Dublin, and consequently was unable to assist in carrying on the business of my newspaper. I charge the Chief Secretary and the Prisons Board with having, by a mean and paltry trick, deprived me of a right given to me by the prison rules. The Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) said last night that the question of Ulster is a very serious one and will have to be considered. This is not the only occasion on which the right hon. Gentleman has attempted the task of educating the Tory Party up to his own views and sentiments on this Irish Question. but I think he is dealing with very dull scholars in so attempting. I noticed last night that during the whole of that portion of his speech his observations were received with a funereal silence by Her Majesty's Government. One of the difficulties he alleged to stand in the way of an Irish Legislature was this of Ulster. I deny the right of the right hon. Gentleman to speak of Ulster as he spoke of it yesterday, and I trust this House will understand—I am sure the majority of the Members of this House all understand—how false and how hollow is the pretence that Liberal Unionists or Tory Gentlemen have any substance in their allegations or arguments when they speak of Ulster being opposed to the national claims and national aspirations of the Irish people. They speak Sir, for only a portion of Ulster—for only a corner of Ulster—for only two counties of Ulster, or very little more than that, and I think we should put an end to the sham and fraud of using the name of Ulster against the demand of the Irish people for the restoration of their legislative liberty. Reference has been made to the alarming speech made in the House by the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for North Armagh (Colonel Saunderson). It was of course expected that both the House and the country would be alarmed at the terrible picture the hon. and gallant Gentleman brought before them of 50,000 men rising in arms in obedience to his summons, and taking the field forthwith as soon as ever there is a near prospect of the concession of Home Rule to Ireland. Where the hon. and gallant Gentleman gets his 50,000 I do not know, except it be that he makes his calculation on a system that may not be altogether unknown to some hon. Members of this House, inasmuch as many of them, probably, have heard before now of the famous work of a distinguished writer, the title of which is "The Tremendous Adventures of Major Goliath O'Gahagan." O'Gahagan was counting up the forces at his disposal for the defence of a besieged city in India. He counted his garrison in this way:—"Soldiers (infantry and artillery), 40; Chaplains, 2; surgeon, 1; O'Gahagan, 1,000." I think it must be on the same system that the calculation of the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for North Armagh is based. The hon. and gallant Gentleman counts himself as 49,000, and he leaves the remaining 1,000 to be made up from the Orangemen of Ulster. What does it mean when the hon. and gallant Member talks of bringing 50,000 men into the field against Home Rule? It means bringing them into the field against the troops of the Sovereign of this Realm! But, still, it will be a splendid sight to see the gallant Colonel take the field, and will remind one of the lines descriptive of another great hero—

"To noble danger he conducts the way,
His great example all his troops obey,
Before the front the Major sternly rides,
With such an air as Mars to battle strides,
Propitious heaven must sure a hero save,
Like Paris handsome, and like Hector brave."

But it is not only in Ireland that the name and appearance of the hon. and gallant Member strikes terror, for I read that at a meeting over which he presided, one of the speakers, the Rev. T. Ellis, Grand Chaplain of the Orange Order, at a demonstration at Armagh on the 12th July, 1886, mentioned "that the blood rushed to Gladstone's forehead whenever Brother Saunderson got up to speak." That was said in the presence of the hon. and gallant Member, who did not deny the soft impeachment. Well, Sir, but while he threatens that he will take the field and head the rebel forces in Ireland under certain conditions—that is if the Act be passed by the Houses of Parliament and assented to by the Sovereign of these Realms—he at another time and in another mood presents a different appearance. In a speech delivered in this House on June 25, 1888, he said he did not understand how people could resist a measure when once it had become law. However much they disliked it, they could only proceed to get it repealed by Constitutional means. In the meantime they were bound to obey it. How can the hon. and gallant Member reconcile these conflicting sentiments? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, in his speech in this House last night, said no Parliament had any right to transfer the allegiance of any portion of Her Majesty's subjects to another Power. But there is in this case no question of transferring allegiance. The allegiance of all Irishmen would rest, after the restoration of an Irish Parliament, just where it rests at present. The allegiance of Irishmen, Englishmen, and Scotchmen is due to the Throne, to the Sovereign of these Realms and to the Acts of Parliament which have been passed, and there will be no disturbance of that allegiance under an Irish Legislature. We hear a good deal said about Irishmen born under the rule of the British Parliament, and that no one has a right to transfer his allegiance elsewhere. But what about the Act of Union? The Irishmen of that day were born to the possession of an Irish Parliament, which had existed in that country for hundreds of years. Was their allegiance transferred by the passing of the Act of Union? Did they rise in rebellion and call out 50 or 100,000 men to take the field? Now, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham and the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland allege that under the present system of administration, that country is thriving and prospering, and that happiness, peace, law and order, and loyalty have been restored to the country. I deny each and every one of these statements. I say that the country is not prospering, but that it is declining in every element. I say that the administration of the law and the law itself in that country are not calculated to produce content, or any increase of loyalty and goodwill among the people. I say that whatever improvement there is in Ireland in the way of peace and quiet is due to far different causes than those alleged by the Chief Secretary for Ireland. The decline in the material condition of the country cannot be denied. We get figures about the Savings Bank deposits in Ireland. I do not wonder if there is some increase in the amount of deposits, considering the sums of money that the Government and the Times newspaper have been squandering. I have no doubt that some of the Times' money is to be found in the Savings Banks; money which they have paid to emergency men, spies, and informers—the necessary tools of the Government under the present system. But there are more important elements than these to think of when we are considering the question of the condition of the country. I have here a few figures taken from an authentic source—an Irish official directory—the reliability of which will not be questioned by hon. Gentlemen opposite. I find that the population of Ireland between the years 1841 and 1845 declined by 3,274,000; in the years 1885-6, it declined 136,500. and in 1886-7, it declined 59,108, and that process is going on still. Well, but some of the letter writers, private secretaries and other friends of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, have informed us of the glorious fact that, although the population has declined, there is a greater number of cows in the country than there was a few years ago. That is a great element of strength, honour, and prosperity. Cows count for something: they have a certain value; Irishmen and women have none at all, so that if cows increase, no matter how the population decreases, it is a thing to be boasted of. In no other country in the world would any such conclusion be put forward. People fly from the country! Of course they fly with love and affectionate memories in their hearts of the system of law prevailing—a system which would not give them a chance of living, thriving, and prospering in their own land, but which sends them away to the furthestmost ends of the earth as hewers of wood and drawers of water. Little wonder then, when they are able to earn some money and to save some, that, to their honour and glory be it told, they send their savings home to the old country—to the Leaders of the Irish people—to help them to carry on a movement in Ireland which is intended to put an end to this disgraceful and miserable condition of things, to end a condition of affairs which banishes the people in thousands, year after year, and makes those who remain at home unhappy and miserable. In every other country of the world I know of—except, perhaps, some of the Turkish Provinces—the people are increasing in numbers, and in wealth and strength. But in Ireland it is thought to be sufficient if the number of cows, horses, and pigs grows; it matters not that the population diminishes. Quoting from the same authority, I find that the number of inhabited houses has declined. Between 1841 and 1861 the diminution was 333,683; between 1861 and 1871 it was 33,776; and between 1871 and 1881 it was 57,272. We are told that many of these were mud cabins, and that they were houses unfit for human habitation. No doubt of it; and if after they were thrown down the people went to live in better houses, there would be cause for satisfaction. But they did not; they had instead to fly the country; and therein lies a good deal of the trouble which has come to both the Irish and the English nations. I find, too, that pauperism has increased in the country. In the year 1885 to 1886 the increase in the number of Irish paupers was 40,422, and in the next year it was 27,103. This is a very sad and serious condition of things. There are now as many police and soldiers in Ireland as when the population was twice what it is at present, and taxation has increased while the population has declined. There are many reasons why the state of Ireland should be more peaceful. The agrarian strain has been decreased, principally by the Plan of Campaign, and many settlements have been brought about by fear of the Plan of Campaign. The number of evicted people in Ireland is, of course, limited. If the people are to be utterly cleared out of the land, there will of course be no evictions and no crime or outrage; and that seems to be the condition of things some of our rulers are seeking to bring about in Ireland. The great cause of the decline of crime, outrage, boycotting, and other such proceedings in Ireland is that the Irish people have learnt that their time of suffering is limited and cannot last long, because the English people in their millions have pledged themselves to stand by them, and will, at the very first opportunity, put an end to the miserable state of things which produces crime and outrage, dissatisfaction and disloyalty, and which produces such creatures as Pigott and the rest of the Times' witnesses. Aye, Sir, this order of things, which produces plots and conspiracies and illegalities and consequent punishment and suffering, we shall see end, and the British people will end it when they get a chance, and when they will be allowed to choose between the alternatives of Lord Salisbury's twenty years of firm and resolute government, and giving the Irish people the means of thriving and prospering in their own land, and becoming loyal members of the British Empire. The life of the policy of Coercion is limited; it cannot now last long. We look to the future with hope and confidence, and it is because these sentiments are in the hearts of the Irish people that peace, good order, and tranquillity now exist. Hon. and learned Gentlemen opposite may sneer at this, but it is in vain. They know as well as I do that the English people are a nobler and braver people than they choose to represent them. The hearts of the masses of the people have been filled with indignation by the conduct of the Government towards the Irish people, by the imprisonment of men for no treasonable or seditious practice, but who are fighting for the high and holy purpose of bettering the fortunes of their own people, without in the slightest degree impairing or injuring any imperial interest.

MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): I think any comment of mine can only detract from the value of the personal evidence laid before the House by the two hon. Members who have just spoken. I shall therefore proceed to state my views on the question before the House without dealing with those facts which have been advanced by those hon. Members. Before the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham interposed in this debate, I had supposed that we were considering the administration of the Coercion Act by Her Majesty's Government. I shall have a word or two to say presently about the position taken up by the right hon. Gentleman; but in the meantime I wish to state the views which influence me in supporting the Amendment. To begin with, I have no hesitation in disclaiming many of the opinions and sympathies which have been imputed to us by Gentlemen sitting on the other side of this House. I intend to make no personal attack on the Chief Secretary; I do not think that that is necessary to our case, and I think also that the whole Government and the whole Party, and the voters of this country who have supported the Government, are responsible for this policy, and not merely the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary. Neither do I stand here to defend crime, or to defend lawlessness or riot in any shape or form. I am glad to hear it stated by hon. Members below the Gangway who have spoken that they do not claim any special treatment whatever, either for imprisoned Members of Parliament or for priests. I do not say that the offences for which these men have been convicted are political offences. There has been a controversy on that question. I do not think it has come to anything much, but even if they were political offences I do not see that it makes much difference. But my arraignment of the Government and the reasons for which I shall feel compelled to vote for the Amendment are mainly three. I charge the Government, in the first place, with wanton, capricious, and unnecessary enforcement of the Criminal Law. I charge them, in the second place, with enforcing the law by means of, and by the use of, tribunals which are unconstitutional in status and incompetent in fact. And, in the third place, I say that, when they have dragged their prisoners before these tribunals and have convicted them there, they have been guilty of inflicting capricious and brutal forms of punishment. Now, as to the charge of unnecessary and wanton enforcement of the Criminal Law. We hear it said repeatedly on the other side of this House that the law must be enforced and obeyed. That is the parrot cry of everyone who defends the policy of the Government. Sir, there is no distinction to be drawn between us in this matter. It is quite true in regard to the Civil Law of the land that where the law has conferred civil rights upon a private citizen, it is the duty of the Executive Government of the day to see that the rights obtained by that citizen from a legal tribunal are enforced. But I deny that this proposition is true of the Criminal Law. In matters of criminal jurisdiction which the Government has initiated, it has, or ought to have, discretion. There are crimes and crimes, and life would be intolerable in this, or in any other country, if all the laws constituting crimes were to be enforced as a matter of course. The very first Private Bill on our list this Session is one brought in by the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh), proposing to repeal laws which enforce penalties in regard to matters of religion and conscience—laws such as those against blasphemy and Sunday trading, which you do not attempt to enforce even under the Coercion Act, and the enforcement of which was abandoned a considerable time ago. Let me point out the kind of crimes that come home more directly to hon. Members. I allude to cases constituting a form of libel against the House, over which this House, as a Court, possesses full jurisdiction. During the short time I have been a Member of this House many occasions have arisen when such offences have been committed, and you have declined to enforce the penalty. And in this very question of libel there are lurking crimes which may yet prove dangerous to hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite, and as to which there is a criminal penalty attaching, not only to the utterance of the libel, but to those who, by themselves or their servants, merely sell the libels to the public. Do you propose to enforce the Criminal Law in these respects; and, if not, what is the value of your contention in defence of your Irish policy that the law must be enforced? It is, therefore, mere pedantry to talk of the enforcement of the Criminal Law as a matter of course. There is, I believe at the present moment, on the Statute Book, a law which makes it a crime for any person to deny that the Long Parliament has not yet dissolved. That is a specimen of the extreme position you would have to adopt if you insisted on the enforcement of all kinds of Criminal Laws at all hazards. What I wish to point out is that the laws you do enforce under the Coercion Act belong to the category of unenforceable laws. I was glad to hear from the Solicitor General for Ireland the admission that conspiracy is the typical offence which may be prosecuted under the Coercion Act. We have only to look, as far as the imprisonment of hon. Members of this House is concerned, to the Reports made by the Resident Magistrates, to see that this is true. I have not the Return as to Mr. O'Brien, but I have examined that as to Mr. Carew, and I find that the crime of which he was convicted was that of conspiring with persons unknown to induce other persons unknown not to take farms from which tenants are or may be evicted. The great objection to this kind of conspiracy is that there is no criminality in it except the fact of combination. You have been enforcing the Criminal Law as conspiracy combination, which has for its object no criminal act; at all events, as far as Members of this House are concerned, the aim and object of the convictions has been to render criminal in combination that which would not be criminal in the individual. When the Coercion Act was before the House, the question of criminal conspiracy was certainly discussed, but I incline to think that justice was not done on a very important point. But my learned Friend the Member for Hackney (Sir C. Russell) did put on the Paper an Amendment which raised certain questions, but, somehow, by discussions anticipating them, the full force of our objections to that part of the Bill was dissipated. I do not think the House fully recognizes what is this conspiracy law which sanctions the enforcement of Coercion. The Common Law makes that criminal in two persons which is not criminal in one. A great jurist states that conspiracy was an art invented by lawyer-judges to fasten the colour of guilt upon the innocent; and

I say that the Irish Judges have carried this definition to an extreme that would not have been admitted as good law when the Coercion Act was passed. Under this law a landlord may refuse to let a farm to a class of people, but a class may not combine to refuse to accept a farm from the landlord. Lord Salisbury may refuse to grant a site for a place of worship to Dissenters at Hatfield, but if the Dissenters at Hatfield combine to refuse to take a site from Lord Salisbury at Hatfield, they may be guilty of a criminal offence, for which they may be indicted at law. That was the law which was condemned long ago by the Commission which was appointed to draft the Criminal Code for this country. That Commission proposed to abolish conspiracy with certain exceptions. The conspiracies they recommended to be continued on the Statute Book were seditious conspiracies, conspiracies to pervert the course of justice, conspiracies to murder, conspiracies to defraud, conspiracies to prevent by force the collection of rates and taxes—nothing, mark you, about rents—they proposed to abolish all other forms of conspiracy, including the kind of conspiracy you are trying to enforce by your administration of the Coercion Act. Another distinguished jurist, Mr. Justice Stephen, says, referring to a case which came before the Irish Judges—

“If it be correctly reported, and is good law, it would follow that two brothers having a sister about to contract a marriage, and who agreed to exclude her from their society, would, if by so doing they prevented the marriage, be guilty of an indictable conspiracy.”

Mr. Justice Stephen adds—

“This seems to me to show that the law is laid down far too hardly on the occasion in question.”

This was written before the Coercion Act was passed, and, therefore, before conspiracy cases could come under it. I say, then, that in using this law to punish for conspiracy hon. Members who are only guilty by virtue of the common doctrine of conspiracy to which I have referred, you are taking an improper advantage of English legislation. The Report of the Commission on this subject has practically been accepted by all parties in this country. In attempting to set up again, as a crime, that which is no crime, but which has been

shall therefore proceed to state my views on the question before the House without dealing with those facts which have been advanced by those hon. Members. Before the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham interposed in this debate, I had supposed that we were considering the administration of the Coercion Act by Her Majesty's Government. I shall have a word or two to say presently about the position taken up by the right hon. Gentleman; but in the meantime I wish to state the views which influence me in supporting the Amendment. To begin with, I have no hesitation in disclaiming many of the opinions and sympathies which have been imputed to us by Gentlemen sitting on the other side of this House. I intend to make no personal attack on the Chief Secretary; I do not think that that is necessary to our case, and I think also that the whole Government and the whole Party, and the voters of this country who have supported the Government, are responsible for this policy, and not merely the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary. Neither do I stand here to defend crime, or to defend lawlessness or riot in any shape or form. I am glad to hear it stated by hon. Members below the Gangway who have spoken that they do not claim any special treatment whatever, either for imprisoned Members of Parliament or for priests. I do not say that the offences for which these men have been convicted are political offences. There has been a controversy on that question. I do not think it has come to anything much, but even if they were political offences I do not see that it makes much difference. But my arraignment of the Government and the reasons for which I shall feel compelled to vote for the Amendment are mainly three. I charge the Government, in the first place, with wanton, capricious, and unnecessary enforcement of the Criminal Law. I charge them, in the second place, with enforcing the law by means of, and by the use of, tribunals which are unconstitutional in status and incompetent in fact. And, in the third place, I say that, when they have dragged their prisoners before these tribunals and have convicted them there, they have been guilty of inflicting capricious and brutal forms of punishment. Now, as to the charge of unnecessary and wanton enforcement of the Criminal Law. We hear it said repeatedly on the other side of this House that the law must be enforced and obeyed. That is the parrot cry of everyone who defends the policy of the Government. Sir, there is no distinction to be drawn between us in this matter. It is quite true in regard to the Civil Law of the land that where the law has conferred civil rights upon a private citizen, it is the duty of the Executive Government of the day to see that the rights obtained by that citizen from a legal tribunal are enforced. But I deny that this proposition is true of the Criminal Law. In matters of criminal jurisdiction which the Government has initiated, it has, or ought to have, discretion. There are crimes and crimes, and life would be intolerable in this, or in any other country, if all the laws constituting crimes were to be enforced as a matter of course. The very first Private Bill on our list this Session is one brought in by the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh), proposing to repeal laws which enforce penalties in regard to matters of religion and conscience—laws such as those against blasphemy and Sunday trading, which you do not attempt to enforce even under the Coercion Act, and the enforcement of which was abandoned a considerable time ago. Let me point out the kind of crimes that come home more directly to hon. Members. I allude to cases constituting a form of libel against the House, over which this House, as a Court, possesses full jurisdiction. During the short time I have been a Member of this House many occasions have arisen when such offences have been committed, and you have declined to enforce the penalty. And in this very question of libel there are heinous crimes which may yet prove dangerous to hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite, and as to which there is a criminal penalty attaching, not to the utterance of the libel, but to the person who, by themselves or their agents, merely sell the libels to the public. You propose to enforce the Criminal Law in these respects, and, if not, what is the value of your contention in regard to your Irish policy that the law is enforced? It is, therefore, not worth while to talk of the enforcement of the law.

Mr. K. Robertson

MEMBER: "Well worth it."] Certainly well worth it—"There are the Radicals of the constituency." Now, the Radicals of the constituency were assembled in considerably larger numbers in close proximity to the place where the right hon. Gentleman was speaking. There were some 30,000 or 40,000 of them, and I have not heard that they applied any such title to the right hon. Gentleman as "Liberal Leader"; nor do I think that if in their hearts they regarded him as a Liberal Leader, they would have ended their meeting in the manner they did. I make these remarks about the right hon. Gentleman simply because there is no man in English politics who so consistently and persistently poses—I pause for another adverb—so unwarrantedly arrogates to himself the privileges of Leadership. The right hon. Gentleman is for ever talking of himself as the Leader. I well remember some years ago that he excused himself from the performance of the most important duties which a Member of this House can discharge—I mean that of attendance in Committee considering the estimates, by saying, "that no first-class Statesman ever condescended to do so." It is not the right hon. Gentleman who is entitled to ask what our plans are. Our Leaders, I have no doubt, will produce their plans under proper conditions and at the proper time, but certainly not at the demand of the right hon. Gentleman. Let me. We hear from the Unionists and from the Chancellor of the Exchequer that their main business is to protect the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament. I was glad to hear to-night from the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) the adoption of that principle quite as emphatically, and with a good deal more significance, than anything that could come from Liberal Unionists. My cardinal principles for the solution of this question are these—first of all, that we are going to maintain, at all hazards, the real and effective supremacy of this Imperial Parliament. Secondly, and in subordination to that, we are going to give to the people of Ireland a full and just measure of local or national self-government. I do not greatly care, so long as the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament is maintained, how large the measure of self-government may be. I do not know whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer means the same thing as I mean; but by the supremacy of Parliament I mean the supremacy of this House over all the principalities and potentates, whether in Ireland or any other part of the Empire—the supremacy of this House over the Clerical Convention that sits under its shadow, over the other House of Parliament, and over the Throne; and, maintaining that supremacy, I think we may safely grant any measure of Home Rule that may be demanded by Representatives in this House. I unhesitatingly vote for the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne.

*MR. ASQUITH (Fife, E.): Mr. Speaker, if it were possible to look at this question from a purely Party point of view, I confess that I for one should think it a little ungracious on our part to invite the House to pass so severe a censure on the policy of the Chief Secretary. In the great struggle in which we have been engaged during the last three years I regard, and I suppose many on this side of the House regard, the right hon. Gentleman as our best friend and our most valuable ally. Many causes have contributed during that time, by the removal of misunderstandings, by the dispelling of prejudices, to incline the judgment of the people of Great Britain in the direction of Home Rule. But among those causes I am firmly convinced that none has been one-hundredth part so potent and so effective as the administration by the right hon. Gentleman of the exceptional powers which Parliament has placed in his hands. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has told the House—and I agree with him—that the responsibility for what is going on in Ireland does not rest upon the shoulders of the Chief Secretary alone—that it is shared and must be shared by every Member of the Cabinet. I go a great deal further, and I say that it ought to be and must be shared by every Member of the Unionist majority. But, Sir, just as there is a good way of doing good things, so also there is a bad way of doing bad things. There were, as we pointed out at the time, many condemned by an authoritative Commission, and also by your own predecessors, you stand convicted of endeavouring to use against your own political opponents in Ireland a weapon which is a condemned instrument. My second objection to the course taken by the Government is one which applies to the Coercion Act itself rather than to its administration. I assert that in addition to the great mistake of making Common Law conspiracy a crime, you have resorted to unconstitutional and incompetent tribunals. I will not touch upon the character or antecedents of the Resident Magistrates; but I do wish to enter my protest against a judicial system which is the inversion of the true Constitutional theory. What is the theory of the Constitution on which you ought to rely? Is it that the Executive is the servant of the judiciary, or is the Resident Magistrate, who is the judiciary in Ireland, the servant of the Executive? Lastly, I would join in the protest made against the character of the punishments inflicted under this Act. The penalties imposed have carried with them indignities to which those who suffer the penalties have been improperly subjected. Such penalties could not be enforced for offences under a similar category—at all events, not for long—under European law. Take the Vaccination Act, offences against which would, if commonly proceeded against, as in cases under the Coercion Act, send to prison something like 160 Members of Parliament. Take the Public Worship Regulation Act: that, if administered as you administer the Coercion Act, would relegate to prison a number of Bishops and, possibly, 1,000 clergymen. These illustrations will, I think, convince you of the danger of giving countenance to any such administration of the law as obtains in the case of the Coercion Act. An hon. Member proposes to introduce an Eight Hours Bill; and suppose he invoked the Criminal Law against offences under that measure, should it become law, what would be the result? I do not like to contemplate what it would be; and I say this is the great danger of legislation which is likely to be proposed. I am aware that some Members of the House would enforce their views on matters of this sort at all hazards. I wish to allude to the speeches of the right hon. Gentleman

(Mr. Chamberlain) last night, and of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to-night. I think all of us on this side agree with the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the Local Government proposals to which he referred would meet with scant acceptance in this House. He also apparently favoured the scheme fathered by the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Courtney); but we are all agreed, I think, that Local Government in districts is not a remedy for Ireland, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer may be sure of a ready response to the criticism of the proposal which he made in the earlier part of the evening. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said that local self-government in Ireland would be throttled in its cradle, because a political flavour would be given to it, and because local bodies would be used in furtherance of the very things that the Government are constituted to prevent. The Irish people are not going to give up those designs which he says he is sent here to prevent, and when he says that he will withhold local government until they do give them up, then, in effect, he has abandoned altogether the promises of local government which he and his Party proposed. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Chamberlain) endeavoured to draw Home Rule across the scent of the debate. He tried to draw from the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) a statement of his plans of Home Rule. I never for one moment supposed that the right hon. Gentleman would be drawn in any such innocent fashion. I never for a moment supposed that he is to develop all his plans now, and that he is to do it at the demand of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, who has no right whatever to talk about plans to us. The right hon. Gentleman has done me the distinguished honour of going down to my own constituency in Scotland. He declared there, if not here, in Glasgow, that he was one of the Liberal Leaders. He said, "I, who, by your courtesy, are called the Leaders of the Liberal Party." I have been a courteous acquaintance of Liberals to have applied the designation to the right hon. Gentleman. He said to a crowd of persons, mostly ladies, who were in their places, as they were called, of any other c.

right hon. Gentleman's conduct. So far as I can make out, the sum and substance of the Chief Secretary's defence amounts to this—that in his judgment those who incite to crime ought to be dealt with as severely, both in the matter of prosecution and the matter of punishment, as those who perpetrate crime. Very good. So say all of us. In our judgment, as in the judgment of the right hon. Gentleman, the man who, whether for a political or any other object, instigates to the commission of crime, and the man who either recklessly or deliberately accepts and profits by and trades on the fruits of crime is every whit as guilty, and often a hundred times more guilty, than his poor, degraded, hunger-driven instruments. I can assure the right hon. Gentleman he will find on this side of the House unanimous and emphatic assent to that doctrine. We accept the right hon. Gentleman's doctrine, but where we differ from him is in its practical application. The Chief Secretary has had under lock and key during the last two years some 25 Members of this House, the great majority of whom have been prosecuted in respect of speeches which they have either made or published. It is quite true that the right hon. Member for West Birmingham, who has discovered that there are actually only 111 persons now in prison under the Crimes Act, is astounded, and even apparently a little shocked, at the moderation of the Chief Secretary. But it is sufficient that the offence of 20 out of those 25 Members of Parliament was either speaking or publishing a speech. The right hon. Gentleman told us that those Members of Parliament, by their speeches, have been producing boycotting, and, through boycotting, outrage and even assassination. That is a very serious statement for a Member of the Government to make on his official responsibility. It ought not to be made in this House unless evidence is forthcoming in support of it. And I challenge him or any Member of the Government who may follow in debate to produce in the case of any one of those 25 Members one single instance in which, directly or indirectly, proximately or remotely, but by a traceable and provable causal connection, any speech for which there has been a prosecution has been followed by outrage or assassination. That, Sir, is a fair challenge, and I trust that it will be met in the spirit in which it is made. The right hon. Gentleman tells us that a man who goes into a district where land-grabbing prevails and denounces the land-grabber, and advises the people to abstain from dealing with him, ought to be punished by the law. Under what law? I assert that by the law of England, which is also the law of Ireland, it is not a crime to resolve to abstain from dealing with a particular person and to act on that resolve. I assert further that it is not a crime for men to combine together to abstain from dealing with a particular person; it is not a crime to advise people so to combine. Such advice and such combination only become criminal when they are carried out by illegal means, such as compulsion or coercion, or when it can be shown that the combination does not spring from legitimate self-interest, and that its motive is personal malice, and its controlling object the ruin of the individual. Let hon. Members test the application of these principles in Mr. O'Brien's or 20 similar cases. Let us take Mr. O'Brien's case as a sample. What the Resident Magistrates do is this. It being proved before the magistrates that the defendant has advised combination to boycott, they presume, without a tittle of evidence, that the object of the combination is illegal, and that the means by which it is to be effected are illegal also. It is quite true that making speeches is not equally dangerous in all parts of Ireland. The hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for North Armagh has not repudiated that speech of his which has been alluded to several times in this debate. That hon. and gallant Gentleman, speaking in that Alsatia, so far as the Crimes Act is concerned—the province of Ulster—asserted that, in a certain event, he would rise in arms and resist forcibly the decrees of an Irish Parliament. I am not very much alarmed at the picture which he draws of what he and his compatriots are going to do. We know how to appraise at their true value the noisy and vapid heroics of the Orange platform. The hon. Gentleman tells us he and his fellow-countrymen are going to die in the last ditch rather than submit to a Dublin Parliament; but history will record a very different story. It will tell how, not on the tented field, not by fire and sword, but under the gentle compulsion of 17½ years' purchase of the judicial rents, the heroic leaders of this devoted band of patriots stole quietly off from the post of honour and duty, in the direction of the Holyhead boat, their pockets well stuffed with the sovereigns of the British taxpayer. Sir, I only allude to the hon. Gentleman's speech for the purpose of making two observations upon it. In the first place, I was very much struck with the novel Constitutional doctrine which it elicited from the right hon. Member for West Birmingham, who is certainly making rapid strides in political science. He laid it down that it was beyond the moral competence of an Imperial Parliament to create, against the will of a small minority, in any part of the Queen's dominions, a subordinate authority with delegated legislative powers. If Parliament does so, that minority has the right hon. Gentleman's sanction for resisting the law. This is the latest version of the gospel of law and order. But, Sir, there is another remark which I wish to make in reference to the hon. and gallant Member's speech. What a striking illustration the making of this speech is of the operation of that even-handed system of equity and justice which excites the enthusiastic admiration of the right hon. Gentleman the Chairman of Committees. A Member of this House may not go to Tipperary, which has been peculiarly free of late years from serious crime, and denounce, coupled with every warning against crime and outrage, that great outrage against the best interests of society in Ireland—the offence of land-grabbing—without exposing himself to the risks of prosecution, conviction, and imprisonment; but in Ulster another Member may, with absolute impunity, incite his fellow-countrymen to civil war, and announce and approve of alleged treasonable intentions on the part of men who have taken an oath to serve Her Majesty, and who wear her uniform. The Government say that their policy has been a great practical success—trade is reviving, prices are increasing, and even the seasons seem to have enlisted themselves in the service of the Union. Perhaps never before has there been heard from a Minister such a glowing proclamation of the beatitudes of coercion. I am not now concerned to inquire into the accuracy of these statements, but I cannot but suspect that if instead of immuring himself in Dublin Castle, the Chief Secretary for Ireland would take an excursion to Donegal, Gweedore, Western Galway, or Mayo, he might see sights that would ruffle his complacent optimism. But, accepting for the purpose of argument this rose-coloured view, I ask the right hon. Gentleman why have not the Government the courage to act upon their opinions? It is alleged by the Unionists that Irish discontent and unrest of Ireland, so far as they are real, arise from economical and agrarian causes; and that, so far as they are political, they are artificial, and are kept alive by conspiracy and intimidations. Assume it to be so; why, here is a splendid opportunity for testing the justice of that opinion. On the one hand, material causes of discontent, if not removed, are in abeyance, and the artificial causes have been put down by resolution administration. In these circumstances, I venture to suggest to the hon. and gallant Member for Armagh, that instead of expressing his readiness to die in the last ditch, he should render his cause a more practical service. Let him accept the Chiltern Hundreds and go to Galway, Kerry, or Clare, which we are told have been, by the beneficent operation of the right hon. Gentleman's policy, freed from distress, and delivered from the domination of the National League. No doubt some Nationalist Member will resign his seat to enable him to try the experiment, and he might thus have the distinction of becoming the first exponent in the House of the genuine opinion of the emancipated Irish democracy. I do not think that the hon. and gallant Gentleman will jump at that offer; and why not? Because he knows, and the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary knows, that though the Government may have succeeded by brute force, by straining the law, and by the employment of methods and agents which are dishonouring to the best traditions of English statemanship in putting down the organization of the people, yet they have not advanced one inch on the road of conciliating them and winning their affections. That in our judgment is the goal, and the only goal, of a sound and a far-sighted statesmanship. It is because we believe that every step taken by the right hon. Gentleman only widens the gulf between the two countries that, in the interests of Union, no less than in the interests of liberty, we shall oppose his policy to the end.

MR. PARNELL (Cork): Mr. Speaker, I desire to support in a very words the Amendment on which we are shortly to divide. I agree with the Amendment that the system of government pursued in Ireland by the right hon. Gentleman and his instruments is unjust and oppressive to the Irish people; and I pray, with the concluding portion of the Amendment, that this system may give place to measures of conciliation which may truly cement the union between the two countries. I desire also, Sir, to express some words of sympathy for my Colleagues who have suffered, and are suffering, in Ireland by the unscrupulous means adopted by the right hon. Gentleman. I sympathize with my friends who have bravely counterworked the present Government in Ireland, and I believe that they will be richly rewarded in the near future by the victory which patient suffering always in the end wins over tyranny. The right hon. Gentleman sought to intimidate by the infliction of prison pains and penalties. He failed in that. His victims were not intimidated by suffering. He now seeks to degrade them. The association with ordinary criminals and all the other unnecessary incidents connected with the system of prison discipline in Ireland is an attempt to degrade them. My hon. friends have not been degraded either in their own opinion, in the opinion of their countrymen, or in the opinion of the people of England. It is the old story. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. A. J. Balfour) has run through the different grades. "Oh! give me power to imprison any man I please," said the late Mr. Forster, "and I am assured by those who know Ireland well that this movement will crumble away before me." Mr. Forster failed. The right hon. Gentleman thought that by adding to power of imprisonment at will the power also of inflicting these hardships and these degradations he could conquer the resistance of Ireland, but he also is finding out his mistake. He has been exceptionally fortunate. Ever since he came into Office the prices of produce have been steadily rising. If it had not been for the means he has used, I believe he would now see a fairly tranquil Ireland instead of a discontented one from the centre to the sea. Among the other successes of the right hon. Gentleman's Government, I suppose he will also claim, as sworn in the Commission Court the other day, the doubling in numbers during the period of his administration of the revolutionary society called the Clan-na-Gael. Well, Sir, it is useless for the Government to plead, as they have pleaded, that they have to administer the law and that the law does not permit them to alter the system of prison discipline. The law is as they make it. They refused us the right to suggest alterations in the law. They forced upon Parliament the rule of urgency under which we were prohibited from moving a clause directed to the very question of prison discipline. It is they and their majority who are responsible for this law, and they must stand or fall by the results of its working. I shall not stop now to remind the House of one of the means by which they obtained this urgency, of the conspiracy which assisted them on the very night of the Second Reading to steal away the liberties of Ireland. They will have, then, to stand or fall by this law as it stands. It is useless for them now to whine, as some of them are doing, and to say that indeed they would like to see some distinction made between the treatment of political prisoners and others. But it is owing to them and to their action that this distinction was not made two years ago. We are entitled, and the country is entitled, to hold them responsible for the results—results which compel a man like Mr. William O'Brien, and like Mr. Carew, and like my friend Mr. William Redmond, to lie on the plank bed, and to associate with common and vile criminals for political offences committed in Ireland. You wish now, you say, to alter the law and to secure this difference of treatment, and I suppose you claim credit because you have placed Mr. O'Brien and Mr. Carew in hospital, and given them back their clothes. But we do not claim this treatment as exceptional to these gentlemen. On the contrary, we think less of them and of their sufferings than we do of those of the humblest men in our ranks. And why? Because those humbler men have not the same chances in their fight against your system. You cannot kill Mr. O'Brien; you dare not kill him. You cannot torture Mr. Carew to death; you dare not do so. How about the others? How about the obscurer men, men who are not Members of Parliament, men like John Mandeville, who were done to death in carrying out this system, and necessarily done to death if you must carry out the system? How about Larkin, a young man convicted of a political offence, just as much a political offence as the offences committed by Mr. O'Brien and Mr. Carew? It is for these men that we have the most sympathy, because the fight for them is not an even, not an equal one. It is in the interests of these men—everyday men—that we claim an alteration of the law, and an alteration of the prison treatment. I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman intends to alter the law; but he has placed himself in the position which he occupies to-night. He has said that there shall be no distinction between the treatment of political prisoners and persons convicted of any other offence in Ireland. Therefore he is obliged to carry out this law to its bitter end. But it is not consistent to give Mr. O'Brien and Mr. Carew this exceptional treatment if he does not extend the same treatment to the others. Let me say a word to the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh (Colonel Saunderson), who has treated us to some of his fire-eating qualities with which we are so familiar. He has told us of the 50,000 armed men he is going to put into the field. I venture to think that if he ever succeeds in putting them into the field they will not remain very long there, and I will tell him why. There is no example in history of a determined rebellion by a people or by a large section of a people unless they were spurred on to it—incited to it—by great oppression, suffering, and injustice. The hon. and gallant Gentleman thinks that he will be able to incite the Orangemen of the North of Ireland into a determined and stubborn resistance not against the rest of Ireland merely, but against the Parliament and against England and Scotland, when no oppression has been inflicted upon them, when they will have no grievances to complain of, when they will not have been touched or injured in any respect. I say of the hon. and gallant Gentleman that he is simply led away by his own enthusiasm, and that he will find it is impossible to create such a movement out of such unpromising material. I say of the hon. and gallant Gentleman that if he is able to persuade this House to remove the grievances of Ireland, and to continue to meet the wants and requirements of the Irish people; and if, after a long series of years, he is able to prove to the people of Ireland that this House is really willing and able to meet the necessities of that country, then I believe that he would banish discontent in Ireland. Now, which does the hon. and gallant Gentleman supposed to be the greater—the capacity and the will for rebellion of the Orangemen of the North, or of the Fenian of the South, the East, and the West of Ireland? Surely his own friends must be the most loyal or the least disloyal; surely he would claim that for them. And does he not see the hopelessness of the task which he puts before himself when he vouches for the coming disloyalty of the Orangemen of Ulster, untouched as they would be by any oppression, and without any of those inducements to rebellion and revolt which must always exist under the conditions I have referred to. Before I sit down I wish to say that we have every confidence that in the near future the people of this country will see that our cause is a just one; and that it is possible to arrange such a system as will permit Ireland to have the power of dealing with all those matters which concern herself, and herself alone, without the slightest shadow of danger or risk to the interests of the Empire and of this country. All I ask is, that you, on your side, should be willing to consider and deal with this question as if it were an open question; that you should consider how far you can give to Ireland the right to legislate for herself with safety to your own greater, and undoubtedly more overpowering, influence. It is legitimate and right that we, being the smaller country, should endeavour to conciliate you in every possible manner, and yield to you, and agree to such safeguards as you may think necessary or desirable for the security of your own interests. We have always been anxious and willing to do so, and we are willing to do so still. I am convinced that our people, knowing that England and Scotland and Wales have for the first time turned the ear of reason to the solution of this question, will steadily resist every incitement to disorder, to turbulence, and to crime; and that they will hold fast in the true way pointed out to them by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian in 1885, until he gets that chance, which we hope and believe will be a near one, both for the sake of Ireland and for the sake of England, of again touching the great heart of his countrymen.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham): I am sure we all must earnestly hope that the advice which the hon. Member (Mr. Parnell) has just given will be followed. If it had been given and followed in the past, we should not now be engaged in the present discussion of alleged cases of hardship under the Crimes Act. Unfortunately there has too often in the past appeared a close connection—I will not say a criminal connection—between the action of political agitators in Ireland and the subsequent outrages which have unfortunately taken place. The hon. Gentleman has complained of the Act which is now being administered having been unduly hurried through the House. Such a complaint comes strangely from the hon. Gentleman, who certainly did very little to control the action of his followers during the 20 days that were devoted to the Committee stage of the Bill, and whose conduct led to such a waste of time as to necessitate the course that was at last taken to terminate their proceedings. The chief grievance, however, that has been brought forward in this debate—time does not allow me to go into the minor charges—is the alleged improper and cruel treatment of prisoners convicted under the Crimes Act. The point has apparently been abandoned that they are political prisoners. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. Gladstone) said he would not attempt to give a definition of a political offender, and the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon) and the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) have both said, “We claim no special privileges for Members of Parliament; we claim no privilege for the political opponent; we claim that all men convicted under the Crimes Act should have exceptional treatment.” And we have in the course of the debate—

MR. PARNELL: I said that anyone convicted of a political offence should be treated as a political prisoner.

*MR. MATTHEWS: But the hon. Member did not define a political offence, and what I assert is that none of the offences of which the Gentlemen in question have been convicted can properly be described as political offences. At this time of night (11.25) I am not going into a long disquisition as to political offences, but I think I am right in saying that offences which are not against the Government, but rather against individuals and private property, cannot be regarded as political offences, and that, as has been admitted by the hon. Member for Fife (Mr. Asquith), those who incite to the commission of offences are as guilty as those who commit them. It is said that there is degradation in the ordinary prison treatment, but where are you to draw the line? Is it not much the same degradation to be in the custody of gaolers at all, or is the line only crossed when it comes to the question of clothes? Such distinctions cannot be maintained. If the law is broken in obedience to a higher moral or Divine law, there can be no degradation at all in the punishment that follows upon conviction. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. Gladstone) has referred to the cases of Cobbett, Hobhouse, and O’Connell, in which in years past exceptional treatment was extended. But he cannot have forgotten that it was precisely on account of these cases, and the possibility of providing different treatment in each case, that the law was altered to its present form. The whole tendency of modern legislation has been to substitute a rigid and uniform system of prison treatment for the latitude that previously existed. I can state to the House with great confidence that in England I have absolutely no power of dispensation. The right hon. Gentleman must know perfectly well that since the Act of 1865 I have no power, nor have the Prison Board any power, to dispense with any of the incidents of prison life, whether they be harsh or degrading or not. I do not know whether in Irish prisons there is more latitude or not—I dare say there is not—but be it observed that the reason for imposing the present conditions is a most sound and excellent one. The theory of punishment in our modern legislation is that it ought to be well-defined; that all its incidents ought to be defined by law; and that the sentence of the Judge should carry certain and definite consequences. Nothing could be more fatal than to leave to the Executive Government or with the Chief Secretary for Ireland a discretion either to relax punishment or to make it more severe. In the discharge of my own duty I have often come across cases in which it is most painful to inflict the punishment prescribed. Take the case, for instance, of the anti-vaccinators, those who, foolishly mistaken as I believe them to be, set themselves in opposition to the Vaccination Law—conscientious men perhaps, but breakers of the law; or take the members of the Salvation Army, who, in the discharge of what they consider their duty, obstruct the highway and create a disturbance in a quiet country town. The Court sentences these offenders, and the ordinary prison treatment accompanies the sentence. Can it be maintained that the Executive should depart from the ordinary rules of discipline and allow relaxation in individual and particular cases for which Parliament has declared the proper prison discipline, because, foresooth! you sympathize with this and that offender, and because you think they were influenced by motives not wholly bad, base, or degrading? Such is not the policy of Parliament pursued since 1865 in England; on the contrary, the Legislature has condemned such exceptions. When unmeasured attacks are made upon the Chief Secretary in this respect he is only doing what in England I am bound to do—giving effect to the sentence in all particulars the law requires without interference in favour of any man, sympathize though I may with the offender undergoing punishment. All those who desire that penal legislation should be certain, uniform, withdrawn from the caprice or control of the Executive officer, and committed to a judicial minister of the law, must approve the system. I should like now to take up the challenge of the hon. Member for Fife and the hon. Member for Cork, and prove that the men of culture who have been sentenced did not deserve any special treatment. Let me take the case of Mr. E. Harrington, and when I speak of him I do not imply anything except what appears on the record. I invite the attention of the hon. and learned Member for Fife to this, inasmuch as he has called for evidence of cause and effect as between the speech and the outrages in the county. Let the hon. Gentleman remember what the condition of things in Kerry was. You had an active local branch of the National League denouncing persons by name, among whom were two men named Foran and Fitzmaurice. Foran was murdered in January, 1888, and Fitzmaurice in July, 1888. You had consequent upon these crimes a rigorous enforcement of the Crimes Act in Kerry. The local branch of the National League was—I will not say entirely suppressed, but certainly weakened—the publication of its proceedings at meetings in the newspapers was suspended for a time, and the country quieted down. But all of a sudden, in the course of last autumn, in consequence, I believe, of an order grounded upon Mr. O'Brien's opinion that "it was necessary to show Balfour that his troubles in Ireland were only beginning," the county again became disturbed. I should like to know what this phrase implied? Are "Balfour's troubles in Ireland" created by prosperity, good conduct, peace, order, the regular payment of rents, or the discharge of social obligations? It became most important, in view of Mr. O'Brien, that Balfour should be shown that his troubles were only beginning, and, in pursuance of that advice, you had the proceedings of the local branch of the National League published in Kerry, in the place where the blood of Foran and Fitzmaurice was scarcely dry, and upon the estate of Lord Kenmare it was sought to establish the Plan of Campaign. This is what was published—

"Despite the Coercion Act, and after the Coercion Act expires, for ever and ever after, until the Irish Question is settled, land-grabbing shall not show its head in Kerry, or in any part of Ireland."

Then the speaker, by way of advice to the branch, says—

"If an obnoxious man, time after time, comes into conflict with you, you should go for him, and see whether he or you is to be victorious."

Do not let me be misunderstood. I will not assert—I am not entitled to assert—that the intention of the speaker was to lead to the events that followed. I will not insinuate what I am not prepared to say outright, but I do say that these words were published in a place which was like a gunpowder magazine, in a place where experience had shown the effect of such denunciation as was employed. What were the consequences? Outrages had well-nigh ceased. The hon. Member for South Tyrone has mentioned the declining figures, but in this place outrages occurred in October, November, and December, some 12 or 13 in number. I will give a sample of the wretched peasants on the hill sides, who were subjected to nightly visitors who placed them in terror of their lives, detest us or our administration of the law. I do not believe that Norah Fitzmaurice hates us. I do not believe that any man who wishes to live honestly, who believes that social order is the corner stone of national prosperity, hates us. The Irish people have sense enough to see that we are not actuated by the vile and odious motives hon. Members are fond of imputing to the Government, and will speedily realize that our only object is by firmness and determination to be strictly just and restore the country to happiness and prosperity.

MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): The right hon. Gentleman in the course of his speech twitted the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian with first indicating his Irish sympathies by the Home Rule Bill of 1886. This came with a very bad grace from the Home Secretary, who, as we all know, supported Home Rule when he was returned as Member for Dungarvan. He stood as the Fenian candidate for that borough in 1868.

*THE HOME SECRETARY: That is not a fact; the statement is absolutely incorrect. I was not a Fenian candidate in 1868, and never did anything of the kind.

MR. W. REDMOND: I withdraw the statement that the right hon. Gentleman was a Fenian candidate. I believe he was not actually a Fenian, but certainly he received the support of the Fenian Party and the support of the newspapers then owned by Mr. Richard Pigott. At any rate it is perfectly competent for Members of the House who feel sufficient interest in the subject to look up the files of newspapers for that period, to find the declarations of the right hon. Gentleman in reference to the Dungarvan Election, which were thoroughly satisfactory to the Home Rule Party, and led that Party to give him warm support, because those declarations showed distinctly he was in favour of self-government for Ireland. Now that the sometime Home Rule Member has become an English Tory Minister and has cut his connection with Ireland, we and the Irish people pay very little attention to what he says on the subject.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

POOR LAW RELIEF.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

*THE EARL OF STRAFFORD, in rising to ask whether it is intended to move for the reappointment of the Select Committee which sat during last Session on Poor Law Relief, said: My Lords, Probably it will be in the recollection of your Lordships that a Committee was appointed early in last Session on the Motion of the noble Earl the late Viceroy of Ireland, and the terms of the Reference to the Committee were rather wide. The Committee was appointed—

“To inquire as to the various powers now in possession of Poor Law Guardians, and their adequacy to cope with distress that may from time to time exist in the Metropolis and other populous places; and also as to the expediency of concerted action between the Poor Law Authorities and voluntary agencies for the relief of distress.”

The Committee was presided over by the noble Earl the late Secretary of State for India, and that noble Lord drew up a most interesting and elaborate Report. The Committee sat for 18 days and examined 45 witnesses, but in the time at their disposal they were only able to deal with that part of the reference which related to the Metropolis, and could not go into the wide subjects covered by the reference as to “other populous places.” In their Report the Committee express the advisability of their being re-appointed in order that in a subsequent Session of Parliament they might continue their inquiries still further. My Lords, it is something like twenty-one years since any Committee of your Lordships’ House inquired into the working of the Poor Laws. I think it was in the Session of 1867, what was called a Poor Law Relief Bill was referred to a Committee, and they reported upon it; but since that time no stock has been taken of the way in which the Poor Law has been worked. Considering that it is on the efficiency with which the Poor Law is administered in England and Wales that the well-being and comfort of the poorer classes very much depend, I think that every now and then we should have an inquiry into its working, and as the Committee last year only dealt with London and not with “other populous places,” I trust the Government will either consent to the re-appointment of the old Committee or the appointment of a new one. If the Government do not see their way to do this, I would ask my noble Friend whether, if the Committee is moved for by the noble Earl who moved for it last year, the Government will give its assent?

*LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH: In addition to the Question appearing on the paper, the noble Earl asks me whether if any noble Lord moves for this Committee the Government will assent to the Motion. First of all dealing with the Question on the paper, I may say at once that it is not the intention of the Government to move the reappointment of the Committee. The Committee of last year was not appointed on the initiation of the Government, it was assented to by the Government upon the Motion of the noble Earl sitting on the front Bench opposite (the Earl of Aberdeen). With regard to the further Questions put by the noble Earl, if there seems to be any general disposition either on the part of the Members of the Committee who served last year or the House generally to renew the inquiry, the Government will not oppose it, any more than they did last year; that is, they will take up the same attitude in regard to the matter as was taken last year. The reason, I think, why the inquiry was mainly confined to the Metropolis by the Committee last year was that the Question was more particularly dealt with by the noble Earl (the Earl of Aberdeen) in moving for the Committee. There was, as some of your Lordships will remember, a considerable amount of agitation going on during the winter of last year with regard to the distress among the unemployed, and no doubt as regards the Metropolis some pressure was put upon the Government to consent to the inquiry. The order of Reference did include "other populous places," but, when the Committee appointed had gone through a considerable part of its work, it became evident that if the inquiry were to be extended to populous districts outside the Metropolis it would be impossible to report during the last Session. It was thought to be of some importance to get the Report so far as it concerned the Metropolis, in order that matters agitating the public mind might be set at rest. As far as the Government is concerned, it is entirely for the House to say whether the Committee should be re-appointed; but if it is it will be well for the Metropolis to be excluded from the scope of inquiry, so that the same ground may not be gone over again. If the inquiry is moved for, I think it will not be unfair to ask that some specific grievance, or some special subject of inquiry, should be indicated, because the House at large will probably not regard the fact that no similar inquiry had been instituted for 20 years as sufficient ground for a fresh inquiry. I can only say with regard to the inquiry of last year, which was a most exhaustive one so far as it went, that it is a matter for congratulation that no serious maladministration was brought to light.

THE EARL OF ABERDEEN: My Lords, it is the fact that the Government did assent to the appointment of the Committee last year, although it was with some reluctance. Before moving for the re-appointment of the Committee, I should like to consult with the noble Lord who presided over the Committee, and other noble Lords; but my impression is that their opinion will be, if not altogether unanimously in favour of the re-appointment of the Committee, at any rate sufficient to justify me, or some other noble Lord, in moving its re-appointment. It occurs to me, my Lords, that among the advantages which will be gained by that inquiry and by the able Report which the Chairman of the Committee drew up in this; that it was made clear that certain powers which were vested in the Board of Guardians had become inoperative, or at any rate they were not resorted to, and in fact the Boards of Guardians in many cases seemed unaware of what their powers were. I think that shows that the continuation of the Inquiry as regards other districts than those dealt with last Session would be highly desirable.

GIBRALTAR—PROPOSED DOCK ACCOMMODATION.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

VISCOUNT SIDMOUTH, in rising to ask Her Majesty's Government whether it had been decided to proceed with the construction of a dock at Gibraltar, and, if it had been, how soon the work would be commenced, said: My Lords, this question was put by me some two or three months ago, during last Session, and on that occasion received the satisfactory answer from the Admiralty that the matter was under consideration. I hope that the answer of my noble Friend to-day will be to the same effect.

LORD ELPHINSTONE: My Lords, having regard to the interest that my noble Friend takes in this question, I am not at all surprised that he returns again to the Question he put to me in August last, and repeated in December. In my reply on August 3rd, I stated there were five schemes before the Admiralty. Two of them only were accompanied by any details, and pending the receipt of details of the other three schemes, the matter remained in abeyance. In December I was unable to be present; but my noble Friend the Secretary of State for the Colonies (Lord Knutsford) answered for me in effect that the matter was still under the consideration of the Admiralty. Since that, we have had a scheme submitted, by which it was proposed that about 40 acres of water should be enclosed, that coal wharves should be built, and that two docks should be constructed—one for the Imperial Navy, and the other for the mercantile marine. There are objections, and serious objections, to that scheme, which I do not think it is necessary for me to enter into at present. The Director of Works has lately been at Gibraltar, and has gone over the whole of the schemes that have been submitted. The Admiralty have had under consideration the whole of the various schemes, and have given a general approval to one, which is for the construction of a dock on the site of the new mole, and the reservation of this site has been asked for on behalf of the Navy. The Admiralty are fully aware of the desirability of having a dock at Gibraltar, and are sensible of the inconveniences which have been felt for the want of dock accommodation there; but in face of what are considered more pressing Imperial necessities it is not proposed that any immediate steps be taken for the construction of docks.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: My Lords, I hope the Admiralty will consider a little longer before they come to a decision on this important subject. I always regret very much when I find myself at variance with the noble Lord (Lord Elphinstone), especially on questions where professional knowledge enters so very largely; but I must say, from all that I have ever heard, and from all the study that I have been able to give to the subject, it does seem to me that the construction of a Naval dock at Gibraltar would be a matter the desirability of which is certainly more than questionable. It would mean an expense which is to be deprecated at a moment when so much money is needed for similar purposes, and from the military point of view, in time of war, at all events, the construction of a dock at Gibraltar is absolutely useless. I say useless for two reasons. In the first place, a complete change has come over the whole system of artillery. The cannon now used are of enormous range, twice, at least, as powerful as those of former years; and from the heights of the Spanish hills heavy guns could render a dock at Gibraltar absolutely untenable. The question has been gone into over and over again; and it is incontrovertible that if Spain were Great Britain's enemy it would be impossible to hold the docks at Gibraltar. In the second place, it is to be remembered that there exist a very good dock with arsenal and workshops at Plymouth, and another very good dock with arsenal, workshop, and accessories at Malta, both of which places are practically only three days' sail from Gibraltar. My Lords, what is really needed at Gibraltar and, indeed, at all our coaling stations (and about this there is no controversy) is a greater number of modern guns. At present there are at Gibraltar some 400 or 500 absolutely obsolete guns. I believe the Admiralty are taking steps to send out to Gibraltar some new guns, and in a few months there will be a considerable accession of strength to the place. The whole question, as my noble Friend knows, is a very large one; involving many others. There is the question of armaments, and the scarcely less difficult question of garrison, and all sorts of questions which have been created or largely altered by steam communication, which renders a place like Gibraltar quite different to what it used to be. There is the question of communication with India through the Mediterranean and by the Suez Canal, or by the alternative route of the Cape of Good Hope. For all these reasons, and a variety of others which I need not go into, I trust that the Admiralty will think twice and thrice before they commit themselves upon a question so large as that which is involved in the construction of a dock at Gibraltar, which it is probable would after all be of very little practical utility.

House adjourned at a quarter before Five o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

MOTIONS.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (IRELAND) PROVISIONAL ORDERS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Bill to confirm certain Provisional Orders of the Local Government Board for Ireland relating to Kilrush and Cappoquin, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland and Mr. Jackson.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 145.]

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE (IRELAND) ACT, 1887 (ARREST OF DR. TANNER.)

MR. SPEAKER acquainted the House that he had received the following letter relating to the arrest of Dr. Tanner, a Member of this House :—

March 2nd, 1889.

Sir,

I have the honour to acquaint you that I have received a communication from the Commissioner of Police for the Metropolis, informing me that Dr. Charles K. D. Tanner, a Member of the House of Commons, was arrested at an early hour this morning, within the Metropolitan Police District, under a Warrant granted by H. F. Considine, Esq., a Justice of the Peace for the County of Tipperary, for offences therein specified against the provisions of "The Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, 1887," and duly backed by me on February 20th last, for the purpose of being executed within my jurisdiction.

I have the honour to be, Sir,

Your obedient Servant,

J. VAUGHAN.

A Metropolitan Police Magistrate.

The Right Hon. the Speaker,

House of Commons.

QUESTIONS.

POSTAGE RATES.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury) asked the Postmaster General whether he was aware that a letter posted in France for New Caledonia was only charged 25 centimes, or 2½d., and from England to New Caledonia the charge was 4d. per letter, whereas a letter to Australia by the same route, 1,000 miles nearer England, was charged 6d.; whether he was aware the ocean postage from Germany to Australia was 20 pfennings, or less than 2½d. per letter, and from Germany to the savage island of New Guinea only the same charge, whereas the charge from England to Australia by the all-sea route was 4d. per letter; and, whether he intended to make a further reduction in the postage to Australia.

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University). The hon. Member seems to have forgotten that I answered in the affirmative an identical question raised by him in March, 1887. But I may qualify my previous answer by stating what the hon. Member probably knows, that a letter may now be sent to Australia by long sea route for a postage of 4d.

CHURCH PROPERTY AND REVENUES.

MR. CHANNING (Northamptonshire, E.) asked the under Secretary for the Home Department whether he was now in a position to state when the Return, ordered on the 20th of June 1887, of the property and revenues of the Church of England and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners under the several heads specified in the Address moved on that day, would be presented to the House.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. STUART-WORTLEY, Sheffield, Hallam): I fear that I can give no hope that it will be possible to present this Return to Parliament in a proper form this Session, even if it were possible that it might be presented in a more or less imperfect and unrevised form. I would suggest that the hon. Member should repeat this question later in the Session, and in the meantime communicate with the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, who, as I am informed, are willing to give him particulars as to the precise state to which the work has advanced.

MR. CHANNING further asked whether the hon. Gentleman had ascertained whether it would be possible to issue a separate Return as to the Metropolitan area?

MR. STUART-WORTLEY: I will make inquiry.

LIGHTHOUSES IN THE HEBRIDES.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH (Inverness-shire) asked the Lord Advocate whether he was aware that from the want of a sufficient number of lighthouses in the Hebrides, grave risks and impediments to navigation occurred; whether representations had been frequently made to the Commissioners of Northern Lighthouses, as to the necessity for Lighthouses at Rudha Hunish (the northernmost part of Skye), and at Kylekhea, in the Sound of Sleat; and whether Government would take steps to remove these dangers?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH (replying for The LORD ADVOCATE) said: I have communicated with the Commissioners of Northern Lighthouses, who inform me that they cannot trace any application having been made to them for a light at Rudha Hunish, which, in their opinion, is not a suitable position for a lighthouse. One application has been made to them for the lighting of Kyle Rhea—namely, in 1884, and the Commissioners have decided that, while such a light would be useful to the trade navigating the Sound, there were other points on the coasts of Scotland and its Islands where lights and seamarks were more urgently required, and they accordingly are not at present prepared to recommend this expenditure.

THE "CONGRESS CATECHISM" IN INDIA.

COLONEL HUGHES (Woolwich) (for Sir EDWARD WATKIN, Hythe): Asked the Under Secretary of State for India whether the Government is aware that a publication called the "Congress Catechism" has been printed, in the twelve languages of India, and circulated by millions amongst the Hindu people, by an Association calling itself the "National Congress;" whether he is aware that, in form of dialogue between a mulvi and a peasant, that "Catechism" contains the following:—

"Rambaksh: But surely you don't want us to join together and fight with the Sirkar? If we killed all the Europeans how should we get along? All would be anarchy (ghader), as I remember when I was young. You cannot mean this.

"Molvi Fariduddin: God forbid! This would be a sin. Why should we kill the poor Europeans? Many of them are really good men; most of them mean at any rate to do right. They are ignorant, no doubt, of the rights of most matters concerning us; they blunder, they cause us misery, but they do it from ignorance, from an ignorance unavoidable under the system which they work on, and which, even did they wish it, they could not change without our help. Besides, though we of the new generation are growing up able to assist them and do much for the country, the whole of us put together have not yet sufficient experience and self-reliance to manage the administration entirely without their help. Kill the Europeans? No, Rambaksh, let us say, rather, God bless all of them (and there are many such) who feel kindly towards us in their hearts, and according to their lights mean well towards us, and God forgive those amongst them (and let us hope they are not many) who dislike and despise us, and care nothing what becomes of us."

And whether the Government intend to take steps to punish the authors and distributors of these papers.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): May I ask the hon. Gentleman before he replies, whether he is aware that the words copied in the question are not to be found in the "Congress Catechism" at all, but that they are in a separate and distinct publication, entitled "Conversations," and whether this very conversation is not given in the correspondence between Mr. A. O. Hume and Sir Auckland Colvin?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): The hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh) is quite correct, and he shows that he is a better authority in regard to the "Congress Catechism" than the hon. Baronet who gave notice of the Question. The hon. Member is quite correct in saying that the dialogue is not in the "Catechism," but in one of two separate pamphlets which the late Viceroy described as being of a very questionable character. The Secretary of State is aware that publications have been circulated in India, among which are the "Congress Catechism," and the "Conversations" referred to by the hon. Member, which are described by the late Viceroy as "animated by a very questionable spirit, and manifestly intended to excite the hatred of the people against the public servants of the Crown." But the Secretary of State is disposed to direct the efforts of Government to the better education rather than to the punishment of the authors and distributors of these papers.

Mr. BRADLAUGH: May I ask whether the late Viceroy has not in express terms declared his belief in the desire of the National Congress to work loyally in bringing about internal reforms?

*Sir J. GORST: If the hon. Gentleman depends upon any particular words he must give me notice of the Question. On behalf of the Secretary of State, I may say that the Government are not desirous of joining in an indiscriminate condemnation of the Congress.

SUGAR BOUNTIES.

SIR LYON PLAYFAIR (Leeds, S.) asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he will lay upon the Table official Returns showing, as stated by him in Greenock on 1st November, 1888, that sugar bounties cost France £3,380,000; Germany £3,238,484; Austria £1,036,667; Belgium £813,000; Holland £809,655; or, if he is not in possession of official Returns, whether he will state on what authority these figures are given, and, if the authority is from official sources, he will indicate references to them?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Baron HENRY DE WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): The figures quoted by the hon. Gentleman, and used by me at Greenock, were derived from the recognised organ of the German sugar manufacturers, Die Deutsche Zuckerindustrie, and, as far as I know, their general accuracy is not disputed by the Powers concerned. As regards France, if the right hon. Gentleman will consult the Journal Officiel, he will find that in the debate on the sugar question in the Senate, on the 17th of June, 1888, the then Minister of Finance, M. Tirard—who now occupies the same post in the present Administration—stated that the amount of the sugar bounties in France in recent years had fluctuated between 70 and 90 millions of francs. The latter sum—equal to £3,650,000—is £300,000 more than the amount I quoted in the House the other night.

THE EAST COAST OF AFRICA.

Mr. ALEX. M'ARTHUR (Leicester) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government have made any inquiry, or obtained any information, concerning the murder of Mr. Brooks, an English missionary, which it was reported took place at M'Kanga, a few miles from the East African Coast, on the 21st of January; and whether, in view of the fact that numerous missionaries are still peacefully engaged in their work and enjoying the confidence of the Native tribes beyond the disturbed coast-line, Her Majesty's Government have taken any steps to explain to the chiefs and people of the disturbed districts that England is not to be regarded by the Natives of the East African Coast as a belligerent Power, and especially that she has no responsibility for the methods which have been pursued by the officers of the German East African Company.

Mr. BURDETT-COUTTS (Westminster): Before the right hon. Gentleman answers the Question, I should like to ask him if it is not the fact that the Imperial British East African Company has, by its prudent conduct and enterprise, established harmonious and peaceful relations with all the Native tribes with which it has come in contact?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir JAMES FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): The information received by Her Majesty's Government respecting the murder of Mr. Brooks is precisely of the same character as that which has appeared in the newspapers. The unfortunate gentleman lost his life through incautiously approaching the disturbed coast, in spite of warnings as to the danger of so doing. The remaining missionaries in the interior will, it is to be hoped, be warned by Mr. Brooks's fate, and will not venture into such districts. This would insure their safety better than an intimation of the character suggested, the success of which, if it were expedient to make it, would be very doubtful. In answer to my hon. Friend, I am glad to be able to say that the relations of the British East Africa Company have been of the character which he describes. They have shown great prudence in their proceedings, and have, for the most part, avoided all disputes with the natives.

FATAL ACCIDENT CAUSED BY MAILBAGS.

MR. ESSLEMONT asked the Postmaster General whether his attention had been called to the sad death of a passenger between Aberdeen and London, near Carlisle, alleged to have been caused by mailbags; and, if so, what steps, if any, had been taken to prevent a recurrence of any similar fatality?

MR. RAIKES: I heard with much regret of the lamentable accident referred to by the hon. Member, which, I believe, is the only one of the kind that has ever happened, and I immediately caused special inquiry to be made by an experienced officer, who was sent to the neighbourhood for the purpose. It appears that the unfortunate passenger, who had been taken ill in the train, was leaning as far as possible out of the window of her carriage, and thus came in contact with the pouch suspended from the standard of the apparatus used for exchanging mailbags. Although the apparatus, which is of the usual description, was accurately adjusted and in perfect working order, and there can be no doubt that the sad fatality was purely accidental, yet I will not fail to pursue the inquiry in order to secure for the public all possible precautions against accident.

IRELAND—THE PRISONER TRACY.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, whether he will state under what order of a Court of Law Thomas Tracy was removed from Belfast Gaol to Millbank Prison, where he still remains; for what purpose Tracy was previously removed from Castlebar to Belfast Gaol; when, and on what charge, Tracy was convicted, and what sentence was passed upon him; whether, during his imprisonment in Belfast, he was daily supplied with dinners of the first quality, and also with beer or porter, and by whom same were supplied; whether the Freeman's Journal was sent him daily from a local police barrack; whether County Inspector Heard, and District Inspector Gibbons, or any other officer of police, paid several visits to him there, and saw him without the presence of a warder; whether he is aware that Tracy alleges these officers of police promised him his liberty if he would swear against an Irish Nationalist Member of Parliament, and a certain priest in connection with a murder in the West of Ireland; whether, on his refusal to swear what he knew to be false, Tracy was threatened with imprisonment for life; whether Head Constable Preston, or any other constable, told Tracy on his way to Belfast that he was wanted as a witness for the Parnell Commission, gave him money, and said that he would be visited in Belfast Gaol by gentlemen, who would tell him what he was wanted to swear; and whether, under the circumstances, he will grant an independent inquiry into these serious charges made by Tracy?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): 1. I am informed that the man referred to was brought over to England under an order from the Special Commission Court. 2. While this man was in Castlebar Prison it was publicly announced in a local Roman Catholic Chapel that he had turned informer, and there was also reliable information that he was being tampered with to prevent him from giving information. He was accordingly removed to Belfast. 3. He was committed to prison for 12 months on the 16th of August, 1888, in default of finding sureties to be of good behaviour, for having made use of threatening language towards one Patrick Connors. 4 and 5. I understand that he was treated like other bail prisoners. 6. County Inspector Head did not visit this man, but he was visited by County Inspector Milling and District Inspector Gibbons, both in Castlebar and Belfast Prisons, in consequence of the man's having previously disclosed important information with reference to serious crimes, which it was the duty of these officers to investigate. No warder was present.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): How did it happen that the solicitor to this man several times applied to the Irish Prisons Board to be allowed to see him and was refused, and is it true that access has been permitted to certain police officers transferred by the Government to the service of the Times? I also wish to know whether, in view of the grave allegations contained in the Question of my hon. Friend that this man was promised his liberty by certain police officers if he would swear against an Irish Nationalist Member; that he was wanted as a witness for the Parnell Commission, and that he would be visited by a gentleman who would tell him what he was wanted to swear, and that on his refusal to swear he was threatened with imprisonment for life; the Chief Secretary will be content to allow the allegations to rest upon the denial of the persons incriminated?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I believe these allegations to be untrue, but as the man is to appear before the Special Commission an opportunity will be afforded of ascertaining all the facts.

MR. SEXTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman be good enough to say why the solicitor to the prisoner was refused admission to him, while free admission was given to the Times emissary?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am not aware that such was the fact. There is no suggestion of the kind in the Question.

MR. M'CARTAN: The right hon. Gentleman did not answer paragraphs four and five of my question, namely, whether during Tracy's imprisonment in Belfast he was daily supplied with dinners of the first quality and also with beer or porter; by whom the same were supplied; and whether the Freeman's Journal was sent to him daily from a local police barracks?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I did answer the right hon. Gentleman. I stated that I understood from the report of the Prisons Board that the prisoner was treated like all other bail-prisoners.

THE CITY CHAMBERLAIN'S COURT.

DR. CLARK (Caithness) asked the Home Secretary whether the City Chamberlain had the right to sentence any City apprentice to 14 days' solitary confinement in the City bridewell for neglecting to carry out any order of his master; whether lately an apprentice was sentenced to 14 days' imprisonment for a trivial offence, the evidence not being taken on oath; and whether the Government would bring in a measure to abolish this Court?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): The City Chamberlain informs me that he has an ancient customary jurisdiction in connection with the Mayor's Court to adjudicate on disputes between masters and apprentices. I beg to refer the hon. Member to the second Report of the Commissioners on Municipal Corporations on this subject (1837. No. 60. appendix, p. 100). The committal of an apprentice to the bridewell for misconduct is in accordance with the custom of the City, and provisions for his reception and treatment are made in a scheme for the management of the bridewell, approved by the Court of Chancery in 1860. In the particular case referred to, the apprentice was not sentenced to solitary confinement, and his offence was not a trivial one. He had been twice previously warned by the Chamberlain for his misconduct. Evidence is not taken on oath, but an apprentice is not imprisoned unless he admits the facts alleged against him, and only in cases of incorrigible conduct. I have reason to believe that the Chamberlain's Court is distinguished for its impartial administration and care of the rights of apprentices, and the Government do not propose to bring in a measure to abolish the Court.

POSTAGE OF PRINTED CIRCULARS.

DR. CLARK (Caithness) asked the Postmaster-General whether it is the case that circulars and other printed matters open at both ends if in the third person are charged one half-penny, but if in the first person one penny; and, if so, on what grounds this differential rate is made.

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): There is, I think, some misapprehension on this subject. Circulars in identical terms, addressed to several persons, may be sent by book post at a postage of one halfpenny, whether in the first or in the third person; but no communications of the nature of a letter other than circulars are allowed to pass by book post, in whatever person they are expressed. Besides printed matter, accounts are permitted to pass by book post; but difficulty often arises from the senders printing or stamping on the accounts requests for payment, or other notes, which are clearly of the nature of letters. Impersonal statements as to the practices of a firm in regard to discount, interest, &c., are not objected to.

MR. HOBHOUSE (Somerset, E.) asked whether it is the fact that a postage rate of one penny is charged for printed circulars (open to inspection) issued by Friendly Societies to their members, because the amount of contributions due is inserted in writing; if trading firms are allowed to send invoices and bills to their customers, the amounts due being written in every case, for the halfpenny rate of postage; what was the reason for this different treatment; and, whether he will alter the regulations so as to give Friendly Societies the same advantages as traders.

SIR E. BIRKBECK (Norfolk, E.): May I ask whether the attention of the right hon. Gentleman has been called to the fact that a Conference of delegates of Friendly Societies was held on Friday last, representing 1,965,000 members, and a capital of over £13,500,000; whether he is aware that the present system of charging one penny postage on Friendly Societies' circulars, containing particulars of arrears of members, and a request for payment, was on that occasion pronounced as unjust and unreasonable, and whether he will endeavour to come to an arrangement with the Friendly Societies' authorities on this question?

MR. RAIKES: Unless circular letters are in identical terms, they are liable to the letter rate of postage. Traders enjoy no privileges which are not allowed to Friendly Societies, and printed circulars from a trader to his customers asking for payments due (with the varying amounts inserted) would be charged letter postage. Invoices and statements of accounts are, however, allowed to be forwarded at the book post rate, and I would suggest that any Friendly Society in which the hon. Member is interested should do what some others do—i.e., reduce their notices of subscriptions due to the form of accounts, in which case they are passed at the book post rate, circulars in identical terms either accompanying the accounts or not at the option of the Society. In reply to the question of my hon. Friend the Member for East Norfolk (Sir E. Birkbeck) my attention has been called to the meeting of the Conference, and I fully recognise the authority with which it pronounces an opinion. I endeavoured last year, when the Bill of the hon. Baronet the Member for the University of London (Sir John Lubbock) was before the House to introduce some amendments into the law which might have met the wishes of these bodies, but the Bill was not discussed in the House nor was it finally approved by the Government. I shall be happy to confer with my hon. Friend and others interested in the matter, with a view to see how far a modification of the law can be introduced.

IRELAND—JUDICIAL RENTS.

MR. M'CARTAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware of the dissatisfaction given in the Union of Kilkeel, county Down, by the alterations made by the Land Commission in the judicial rents for the year 1888; whether he is aware that the Judicial Rents in this Union have been increased where such Rents were fixed in 1884 or 1885; whether he is aware that this Union chiefly consists of mountainous land, and covers the poorest district in the county Down, and that the value of the crops for 1888 in Kilkeel Union is estimated at about one-half of those of the previous year, when substantial reductions were given; and whether he will give the particulars which influenced the Land Commission in arriving at the alterations published in their last Schedule?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Land Commissioners inform me that a small increase has been made for 1888 in the Judicial Rents fixed in the Union of Kilkeel, county Down, in 1884 and 1885, the increase in respect of each of these years being respectively 5½d. and 3d. in the pound. As regards paragraph three, the hon. Member must be aware that the automatic alteration of Rents is based, not on yield, but on prices.

THE HONOURABLE ARTILLERY COMPANY.

MR. BRODIE HOARE (Hampstead) asked the Secretary of State for War, if there was any reason why the arms and military equipment of the Honourable Company should not be returned to the Regiment, so that it may be able to resume its Military exercises.

MR. E. STANHOPE: I have every hope that new regulations will be laid down very shortly for securing the military discipline of this ancient corps by bringing it under the control of the War Office. As soon as this is done, and a Lieutenant-Colonel and Adjutant has been appointed, his Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief will be prepared to direct the immediate re-issue of the arms.

RAILWAY RATES.

MR. AINSLIE (Lancashire, N. Lonsdale) asked the President of the Board of Trade, whether it is competent for Railway Companies, in their classification of rates, under "The Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888," to vary the limitation Clause fixing the minimum distances chargeable on traffic.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE) Sir. MICHAEL HICKS BEACH, Bristol W.): Yes, Sir, they may propose such variations, but the decision will remain with the Board of Trade and Parliament.

FAIRS IN LONDON.

MR. MAPLE (Camberwell, Dulwich). asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his attention has been called to the fact that a fair is, and has been for some time carried on upon a piece of ground situated between number 20 and number 22, Church Street, Camberwell, to the great loss, inconvenience, and annoyance of the tradesmen and residents generally in the neighbourhood; and whether, in view of such injury caused by the fair, he will instruct the Commissioner of Police for the Metropolis to take immediate steps to put an end to it?

MR. J. R. KELLY (Camberwell, N.), had also on the paper the following question:—To ask the Secretary for the Home Department, whether he has received complaints as to the great loss and annoyance caused to tradesmen and ratepayers generally in Trafalgar Road, Old Kent Road, owing to the carrying on of the fair now held there; and, whether he will instruct the Commissioner of Police to proceed against the owner or occupier of the land upon which this fair has now been held for many months.

MR. MATTHEWS: I will answer this Question of the hon. Member for Dulwich, and that of my hon. Friend the Member for North Camberwell, at the same time. I received on Saturday last two communications alleging inconvenience caused by fairs at Camberwell and Old Kent Road. These I at once referred to the Commissioner of Police, who has not yet had time to make the necessary inquiries and to report to me on the subject.

IRELAND—MR. BRODRICK AND MR. PARNELL.

MR. J. E. REDMOND (for Mr. WILLIAM REDMOND) (Fermanagh, N.) asked the Under Secretary of State for War whether he is correctly reported, when speaking at Blackburn in April, 1887, as having used the following words: "There was one subject on which their opponents were exceedingly blind. He meant the letter of Mr. Parnell, which appeared in the Times. He was not going to mince language about that letter, and he said it was Mr. Parnell's letter," and, if so, whether he is now prepared to withdraw this statement?

*THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY to the WAR OFFICE (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): The hon. Member is aware that I answered a similar question on April 25, 1887, three days after the speech was made. I then explained that the expression I used was, "I call it Mr. Parnell's letter," and I gave my reasons for so calling it in the absence of any action to disprove it in a Court of law. As the allegation put forward by the Times has not been substantiated, I have no hesitation in withdrawing the expression which, as it was not well-founded, I regret to have used.

IRELAND—THE CASE OF MR. DUNLEARY.

MR. O'KEEFFE asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland why Mr. Dunleary, journalist, Ennis, county Clare, who was sentenced to three months' imprisonment by Mr. Hoddes, R.M., for, as the official announcement of his sentence recorded on his cell door announces, "abusing a policeman," has been removed last Monday from Limerick, his county district prison, to Tullamore Gaol; and, whether there are at present over 40 empty cells in Limerick Gaol, and, if so, what reasons, disciplinary or precautionary, have occasioned the necessity of Mr. Dunleary's transfer?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said he was unable, at present, to answer the question, not having received the necessary information. A report had been called for, but had not yet been received.

BERBERA.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether Berbera, on the Somali Coast, was attacked by the Somalis on the 5th of October last; what was the reported strength of the attacking and defending forces, and what were the names of the Civil and Military officers present; and, has the action taken by the officer in charge and his subordinates been sanctioned by the Government; and, if so, is it the intention of the Government to recognize the services of the officers engaged?

*SIR J. GORST: Yes; but no special report has been received of the details of the action, or of the views or intentions of the Government in respect thereof. The attack was made by the Ayal Ahmed tribe, and was repulsed by detachments of the Aden troop and 3rd Bombay Native Infantry under Captain Ashby. On our side the loss was one policeman killed and one wounded.

IRELAND—THE PRISONER TRACY.

MR. M'CARTAN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, with reference to the visit of Head Constable Preston of the Royal Irish Constabulary to the prisoner Tracy at Milbank Prison, whether he will state by whom the application for permission to visit Tracy was made in this case; whether the name of the intending visitor was mentioned in the application; and whether Head Constable Preston's interview with Tracy was held in the presence of a warder; and, if so, if he will give the name of the warder?

MR. MATTHEWS: The application was made by Mr. Soames, Solicitor, who asked that James Preston, whom he named, might be allowed to see Tracy. James Preston's interviews with Tracy were held within the view of Chief-warder Weir, who was in charge of Tracy. I see that I am erroneously reported to have described Tracy as a "short-time" prisoner—that is, a person imprisoned in default of sureties of the peace.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): The right hon. Gentleman used the expression that the interview took place within the view of the Chief-warder. Was it within the hearing of the Chief-warder?

MR. MATTHEWS: No, it was not. It took place in the room which is commonly called the Solicitor's Room, with a sort of glass cage through which, without being able to hear the conversation, the warder can see all that goes on.

MR. SEXTON: Were these visits to Tracy made at his request or with his knowledge?

MR. MATTHEWS: I believe that the fact is that any prisoner who wishes to see a solicitor is allowed to have an interview.

MR. SEXTON: But this was a head constable and not a solicitor. Had the solicitor for the defence the same free access to the prisoner?

MR. MATTHEWS: The same rule would be applied in all cases when an application is made for an interview with a prisoner.

REMOVAL OF COFFINS FROM FAMILY VAULTS.

MR. HALLEY STEWART (Lincolnshire, Spalding), asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that the Bishop of St. Albans, having been requested to institute an inquiry into the facts connected with the removal and breaking up of lead coffins from the vault of the Combe family in Hemel Hempsted Church, and the placing of the remains in a hole in the churchyard, has replied that he is advised that he has no power to institute such an inquiry, and has suggested that the only legal remedy is by proceedings under the Church Discipline Acts; and whether, under these circumstances, the Government will undertake to institute such proceedings, or will afford assistance to the descendant of the Combe family, who is the complaining party?

MR. MATTHEWS: No, Sir, I have had no communication with the Bishop of St. Albans on this matter, and I have no information as to any proceedings having been taken before him. I have already pointed out in this House that if any such facts as are alleged have taken place, there is a legal remedy which it is in the power of any person aggrieved to enforce in a summary way. The consent of the Secretary of State is not necessary to such proceedings, and under these circumstances the Government are not prepared to take any further action in the matter.

BELFAST POST OFFICE.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that after the closing of the post and telegraph office in Waring Street, Belfast, it was found necessary to re-open a branch post office there; and whether, considering that the new general post office affords no convenience to the district of Waring Street for the despatch of telegrams, and that a telegraph office is more urgently required there than the post office, he will now take steps to have a telegraph office established in connection with this branch post office as soon as possible?

MR. RAIKES: In reply to the hon. Member, I have to state that I have only to-day received a full report relative to the question of re-establishing the telegraph office in Waring Street, and I should like to have an opportunity of further considering this report before answering the hon. Member's Question.

THE HONOURABLE ARTILLERY COMPANY.

MR. R. K. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he or the Military authorities have taken any, and, if so, what, steps to inquire into the charges of want of discipline made against the Honourable Artillery Company by His Grace the Duke of Portland, the late Lieutenant Colonel of the Regiment; and whether he can state the result of the inquiry?

MR. E. STANHOPE: The Commander-in-Chief has no power, nor have I, to institute such an inquiry.

IRELAND—THE INFORMER CULLINANE.

MR. J. R. COX (Clare, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can state the present address of Cullinane, the informer, or to whom application may be made by the solicitor for the defence in the Royal Commission to have a subpoena served on that person?

Mr. Matthews

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I believe the man is no longer in the country, though I have no personal knowledge of the matter. The hon. Member must be aware that it would endanger Cullinane's life to make known his address, even if it were possible to do so.

MR. COX: Will his whereabouts be made known to a solicitor if he applies to the right hon. Gentleman?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It seems to me it would be a serious matter to make public his whereabouts.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Does the right hon. Gentleman mean the House to understand that he refuses the means of producing this witness before the Special Commission for fear of judicial censure?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: To disclose the man's whereabouts might be to place his life in danger.

MR. SEXTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman name any Officer of the Government who will undertake, upon receiving a subpoena, to serve it upon Callinane?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I must have notice of the Question.

CITY CHARITIES.

MR. J. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I have to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education what progress has been made during the last six months in the work of the Charity Commissioners charged with the administration of "The City of London Parochial Charities Act, 1883:" and when the scheme or schemes which the Commissioners are to propose for the allocation of the funds dealt with by the Act are likely to be published.

MR. J. W. LOWTHER (Cumberland, Penrith): Perhaps I may be allowed to reply to this Question. During the last six months progress of a very decisive kind (full details of which will appear in their forthcoming Report for 1888, which has been already prepared) has been effected, especially in the negotiations with Committees and other important bodies whose co-operation is essential to a beneficial application of the City Parochial Funds. The Commissioners have also prepared a supplementary statement of property under the Act, the publication of which has been delayed by litigation arising under their former statements; and they have in two cases prepared schemes of an important kind, which have been for some time the subject of confidential communications with the parties interested. The Commissioners anticipate that the schemes above referred to will be published in the course of the spring; and they hope that during the summer they will be able to publish the whole of the schemes required by the Act.

IRELAND—MR. CECIL ROCHE.

MR. JOHN DILLON (East Mayo): In the absence of my hon. Friend Mr. T. P. O'Connor (Liverpool, Scotland Division), I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if Mr. Cecil Roche, R.M., was a lecturer in the employ of the Irish Loyal and Patriotic Union immediately before his selection as a Resident Magistrate; and if, at the time of Mr. Roche's service under that body, the secretary was Mr. E. C. Houston.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am informed that it is the case that Mr. Roche, prior to his appointment to the Resident Magistracy, delivered some addresses without remuneration on behalf of the organization mentioned. Mr. Houston was not then secretary of that body.

IRELAND—JUDICIAL RENTS.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is true that the Land Sub-Commission, which sat in Carrickmacross, county Monaghan, on 9th January last, have not yet given their decision in 95 cases on the Shirley estate which were then heard, although they have since heard and inspected 40 other cases on the same estate; whether he is aware that the previous decisions of this Sub-Commission have caused general dissatisfaction, and that in consequence of this feeling the tenants are threatening to withdraw from the Court over 200 cases at present listed for hearing during the present Sitting; and whether, under these circumstances, he will represent to the Commissioners the desirability of at once announcing their decision in the cases previously heard, and so enable the tenants to decide what course they will adopt with regard to the cases pending.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Land Commissioners inform me that judgment was given on February 28 in the 95 cases referred to, and also in the cases subsequently heard in Carrickmacross at the end of January and beginning of February. The decisions could not have been given earlier, as the inspection of the holdings and the reports on the cases were not completed until that week. A number of cases on the new list of fair-rent applications from tenants on the Shirley estate were heard during the past week, and the remaining cases are being disposed of as rapidly as possible by the Sub-Commission sitting at Carrickmacross.

THE CAUTRAYDOWN FARM CASE.

MR. C. H. ANDERSON (Elgin and Nairn): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether the attention of the Government had been called to the judgments of the Lord Justice Clerk and Lord Young in the Cautraydown Farm Case; whether the Lord Justice Clerk described it as a deplorable case, both in its circumstances and in the way it had been dealt with by the Sheriff Substitute, and that extravagant expense had been incurred owing to the course taken by the Sheriff Substitute, which was entirely and unfortunately wrong; whether Lord Young used similar expressions, and further said that the Sheriff Substitute had by his decision accumulated all the expenses; a decision which he described as absurd and ridiculous; and further, how any Sheriff could have hesitated to take the course the landlord prayed, he (Lord Young) was at a loss to conceive; whether the Government will take any steps to remedy this miscarriage of justice, which has caused heavy expenses to both parties especially the tenant; whether the decisions of the Sheriff Substitute in question have frequently been reversed on appeal; whether out of 16 appeals to the Court of Session in 1886 seven were wholly or partially successful, and out of 21 appeals in 1887 10 were wholly or partially successful; and whether the Government will consider what steps ought to be taken in the matter?

*MR. BUCHANAN: I wish to ask the Lord Advocate before he replies, whether there has not been another case which has given rise to considerable talk, in which the decision of the Sheriff Substitute of Elginshire came before the same Court of Appeal in Edinburgh, and that the Metropolitan Board may raise the salaries to any extent, and that the London County Council will be compelled to give pensions to that amount, although the salaries are raised on the last day of their authority?

*MR. RITCHIE: The right hon. Gentleman is supposing, I imagine, a condition of things which I cannot think any responsible body would take up. But, Sir, I have told the House what would be the duty of the London County Council as to the action of the Metropolitan Board of Works, but it is impossible to express an opinion on the state of things stated by the right hon. Gentleman. He knows quite well that it is not unusual for salaries to have annual increments, but the Metropolitan Board do not seem to have adopted that system. I am informed the course they have taken is in strict accordance with precedent.

COLONEL HUGHES (Woolwich): Do I understand that £131 is the total annual increase in the salaries of the Metropolitan Board staff?

MR. RITCHIE: Yes, Sir; according to the information we have received from the Board.

METROPOLITAN POLICE.

MR. JAMES ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Report of the Commissioners of Police of the Metropolis for the year 1888 will be laid upon the Table of the House before the Vote in Supply for the Metropolitan Police is taken?

MR. W. H. SMITH: Yes, Sir; every effort will be made to have the Report presented by then.

SAMOA.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies if it is a fact that the Samoan people have, through their chiefs, more than once petitioned to be taken under the protectorate of Great Britain, and that such petitions have received the strong support both of Australasian Governments and organs of public opinion; and, if so, upon what grounds and upon what date or dates the Home Government has declined to secure to the British Empire the Navigator Islands, which have consequently been seized by two Foreign Nations.

SIR J. FERGUSSON: Proposals for a British annexation of Samoa were made by chiefs of that group in 1877, 1883, 1884, and 1888, and were declined at those various periods on the ground that their acceptance would be impolitic, and in the later instances that foreign interests in the islands and our relations with other Powers precluded Her Majesty's Government from annexing the group. The Governments of Australia and New Zealand have in 1873 and 1884 advocated the annexation. I must add that there has been no time at which Her Majesty's Government have failed to secure the independence of these islands. Reciprocal assurances to that effect were given by Her Majesty's Government and the German Government, and the islands have not, in fact, been seized by any foreign Power.

CABLE COMMUNICATION WITH THE CONTINENT.

SIR ROBERT FOWLER (London): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is in a position to give any information on the question of the working of the submarine cables between this country and Germany, about which a statement was recently made in the Reichstag; and whether arrangements have now been made with France, Belgium, and Holland as regards the working of the submarine cables to those countries?

MR. RAIKES: I am glad to be able to state that the negotiations with the Governments of Germany, Holland, Belgium, and France, which have been in progress for several months past, are now near completion, and I have now every reason to hope that the working and the maintenance of the cables between this country and those named will, after an early date, be entirely in the hands of the telegraphic administrations of five Governments. A uniform rate of 2d. per word, with a minimum, will be charged—a reduction in the case of Germany and Holland of 1d. a word, and in the case of France of ½d. per word. At the same time, negotiations have been proceeding and are well advanced between the Governments of France, Belgium, and this country for acquiring from the Submarine Telegraph Company the cables now their property between England and Belgium and France, and by the Government of this country for the transfer of the officers of the Submarine Company to the service of the Post Office, and the acquisition of the offices, cable ship, stores, &c., by the Post Office.

OPEN-AIR MEETINGS ON THE THAMES EMBANKMENT.

SIR C. RUSSELL (Hackney, S.): I desire to ask the Home Secretary a Question, of which I have given him private Notice, and which, as it relates to the peace of the metropolis, I hope the right hon. Gentleman will be able to answer—namely, whether it is true that notice was given to Mr. Monro twice, by letter, of the intention to hold a meeting near Cleopatra's Needle yesterday, and Mr. Monro did not intimate any intention of preventing such meeting; whether that meeting was forcibly prevented, and, if so, by what authority, and on what ground; also whether Mr. Hyndman intimated his intention of holding a meeting in Hyde Park, near the Achilles statue; whether, while such meeting was being held, it was forcibly suppressed, and whether several assaults were committed by the police?

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): May I ask, further, whether Mr. Hyndman was forcibly knocked down and stamped under foot by police; whether another Socialist was knocked down; and whether a German woman was felled to the ground and called a whore by a policeman?

MR. MATTHEWS: It is perfectly obvious it would be impossible to answer a Question of the kind just put to me without notice. The only information I have had certainly would not convey to my mind that anything resembling a disturbance or a collision with the police had occurred.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: Was the meeting proclaimed, and had the public any means of knowing it would be prevented?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have no information on that point.

IRELAND — ALLEGED DISTURBANCE AT A CATHOLIC CHAPEL IN CLONMEL.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I wish to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland

whether he has any information as to occurrences which are stated in to-day's newspapers to have taken place in the Catholic Chapel of St. Peter and St. Paul in Clonmel on Sunday last, with reference to the reading of the Bishop's pastoral there, and circumstances which occurred with reference to the Catholic soldiers in that chapel?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir. I have no information.

SIR W. HARCOURT: If the right hon. Gentleman will kindly obtain me information I will put a Question on the Paper.

MR. SEXTON: I wish to ask the Secretary for War what orders have been given regarding Lieutenant Geoghegan, who yesterday ordered his men to leave the Catholic Church at Clonmel during Divine service. Has he any authority to take such a step? And is it not a fact that after giving the order the Lieutenant, followed by two sergeants, went out, while the men remained to the end of the service?

MR. JAMES THEOBALD (Essex, Romford): I wish also to ask whether it is true that the priest, by his priestly influence, commanded the men to disobey the order of their officer, and that before the officer left he publicly rebuked the priest?

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order. Has the hon. Member given notice of this question?

MR. THEOBALD: Yes, Sir, I gave private notice to the Secretary of State for War.

MR. E. STANHOPE: Orders have been given that a Report be made upon the case by the General Commanding in Ireland.

PRIVILEGE—DETECTIVES IN THE LOBBY.

MR. P. M'DONALD (Sligo, N.): I wish to ask whether it is true, as stated in the Star newspaper on Saturday last, that a large number of detectives were stationed in the Members' lobby on Friday night, and, if so, by whose authority, and with what object?

MR. MATTHEWS: The notice of this Question only reached me since I have been in the House, and I have not yet been able to make inquiries on the subject.

that the Metropolitan Board may raise the salaries to any extent, and that the London County Council will be compelled to give pensions to that amount, although the salaries are raised on the last day of their authority?

*MR. RITCHIE: The right hon. Gentleman is supposing, I imagine, a condition of things which I cannot think any responsible body would take up. But, Sir, I have told the House what would be the duty of the London County Council as to the action of the Metropolitan Board of Works, but it is impossible to express an opinion on the state of things stated by the right hon. Gentleman. He knows quite well that it is not unusual for salaries to have annual increments, but the Metropolitan Board do not seem to have adopted that system. I am informed the course they have taken is in strict accordance with precedent.

COLONEL HUGHES (Woolwich): Do I understand that £131 is the total annual increase in the salaries of the Metropolitan Board staff?

MR. RITCHIE: Yes, Sir; according to the information we have received from the Board.

METROPOLITAN POLICE.

MR. JAMES ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Report of the Commissioners of Police of the Metropolis for the year 1888 will be laid upon the Table of the House before the Vote in Supply for the Metropolitan Police is taken?

MR. W. H. SMITH: Yes, Sir; every effort will be made to have the Report presented by then.

SAMOA.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies if it is a fact that the Samoan people have, through their chiefs, more than once petitioned to be taken under the protectorate of Great Britain, and that such petitions have received the strong support both of Australasian Governments and organs of public opinion; and, if so, upon what grounds and upon what date or dates the Home Government has declined to accede to the British Empire the Navigator Islands, which have consequently been seized by two Foreign Nations.

SIR J. FERGUSSON: Proposals for a British annexation of Samoa were made by chiefs of that group in 1877, 1883, 1884, and 1888, and were declined at those various periods on the ground that their acceptance would be impolitic, and in the later instances that foreign interests in the islands and our relations with other Powers precluded Her Majesty's Government from annexing the group. The Governments of Australia and New Zealand have in 1873 and 1884 advocated the annexation. I must add that there has been no time at which Her Majesty's Government have failed to secure the independence of these islands. Reciprocal assurances to that effect were given by Her Majesty's Government and the German Government, and the islands have not, in fact, been seized by any foreign Power.

CABLE COMMUNICATION WITH THE CONTINENT.

SIR ROBERT FOWLER (London): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is in a position to give any information on the question of the working of the submarine cables between this country and Germany, about which a statement was recently made in the Reichstag; and whether arrangements have now been made with France, Belgium, and Holland as regards the working of the submarine cables to those countries?

MR. RAIKES: I am glad to be able to state that the negotiations with the Governments of Germany, Holland, Belgium, and France, which have been in progress for several months past, are now near completion, and I have now every reason to hope that the working and the maintenance of the cables between this country and those named will, after an early date, be entirely in the hands of the telegraphic administrations of five Governments. A rate of 2d. per word, with a minimum charge of 1d. per word, will be charged—a reduction in the case of Germany and Holland of 1d. per word, and in the case of France of 2d. per word. At the same time, negotiations have been proceeding, and have been advanced between the Governments of France, Belgium, and Holland, for acquiring from the Company the cables

the present Government? I came down to the House on the opening day in the full hope and expectation of finding that some real measure for the benefit of the poorer classes of the Metropolis would be dealt with. How is it that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has abandoned his position? Is it that he has not been able to carry his Colleagues with him? There was nothing in the Queen's Speech, and nothing in the speeches of the Mover or Seconder of the Address, about these matters which the Chancellor of the Exchequer said, down in the East of London, were subjects to be dealt with "yesterday, to-day, and to-morrow." If the right hon. Gentleman's words mean anything, they mean immediate and present action. Much is said about the operation of economic laws, but in one sense our whole existence and progress in this world, both in legislative and scientific matters, and as regards everything else, consists of a contest against the operation of natural laws; and I cannot admit that we are bound to sit powerless, and do nothing for the poorer classes, because economic laws may denude them largely of what they ought to have. I know of no better step for the bettering of the position of the poorer classes than that of improving the sanitary condition of their houses. I had some conversation only the other day with Mr. Tarrant, the Managing Director of the Artizans' and Labourers' General Dwelling Company, and he told me that no one can get land in London for the market value, and then let the houses at a rent which the working classes can pay, the houses being good and sanitary. If that is true, there is opened up a very serious aspect of things. Let me refer for a moment to the financial part of the question. The agent for the Ecclesiastical Commissioners is reported as having said that the first difficulty in providing buildings as artizans' dwellings is the procuring of sites, and that the second difficulty is that, even if sites can be procured, the ground rents are so enormous. Mr. Tarrant said to me—"There is a large capital loss in the provision of the sites. Land must be got at the cost of the community, or from the big landlords. If the land costs 2d. a foot a-year rent, the ground rental chargeable on a room is 3d. per week."

*MR. SPEAKER: I have listened very carefully to what the hon. Gentleman has said. There is nothing in what he has said which is not pertinent to the Second Reading of one or other of the Bills which the House has ordered to be read on a future day. I am sorry to tell the hon. Gentleman that he is out of order.

*MR. JAMES STUART: Sir, I will bow, of course, to your decision, and conclude my remarks by repeating that this is a matter which will not wait. We have arrived at a time when we must do something, and do it very speedily, for the poorer class of persons who are becoming better educated, but who are still housed in the manner I have endeavoured to describe.

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I think it will have been obvious to the House that the course the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Stuart) has pursued is somewhat inconvenient. The hon. Gentleman has had on the paper an Amendment to the Address that he has altered once at least, if not oftener, to bring it within the Orders of the House; and although, no doubt, the hon. Gentleman has endeavoured to comply with Mr. Speaker's ruling, yet almost every remark that he has made would have been germane to Bills before the House, and it is, therefore, extremely difficult to follow him without trenching in some degree on the Rules of the House. For myself, I believe that on both sides and in all quarters of the House there is a universal feeling that the sufferings of the poor in the Metropolis and in the country are great, and are borne with heroic fortitude; and nothing, I am sure, could give greater satisfaction to hon. Members generally than if they were able to minister, in however small a degree, to the comfort and happiness of the working classes. The Party to which I belong have shown their sympathy with the poor on many occasions by the legislation they have inaugurated and supported. And my answer to the hon. Gentleman's speech is that it is not so much legislation that is wanted in that matter as a reform in administration. I am perfectly ready to admit that, as far as the Report of the Royal Commission is concerned, there is much to be done in the way of legislation by suitable buildings; and, further, that the demolition and erection of buildings should as far as possible go on simultaneously and not successively—that is to say, that the demolition should not take place all at once. In one year alone in the Metropolis Railway Bills were passed which involved the razing of 1,807 houses, and the turning out of 14,905 persons. So the magnitude of the matter is very great. There is no doubt in the minds of those who have communicated with me upon the matter that the provisions of the Standing Order are not fulfilled. The present Government is, from their own showing, under a special obligation to deal with the matter. In the Amendment which I put on the paper, I asserted that the sanitary question should be dealt with. I did so because if you once enter upon an improvement in the sanitary condition of the dwellings of the working classes, you open out a much wider question—a question which Lord Salisbury fully recognized when he introduced the Bill of 1885—for he then said that that Bill must be considered a complete outcome of the Commissioners' Report, adding that there were large and difficult questions untouched, which the circumstances of the Session did not permit of them dealing with then. It will be in the recollection of the House that recently my right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Morley) went down to the East of London and touched upon certain points affecting the well-being of the working classes, more particularly in the Metropolis. The programme then unfolded by the right hon. Gentleman has been spoken of as the Clerkenwell-cum-Limehouse programme. The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) went down to the East End a little later and made a speech upon similar topics. The Chancellor of the Exchequer found fault with my right hon. Friend for what he had said. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said—

"It is a preposterous innuendo on the part of our opponents to suggest that they are more qualified than we are to deal with the social reforms which are now being put forward."

The social reforms the Chancellor of the Exchequer particularly referred to were the housing of the poor, leasehold enfranchisement, and the relative burdens borne by the rich and poor. I have read my right hon. Friend's (Mr. J. Morley's) speech, but I have not been able to find any innuendo, unless it consisted of this—that he undertook to deal with these questions, and thereby made it appear that he thought that he was fit to do so. The Chancellor of the Exchequer also said—

"I do not doubt Mr. Morley's sincerity, but what I am here to bring to the minds of this meeting is that the Unionist Party is better qualified by the previous history of its Members and its present intentions to deal with these burning questions."

What I really want to ask is, why on earth does he not deal with them? The Chancellor of the Exchequer continued—

"We humdrum workers may be allowed to smile, and to ask the public to smile, when we see the wirepullers getting hold of the idealists and instructing them to deal in general phrases—mind, in general phrases—with some of those problems and subjects."

Then he refers to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. Gladstone). He said there is a wall between him and his ability to reach these questions, and that was the Irish question; and he went on to say—

"We do not see the wall at all. We see a heap of ruins over which we conduct our victorious forces to gather the harvests which they long for—harvests which we have been engaged in gathering, and to fields where we hope still to be able to sow and to reap crops. What is the difference between ourselves and our opponents? We see that we can act now."

And, lastly, after he had drawn a terrible picture as to its taking the Liberal Party ten years before they could touch these questions, the right hon. Gentleman said—

"But the Unionist Party do not propose to postpone for ten years measures necessary and desirable for the improvement of the people. We do not look forward so far. We believe that the time for dealing with important questions is not ten years hence after all these Utopias have been dealt with, but yesterday, to-day, and to-morrow."

These were the very impressive words with which he concluded his reference to the subject, and then he added:—

"As the Session is so near at hand, I think you will all agree with me that it would be impossible for me to disclose the measures which will be announced by the Cabinet as a whole."

What was the meaning of that speech? Did it not mean to any plain, honest man that we were going to see some of this very necessary legislation tackled by the present Government? I came down to the House on the opening day in the full hope and expectation of finding that some real measure for the benefit of the poorer classes of the Metropolis would be dealt with. How is it that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has abandoned his position? Is it that he has not been able to carry his Colleagues with him? There was nothing in the Queen's Speech, and nothing in the speeches of the Mover or Seconder of the Address, about these matters which the Chancellor of the Exchequer said, down in the East of London, were subjects to be dealt with "yesterday, to-day, and to-morrow." Gentleman has had on the paper an Amendment to the Address that he has altered once at least, if not oftener, to bring it within the Orders of the House; and although, no doubt, the hon. Works supplied a connecting link between the various existing boards and sanitary bodies, something like the relation between the Central and District Councils, we may call it. But at the present moment there is no responsibility at all to the central authority, even in sanitary administration. These local bodies are so many sovereign powers. What I want to ask is this. We have seen rumours in the Press as to the measures the Government is going to amend and supplement the Act of last Session, but I should like to have it from the right hon. Gentleman publicly, is that measure to include London or not?

*MR. RITCHIE: I gave the same answer to a similar question last year. The hon. Member is not raising any new point. It was distinctly raised last year, and I then stated with what I believe was the unanimous concurrence of the House, that the interests of London government were so great that they required to be dealt with in a Bill by themselves and that I could not undertake to deal with that particular part of the question this Session.

*MR. LAWSON: Then I may take it from the right hon. Gentleman that London will not be dealt with this Session?

*MR. RITCHIE: Certainly.

*MR. LAWSON: Then you have given us this great gaunt skeleton of local government and absolutely refuse to clothe it with flesh and blood. I can assure the House that from a sanitary and social point of view, the interior reform of London government is more important than the reform of the Central Government itself. The right hon. Gentleman has himself shown by the reform he has suggested that nearly all sanitary administration is in the hands of parochial authorities, and the County Council is almost powerless in such matters. These Vestries and District Boards have to administer the Nuisances Removal Act; we have no authority to administer the Sanitary Acts of 1866; they are responsible for the sanitary condition of every existing structure—

*MR. RITCHIE: I said distinctly it was so, and that I proposed, by a Provisional Order Bill, to transfer powers to the London County Council to deal with such matters itself in case of default by local authority.

*MR. LAWSON: But that will not amend the constitution of these local bodies. Nobody stands up in this House for the greater part of the Vestries of London. They are left to administer all powers, except such as those under the Torrens and Cross Acts, and the London County Council will have no control over local authorities, except the possibility that in the future it will be able to exert some indirect influence of direction over Officers of Health hereafter to be appointed. When they make their Reports, then it will be all right; but the right hon. Gentleman has not yet suggested it is possible to allow us to enforce them. I do hope the right hon. Gentleman will realize that there is nothing so bad for London as to allow this confusion to be prolonged. We had a half promise, as I understood it, that this Session we should have an Amending Bill to consolidate and dovetail the different pieces of London government, and now we are told we may get it next year, and perhaps we shall not get it at all. But what is required more than anything is this interior reform of London administration. Some vestries are not so black as they are painted, and in others, where you have the house jobber and the sweater dominant, the fault lies with those superior persons in London who regard the petty affairs of their own neighbourhood as beneath their notice. There ought to be diminution in the number of members of Vestries, in order that office held in them should be of greater dignity, and the electorate would have a larger choice of men, and most certainly you ought to do away with the indirect representation in district bodies, as you have condemned it in the central body. You should bring in a short Bill to place Vestries and District Boards under the general jurisdiction of the County Council for sanitary purposes. The work of assimilating the sanitary administration of London is even more important than consolidating the Sanitary Law. What we want is unity and uniformity, and I would press on the right hon. Gentleman, how are you to improve administration while you leave these bodies in all their present corruption? Why are you not prepared to supplement the good work of last Session, and help through the reforms we require to meet our pressing needs. Session after Session you have the advice of experts. You had a Committee to inquire into the immigration of foreigners into London, and the sanitary aspect of the question occupied much attention on the inquiry. One witness, the Sanitary Inspector for Whitechapel, described the uncertainty of administration in relation to overcrowding. The Act did not define overcrowding, and so in some districts 400 cubic feet of space was required for each person, in others 300 cubic feet, and in others 250 feet. You have this state of things, that you define the breathing space a pauper shall have in the workhouse, you prescribe the space a cow shall have in her licensed shed, yet you are content to leave the ordinary citizen who does not enter the workhouse to the varying mercuries of each medical Officer of Health, who sets up his own standard in his own district. This gentleman's evidence contained another important piece of advice. He said the sanitary condition of the registered common lodging houses was subject to police inspection only. These lodging-houses are under the police—but whom are the police under? When Estimates were voted for their maintenance they were under this House, now they will be paid from local funds without being under local control. He said he only visited such when there was a question of structural alteration or something of that kind. I do not quote opinions of politicians; the House is aware that several Metropolitan Magistrates have expressed in the strongest terms their sense of the pernicious influence these common lodging houses have upon the people. Then I might draw the right hon. Gentleman's attention to a suggestion, and a principle that has been embodied in many local Acts, that is the compulsory registration of the existence of infectious disease. In his last report the Vestry Medical Officer for Chelsea draws attention to the subject.

*MR. RITCHIE: I have already intimated my intention to introduce a Bill on the subject.

*MR. LAWSON: I was not aware of that, and am very glad to hear it. That disposes of one of the recommendations that sanitary reformers in London would like to make. I will not detain the House at length, but I would point out that whilst there have been many amendments of the law made which have remedied the state of things revealed by the Commission to inquire into the housing of the working classes, certain facts remain as true now as ever they were. I have read the whole of the evidence taken by the Commission twice over, but I will not trouble the House with Blue Book extracts as to this or the evidence given before the Town Holdings Committee. The Commission was to some extent of an ornamental character, and all who have read the evidence will feel that it would justify a great deal more than is recommended in the Report. I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether seriously he can make much boast of the Act passed in 1885 to amend the law as to the dwellings of the working-classes, when everybody knows that it has been a dead letter. The right hon. Gentleman says that is the fault of Administration, but why should he refuse to reform those bodies that have to carry out the provisions of Lord Shaftesbury's Lodging house Act. He may say the County Council is in existence, and the Metropolitan Board of Works is swept away, but in the administration of sanitary laws, Vestries and Local Boards have far more to say than the County Council. The County Council may in time exercise some general supervision, but until you pass a measure of interior reform for London all the rest will be worth very little. May I call attention to the facts contained in the Appendix to the Report in reference to the proportion of population to houses and area in London and two other great towns. In the central district of London you have the proportion of 158 of population to the acre and 10·3 to the house; while in Birmingham it is 83 population to the acre and 5·1 to the house; and in Liverpool, 85 to the acre and 4·5 to the house. Therefore these are about double the population to the house and the acre in London that you have in Birmingham and Liverpool. Mr. Williams gives some most interesting facts as to the rent paid by the artizan and labouring classes in London. He says that 46 per cent, pay from a quarter to a half of their wages in rent; 42 per cent pay from a quarter to a fifth; and 12 per cent pay less than one fifth. That, in fact, 88 per cent of the working classes pay more than a fifth of their weekly earnings in the form of rent. Can anyone say this state of things is in a way to be remedied? Some of the more glaring scandals have disappeared, not owing to legislation but to the force of public opinion, which has not yet died away. If "slumming" has gone out of fashion we still have the Mansion House Committee, and we cannot praise too highly the work that Committee has done and is doing. Some people may tell you that voluntary action and individual enterprise are solving the problem and meeting the difficulty, but that is not the case. Nobody who has knowledge of the subject will seek to take any one iota of the praise due to the "Improved Industrial Dwellings Company," the "Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings Company," and other associations of the kind. If they offend against æsthetic canons in the external appearance of these buildings.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is now certainly touching upon matters to which, I must remind him, one or more Bills now before the House are addressed.

*MR. LAWSON: I was not proposing, Sir, to enter upon the subject as a whole, but only to refer to the voluntary principle and those cases where no power is given by Act of Parliament. But, however, I drop that subject, only saying that experience has shown clearly that you are able to give to the skilled artizan class sound housing at a reasonable cost as a commercial speculation, on a business footing, but you have not in the least provided for housing the very poor, that is as much a necessity to day as it was when the Commission sat. I should like to give from my personal knowledge an instance that has not yet been made public. The Whitechapel murders were committed within a small area of ground. The right hon. Gentleman knows very well the small streets and alleys contiguous to the Commercial Road make up a very plague-spot of human misery. Well, in consequence of the scare caused by the murders there was a general exodus from the numerous lodging-houses of the district. In one of these the number of occupied beds was reduced from 130 to 20 in one night. It came to the ears of a number of gentlemen, some of them Members of this House, that the whole of these foul dwellings were situated on a single property, and that a great many of the house-owners fearing that they would be unable to earn their livelihood, wished to dispose of the fag-ends of their leases. Well, an offer was made to the ground landlords of the property, a most respectable family. They were a little apprehensive that, as the scandals went on, for fear that their names might be published, for fear that it should be proclaimed throughout the land, that for years they and their respectable agent had been allowing the covenants to remain unperformed, and in taking in the form of ground rents the wages of infamy. Well, the panic passed away, and though a reasonable offer was made, which at first they were ready to accept, they ended by raising their terms and demanded such a high figure that it was impossible to deal with them, and the negotiations for sale fell through, so the place is left a disgrace to the owners and a source of ruin to the neighbourhood. If a public authority had tried to deal with this area they would have found themselves obliged to pay the price required for the goodwill of crime and vice under the existing law. "Severance" and "compensation for compulsory sale" are pretty terms for the protection of rights of property, but I appeal to the House whether the family of ground landlords who owned this plague spot in Whitechapel would not have got off very easily if they had received the price of the bare ground without a penny for the dens erected upon it, considering the purposes to which it had been applied and the profit they had made out of the land for so many years. I am quite well aware that no act of legislation can change the face of London; I am quite aware you are unable to do away with the meeting points of poverty and crime, but, at least, this you can do by carrying out some of the reforms suggested, withdraw that protection and aid the law now gives to the propagation of disease and the demoralization of the whole community.

*COLONEL HUGHES (Woolwich): Compensation for compulsory purchase is not given if the houses are condemned.

*MR. LAWSON: They were not condemned and could not be.

*COLONEL HUGHES: The hon. Member instituted a comparison between London and Birmingham in population at per house to show that Birmingham was less overcrowded than London, but his assumption is incorrect, because in London the houses are much larger, and if you want to make a comparison of the number of persons in each house you must also take the cubical contents of the houses.

*MR. LAWSON: I did not make the comparison; I quoted it from the Report.

*COLONEL HUGHES: With regard to the Bye-laws for the regulation of lodging houses and the difference in the amount of cubic space allowed, it must be remembered that all these regulations have been sanctioned by the Local Government Board. I have never noticed this difference, but at any rate should the hon. Member be right, when these powers are transferred it will be the duty of the County Council, of which the hon. Member is so distinguished an ornament, to see that the bye-laws sanctioned are uniform. I do not see how in the Royal Speech allusion could have been made to the Provisional Orders mentioned. The transfer of powers by Provisional Order was provided for in the Act of last Session, and there was no need to mention what is already on the Statute Book. I am glad there is to be this transfer, and the opportunity of introducing uniformity. I am a little disappointed, I must confess, that the formation of District Councils is to be postponed. It is quite true that at the present time there is a connecting link between the central authority and the District Boards in consequence of members of the Board being elected by the district authorities. That is a very valuable link no doubt, and when the District Councils come to be formed no doubt the right hon. Gentleman will allow the representatives on the central body, the London County Council, to be ex-officio members of the District Councils, so that the link so useful at present may be preserved? I consider the confusion of areas in the different districts of London a great scandal. It leads to expense and maladministration, and I can only imagine this matter is deferred because the right hon. Gentleman desires that the London

County Council should apply its mind to the best means of rearranging the districts of the Metropolis. It is a difficult question to conciliate and harmonise conflicting interests.

MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): It is important that the question of London District Councils should be dealt with as speedily as possible, and I hope the right hon. Gentleman realises the importance of altering the state of things now existing. I would draw attention to a small inaccuracy in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. It may have been merely a slip, but it has some bearing on transactions the Home Secretary may have to carry out. In alluding to the Act of 1885, the right hon. Gentleman said in that year the House of Commons, not being—as I should put it—so much advanced in sympathy with the people, altered the recommendation of the Commission on the Housing of the Working Classes, that prison sites should be sold for less than market value, to “full market value.” Now, I think it was “fair,” not “full” market value. In offering the Millbank site, I hope a generous interpretation will be put upon the expression, “fair market value.” The site of Coldbath Fields Prison could not be used for artisans’ dwellings, on account of the high price that was asked for it. The Artisans’ Dwellings Company refused it, and obtained a better site on the opposite side of the way, from the Metropolitan Board of Works, upon which a large block of dwellings has been erected, while the prison site has been taken by the post-office authorities for the parcel post extension. Additional accommodation was the more important in this district, as there are large Government offices and much overcrowding. There is one thing in the Act of 1885 to which I would draw attention and suggest that a small Act should be passed. The right hon. Gentleman will be aware that under the Act of 1885, which was passed to carry out the recommendations of the Royal Commission, special borrowing powers were given. The Royal Commission recommended that there should be embodied in the Act special borrowing powers to carry out these improvements, but it was found impossible for these purposes to borrow at the rate of 3½ per cent. instead of the higher sums of times gone by. If I might make the suggestion to the right hon. Gentleman, the Home Secretary, it would be worth while in a short Bill, which I am sure would be received with no opposition from my part of the House, to give that power again, so that if the London County Council come to deal with these questions of sanitation, they may have the privileges of borrowing money at the same rate of interest as recommended in the Report of the Royal Commission. I think I understand from the right hon. Gentleman that he regards the question as one rather of administration than of legislation. I have no doubt that the Chancellor of the Exchequer or the Home Secretary will have seen a very valuable report issued by the Clerkenwell Vestry, which has been doing good work. A Committee of that body has dealt with the question of blind alleys and courts in their neighbourhood, and from their report it will be seen that totally apart from the question of the housing of the poor, there is a vast number of things to be done—the making of thoroughfares where there were no thoroughfares, or blind alleys, and the pulling down of houses which formed the arched entrances of courts. The whole of that work involved a very heavy expenditure; and it will be found from the report to which I have referred that, had all the works necessary to be done been executed, it would have put upon the parish of Clerkenwell a rate that the ratepayers would have been unable to meet. And it further states that the evils which the Royal Commission pointed out are still in force, and that until there is an alteration, it is feared they will inevitably be so. The Vestry find that they cannot do all they desire until the evil reported on by the Royal Commission as to the housing of the poor has been legislated upon. I find in the report also a suggestion as to future legislation, to which I call the attention of the right hon. Gentlemen opposite. I see the attention of the Metropolitan Board of Works is called to certain squares in the parish of Clerkenwell, and the opinion is expressed that they ought to be dealt with by the Metropolitan Authority, and that the clauses in the Act of 1882 (Sir Richard Cross's Act), limiting the areas dealt with to not less than 10,000 houses, should be repealed. What the Report suggests is a series of small areas in the same neighbourhood, and they propose 10 houses in each, and that it should be possible to deal with these by the Central Authority, instead of leaving the work to small parishes like Clerkenwell, with a population of 80,000 people. I deeply regret that the Government have not been able to recommend, in the Speech from the Throne, that some of these London grievances should be dealt with. I can assure them of one thing, that London is becoming very impatient. More will be heard of London in this House than has been heard in the past. In the good old days before 1885, it was almost matter of wonder to hear the voice of a Metropolitan Member, or anything with regard to London, in this House. Now, London will have to be listened to, and the reforms it requires will have to be dealt with, and I do hope that before long the Government will give us some indication that they are prepared to do these things. I regret that I cannot go deeply into this question in the Debate, but I hope for some early opportunity, when I think it will be possible to prove to the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board, that the question is not simply one of administration, but that there is a vast amount of legislation required before London will be put into a satisfactory position.

*MR. WHITMORE (Chelsea) said, I am bound to say that I dissent from the observation of the hon. Member for St. Pancras, that the Government has done little for London, for last Session it passed a measure, much of which has direct relation to London, of greater magnitude and complexity than any London measure that has been passed for years. It has been complained that London is not mentioned in the Queen's Speech; but if London were specifically mentioned, then every hon. Member would have an equal right to contend that the particular district in which he was interested should be mentioned. I enter my protest against that sectional way of dealing with public questions. I yield to no one in my desire that these important matters should be brought before the attention of the House. I quite agree that there are many matters connected with the sanitation of London which

*MR. LAWSON: They were not condemned and could not be.

*COLONEL HUGHES: The hon. Member instituted a comparison between London and Birmingham in population at per house to show that Birmingham was less overcrowded than London, but his assumption is incorrect, because in London the houses are much larger, and if you want to make a comparison of the number of persons in each house you must also take the cubical contents of the houses.

*MR. LAWSON: I did not make the comparison; I quoted it from the Report.

*COLONEL HUGHES: With regard to the Bye-laws for the regulation of lodging houses and the difference in the amount of cubic space allowed, it must be remembered that all these regulations have been sanctioned by the Local Government Board. I have never noticed this difference, but at any rate should the hon. Member be right, when these powers are transferred it will be the duty of the County Council, of which the hon. Member is so distinguished an ornament, to see that the bye-laws sanctioned are uniform. I do not see how in the Royal Speech allusion could have been made to the Provisional Orders mentioned. The transfer of powers by Provisional Order was provided for in the Act of last Session, and there was no need to mention what is already on the Statute Book. I am glad there is to be this transfer, and the opportunity of introducing uniformity. I am a little disappointed, I must confess, that the formation of District Councils is to be postponed. It is quite true that at the present time there is a connecting link between the central authority and the District Boards in consequence of members of the Board being elected by the district authorities. That is a very valuable link no doubt, and when the District Councils come to be formed no doubt the right hon. Gentleman will allow the representatives on the central body, the London County Council, to be ex-officio members of the District Councils, so that the link so useful at present may be preserved? I consider the confusion of areas in the different districts of London a great scandal. It leads to expense and maladministration, and I can only imagine this matter is deferred because the right hon. Gentleman desires that the London

County Council should apply its mind to the best means of rearranging the districts of the Metropolis. It is a difficult question to conciliate and harmonise conflicting interests.

MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): It is important that the question of London District Councils should be dealt with as speedily as possible, and I hope the right hon. Gentleman realises the importance of altering the state of things now existing. I would draw attention to a small inaccuracy in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. It may have been merely a slip, but it has some bearing on transactions the Home Secretary may have to carry out. In alluding to the Act of 1885, the right hon. Gentleman said in that year the House of Commons, not being—as I should put it—so much advanced in sympathy with the people, altered the recommendation of the Commission on the Housing of the Working Classes, that prison sites should be sold for less than market value, to “full market value.” Now, I think it was “fair,” not “full” market value. In offering the Millbank site, I hope a generous interpretation will be put upon the expression, “fair market value.” The site of Coldbath Fields Prison could not be used for artisans’ dwellings, on account of the high price that was asked for it. The Artisans’ Dwellings Company refused it, and obtained a better site on the opposite side of the way, from the Metropolitan Board of Works, upon which a large block of dwellings has been erected, while the prison site has been taken by the post-office authorities for the parcel post extension. Additional accommodation was the more important in this district, as there are large Government offices and much overcrowding. There is one thing in the Act of 1885 to which I would draw attention and suggest that a small Act should be passed. The right hon. Gentleman will be aware that under the Act of 1885, which was passed to carry out the recommendations of the Royal Commission, special borrowing powers were given. The Royal Commission recommended that there should be embodied in the Act special borrowing powers to carry out these improvements, but it was found impossible for these purposes to borrow at the rate of 3½ per cent. instead of the higher sums of times gone by. If I might make the suggestion to the right hon. Gentleman, the Home Secretary, it would be worth while in a short Bill, which I am sure would be received with no opposition from my part of the House, to give that power again, so that if the London County Council come to deal with these questions of sanitation, they may have the privileges of borrowing money at the same rate of interest as recommended in the Report of the Royal Commission. I think I understand from the right hon. Gentleman that he regards the question as one rather of administration than of legislation. I have no doubt that the Chancellor of the Exchequer or the Home Secretary will have seen a very valuable report issued by the Clerkenwell Vestry, which has been doing good work. *MR. WHITMORE (Chelsea) said, I am bound to say that I dissent from the observation of the hon. I enter my protest against that sectional way of dealing with public questions. I yield to no one in my desire that these important matters should be brought before the attention of the House. I quite agree that there are many matters connected with the sanitation of London which press for earnest attention and early treatment by Her Majesty's Government. Who could have listened to the speech of the President of the Local Government Board to-night without seeing that he is a Minister who thoroughly understands London questions, and who sympathizes with the difficulties of the poor? But hon. Members opposite have chosen an irregular, inconvenient, and futile opportunity of raising London questions. London Conservative Members are at least as anxious as Metropolitan Members opposite, to do what they can to improve the condition of London; and we most earnestly press upon Her Majesty's Government, at as early a date as they conveniently can, to introduce further legislation to consolidate and amend the several Public Health and Dwellings Acts, and to provide that in all cases of a displacement of population under compulsory powers, it shall be obligatory that adequate new accommodation shall be supplied for those who were thus ejected.

*MR. S. O. BUXTON (Tower Hamlets): It seems to have rather hurt the feelings of hon. Members opposite to describe them as docile and inoffensive. I had thought it rather a complimentary term as applied to those private Members who sit behind the Treasury Bench, and who are apt to be very docile and inoffensive, for if they get restive they are told in very strong language that the Government do not like their conduct at all. I am rather sorry that this debate has been confined entirely to the Housing of the Working Classes. I raise a strong protest against the Government, because all reference to Metropolitan questions has been omitted from the Queen's Speech, and especially in regard to the emphatic promise made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who went to Stratford to talk, not of questions of administration, as the President of the Local Government Board seems to suggest, but of legislation. He went there to counteract the speeches of my right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian. Hailing from the aristocratic quarter of St. Georges, Hanover Square, he sneered at the programme of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) as the Clerkenwell-cum-Limehouse programme; and at Stratford he declared, as a responsible Member of the Government, that not only was the Government possessed of all the knowledge and all the proper feeling in this matter, but that they also possessed the capability of giving effect to these questions to which reference has been made. My hon. Friend the Member for Shoreditch Division has already quoted one of the emphatic promises made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in that particular speech. But I should like to trouble the House by repeating another portion of the speech, because it seems to me to make it more just that Metropolitan Members on this side of the House should raise a short debate on Metropolitan questions on this occasion. He said, "After stating that the Unionist Party were better qualified than any other to deal with these Metropolitan questions, the Chancellor of the Exchequer went on to say—

"The Unionist Party do not propose to postpone for ten years, or to the beginning of the next century, measures necessary or desirable for the improvement of the people. We believe that the time for dealing with these important questions is not ten years hence, but yesterday, to-day, and to-morrow."

And now, while we are asking the Government for bread we receive a stone. We ask for legislation and the Government talk of administration. It is true there are many matters in regard to which the position of the working-classes can be improved by improved administration, but there are also a vast number of questions affecting the Metropolis to which reference has been made that can only be dealt with by legislation. The power to deal with markets and water should be handed over to the County Councils, and we desire also that such matters as the incidence of taxation, the equalization of Poor Rates, and the question of Leaseholds, should also be taken into consideration, and that, if possible, the Government should do something with regard to them. What, I ask, is mentioned in the Queen's Speech in response to the promise of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It is true that the right hon. Gentleman has said that the Government means to introduce Bills, although they are not mentioned in the Speech from the Throne; but hon. Members know that the position given to the measures mentioned in the Queen's Speech is everything, and that precedence in that Speech is a proportionate guarantee on the part of the Government of the pressure they will exercise to pass them. We are told that the Defences of the Empire ought to be strengthened, and that, no doubt, worthily deserves the first place in the Queen's Speech; and then Her Majesty's Government are going to carry out the policy of "simultaneity and spontaneity" by neglecting Ireland, and bringing in a measure of local Government for Scotland. But, beyond this, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, not desirous of having his name as a great finance Minister omitted from the programme, has promised to bring forward finance measures, which may have the effect of somewhat repairing the damage done to his reputation by the introduction of the Wheel Tax. He promised that the Metropolis should receive special attention; but we find that all questions affecting the Metropolis are excluded from the Queen's Speech; although at the same time the right hon. Gentleman is going to devote a portion of the Session to the settlement of the coinage question—the present condition of which has existed for scores of years without serious harm to the country, and might continue for scores of years longer without any further detriment. The right hon. Gentleman is going to do this, and acquire all the honour and glory that may arise therefrom, to the exclusion of social questions of infinitely greater importance. These questions and that of the Sugar Bounties, which is also to be discussed, will, together with the Estimates, make up the sum and substance of any measures which the Government may hope to carry during the short coming Session. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Shore-ditch (Mr. Stuart) has already pointed out the extreme urgency of the questions to which I have already referred. They have been considered and discussed over and over again, and it is time we endeavoured to legislate upon them. The Metropolitan Members depended on the promise of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and now are bitterly disappointed at finding the neglect with which Metropolitan questions are to be treated. The hon. Member for Chelsea (Mr. Whitmore) has said we, in London, ought not to have exceptional legislation; but that is not asked for, and I think we ought to remember that until now we have not had any great representative authority fitted to decide many of the questions that have been awaiting solution in the Metropolis. We now have such a body, and we thank the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board for it, and I think that we are at one in believing that that will prove a great boon to the London ratepayer. Having, therefore, this body in existence, we say that all questions as to water, markets, taxation, and so forth, ought to and can without any difficulty be legislated upon and handed over to the keeping and administration of that great body who may be expected to deal with them to the vast advantage of the Metropolis. I have only risen as a Metropolitan Member to protest, as I do most emphatically, against the absolute breach of the emphatic promise made by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who is perhaps the most important Member of Her Majesty's Government—a breach that will not be easily forgotten, and which we shall be glad if he will explain.

GENERAL GOLDSWORTHY (Hammersmith): In reference to what has been urged by hon. Members opposite I would point out that the House ought to consider what is possible and what is impossible of accomplishment; and I would also say that, as the House is doubtless well aware, if there were less talk there would be more work. The question of sanitary dwellings for the artizans is one in which many of us are interested, but we have avoided speaking at length on the subject, because we have been anxious not to waste the time of the House, and because we hope that there may be time to go into it and other important matters this Session. We all know how hard the House was worked during the past Session, and can sympathize with the position of those who are engaged in the work of the Government, because they have to attend to their various official duties as well as to what they have to do in the House, and it

tary—I do not know in whose Department it would come—would introduce a consolidating and amending Sanitary Act, it would not only add to his reputation, but would secure the gratitude of the people of the Metropolis.

*SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.): I concur with the hon. Member for Peckham (Mr. Baumann) that many Members on this side of the House fully recognize the importance of the subject which has been introduced by the hon. Member for Hackney. Everyone who has any knowledge of the intricacies of sanitary law must recognize the great advantage which must be derived from a consolidation of the existing Statutes on the subject. For my own part, I hope the time is not far distant when the Government will see their way to the introduction of a measure of this kind; but the chief object with which I have risen was to show that the Government are not blameable for any inattention to the wants of the Metropolis. I hold in my hand a Report of the Mansion House Council on the Dwellings of the Poor. It is not necessary to speak of the representative character of that Council, which is presided over by the Lord Mayor, and is composed of members of all political Parties. In their Report the Council acknowledge the deep sense of their obligations to the present Administration, and to the permanent officials of the Local Government Board and the Home Office, for the recognition of the Council's efforts to improve the dwellings of the poor, and they add that without such support the action of the Council would be almost futile. The Report points out the vast field which exists for improvement in relation to sanitary science, and is a practical acknowledgment of the work which has been done by the Government and the Home Office. At the same time, I feel that the present position of the law adds greatly to the difficulty of dealing with the subject, and I would venture, with full assurance, to express a hope that the Government will give their early attention to the matter.

*MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan): Not being a Metropolitan Member, I should not have ventured to interpose in the debate had it not been my fortune for a long series of years to take an active part in sanitary questions in the parish of Paddington in West London. It is a common phrase, both in and out of the House, that legislation by reference to other Statutes is inconvenient and mischievous, and makes it impossible to interpret a Statute or to administer the law with satisfaction. In order to understand the Act which followed the Report of the Royal Commission on the Housing of the Poor, it is necessary that you should have some 40 or 50 Statutes by your side. I myself, in endeavouring to understand the Act for the Housing of the Working Classes, 1885, and to deal with it, have found myself surrounded by a perfect library of Statutes. Yet it is a question affecting the health, happiness, and well-being of the people, and, in my opinion, the law dealing with questions of such great importance ought, at least, to be clear and intelligible, and perfectly free from obscurity and contradiction. In a summer ramble in France last year, I found that it is the custom of the Government of that country to place in the public institutions, week by week and month by month, an explanation of the various Statutes passed by the Legislature. I think this is an example which might be followed with great advantage in this country. If it were done by way of a memorandum, those who have to administer the law would become comparatively familiar with it, and would have at hand some comprehensive view of the main enactments in reference to a particular subject. The consequence would be that enactments now recondite and unknown would become familiar to the people, and would be better carried into operation. Some complaint has been made of the obscurity of the Statutes as far as they apply to London, but that defect is entirely due to the action of the London Vestries. When Lord Basing was at the head of the Local Government Board, he introduced into the House of Commons a Consolidating Bill, but the Vestries unanimously opposed it, and with such effect, having the co-operation and assistance of the Metropolitan Members, that the Bill was withdrawn. I myself presided at a meeting of the Paddington Vestry convened for the purpose of discussing the Bill, but found it impossible to induce them to withdraw their opposition. The reason why the Vestries opposed the Bill was that they thought its provisions would bring them more immediately under the control of the central authority, and they were unwilling to have compulsion put upon them. They therefore opposed the Bill, and the result has been to continue in London down to the present time the incongruous mass of Statutes which now exists. I hope that before long some attempt will be made to consolidate and simplify the law.

*MR. FIRTH (Dundee): I have no doubt that the hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. Powell) has touched the kernel of the difficulty under which we have been suffering in London—namely, the unwillingness of the local authorities to place themselves under Government control. I do not, however, think that the situation is as bad as it was before the passing of the Local Government Bill. But we are all looking forward with hope and expectation to the introduction by the Local Government Board of a District Council Bill on the same sound, democratic—I will not say Radical—lines as the measure for the establishment of County Councils last year, so that there may be constituted in London for the control of sanitary law a very different body from any which now exists. What we have hitherto suffered from has not been so much the want of law as the want of an authority able and willing to carry it out. The ability has sometimes been there when the willingness to carry out the law has been altogether absent. No Acts of Parliament will be sufficiently strong if the authority who is entrusted with the carrying of them out is incapable or unwilling to do so. The medical officers in London have complained of no central control, and there have been individual complaints, not always coming to the surface, that they have been obstructed in carrying out the excellent sanitary law which exists by the very authorities who appointed them. The Local Government Act of last year will remedy a good deal of that inconvenience; for no medical officer can in future be appointed by a Vestry, except under the clauses of the Public Health Act, which gives essential, if not complete, control to the Local Government Board, and special qualifications and fitness for the performance of the duties will hereafter have to be shown. The London County Council, who will pay half of the salaries, will have Reports sent up to them, and by their representatives they will have the opportunity of judging how far the work is properly performed. I apprehend that the action of an economical and intelligent Vestry will be to get their present officer to resign, so that he may be re-appointed, and the Vestry gain the advantage of receiving a moiety of the salary, and in that case the control will be vested in other hands. The London County Council are anxious and willing to infuse an entirely new spirit into the local management of the Metropolis; but there are some things which they cannot do, and which it would not be wise on their part to undertake. Looking, as we are, confidently to the introduction of a District Council Bill, we think we may be spared from attempting it, and until that measure is passed, from adding to the present difficulties of our task. I may say, in conclusion, that I sincerely trust that the Bill of the Government will give to the Central Council still more complete control, especially in matters affecting contagious diseases, which are so much bound up with the health of the Metropolis.

SIR W. LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): The reason why I rise for the purpose of troubling the House upon the Licensing Question is the absence of all allusion to it in the Queen's Speech. I have received an intimation from the Speaker that the Amendment which I have placed upon the Paper cannot be moved, because certain Bills have been introduced which deal with the same subject. These Bills, however, only deal with the subject in particular localities, whereas my object is to deal with an evil which affects the kingdom as a whole.

*MR. SPEAKER: It is somewhat difficult to contend with the ingenuity of hon. Members in evading a plain rule of the House. If the hon. Baronet turns to the notice paper he will find a Liquor Traffic Local Option Bill, a Liquor Traffic Local Veto (Scotland) Bill, a Liquor Traffic Local Veto (Ireland) Bill, and a Liquor Traffic Local Veto (Wales) Bill. The reason why I insist so strongly upon the observance of the rule is that, if hon. Members who have not been fortunate in the Ballot, and find their Bills not well placed for arly discussion, are to be at liberty to anticipate the Debate upon their Bills by moving an Amendment to the Address, embodying the subject matter of those Bill, by merely prefixing the formula "We regret that no mention is made in the Speech of such and such a Bill," then the Debate on the Address might be illimitably extended.

SIR W. LAWSON: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for mentioning the matter to me, but I think that I shall be in order if I express my regret that the subject has not been mentioned in the Queen's Speech.

MR. SPEAKER: On the contrary, the hon. Gentleman will be quite out of order.

MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): I must confess that I read the Speech from the Throne with a feeling of considerable disappointment. While mention is made of the development of the material resources of Ireland, no mention whatever is made of the development of the Highlands and Islands of Scotland. The people of the Highlands were made to believe, some time ago, that if they wanted Reform they had only to commit some act of lawlessness, and hence we have heard of a deer raid, which involved the sending of gunboats, the landing of soldiers, and the employment of a large body of police. By-and-bye, better counsels prevailed, and the law-abiding people were told that if they raised their grievances in a constitutional manner, they would get redress at the hands of the present Government. Accordingly, these people in the Highlands have been quiet ever since; they have been patient and long suffering under severe distress, but up to the present moment very little has been done by the Government for them with a view to improving their position. There is, therefore, a danger that the counsels of the extreme party, who advise overt acts of lawlessness as necessary to draw public attention to their grievances, may be adopted by the people. Last year the condition of the people in the Highlands was called attention to in an Amendment to the Address, and the Chief Secretary for Ireland, speaking on behalf of the Government, stated that he knew of no subject which more commanded the attention of the House, or which constituted a more fitting subject for an Amendment to the Address than the condition of the Crofters. I venture to say that that condition has not one whit improved, and there is no less reason for moving an Amendment to the Address on the present occasion than there was last year. Now, what is the condition of the people in the Islands and Highlands of Scotland? Take, for instance, the island of Lewis, which depends for the maintenance of its inhabitants entirely upon the fishing industry. The average rent of the Crofters in Lewis is said to be about three pounds, and many of them are under two pounds. That shows at once that the land is merely supplemental to the fishing industry, which is indeed the main support of the people there. Now, with regard to the fishing industry, a change came over it which accounts for the distress of the people. It was a change which entailed a very heavy loss to the poor fishermen, and it had relation to the manner in which they were remunerated. Previously to 1884, the fishermen were paid fixed wages for time-engagements. Owing to the change in the success of the fishing, the fish curers altered the mode of payment, and insisted that the fishermen should be remunerated by sharing in the profit or loss on the sale of the fish. I believe they were to receive about one-twelfth of the sum received for the fish. The result was that the fishermen, in many instances, received very little remuneration for their trouble, and so returned home with insufficient money to tide them over the winter. It was stated by the Commissioner appointed by the Government, that during the year 1886, a sum of not less than £40,000 was lost to the fishermen by the alteration in the mode of payment, and that a similar loss of £40,000 was anticipated in the year 1887. The distress, therefore, in Lewis had relation solely to the failure of the fishing industry. It is perfectly true, the Lord Advocate might say, that there is not the pinching necessity to-day that there was a year ago, but I must point out that the position of these people is very precarious, and it is so precarious that at times it has been necessary to exercise charity on their behalf. In the year 1883 it was found necessary to send them relief to the extent of seven or eight thousand pounds, owing to a single storm having swept over the district. Again, the

Government have been and are expending a sum of £10,000 with a view to the promotion of emigration from the district, and last year they passed an Act of Parliament authorizing the payment of £30,000 in aid of local rates on account of the distress. These facts show that there is a distress which requires some kind of remedy. Now, I anticipate that the £10,000 which the Government has obtained power to devote in aid of emigration, and the £30,000 which is given in aid of local taxation, will all be exhausted very shortly. Yet, will the condition of the people be any better than it was two years ago? I think it will not; on the contrary, it will be necessary for the Government to bring in fresh legislation to renew the grant of £30,000, and we are, therefore, entitled to find fault with the omission to refer to the matter in the Queen's Speech. To Ireland, which is in less poor circumstances than are the Highlands, you have references made in the Speech. Now, the first question to discuss is, whose duty is it to relieve this distress? Because upon that point turns the whole question of the policy of the Government. Now it is the duty of every civilized State to make provision for the support of those able-bodied men who are able and willing to work, but who cannot find employment. That is a recognized principle; if it were not, you would never be able to protect property and life. How does this country discharge itself of that obligation? In England you do it by imposing it upon the local ratepayers; you impose upon Boards of Guardians the responsibility of providing for the able-bodied poor. And in England, supposing that the able-bodied man leaves his family in distress, the Board of Guardians are bound to provide medical relief and attendance, but in Scotland the case is entirely different. There there is no legal provision whatever for compelling local ratepayers to provide for the able-bodied poor. You have, therefore, a clear distinction between England and Scotland. In the former case, the responsibility is imposed on the local ratepayers themselves. In Scotland, the Government not having discharged themselves of the responsibilities, it necessarily rests upon their own shoulders. In Scotland there is only one thing which a man may do.

He may not beg, he may not steal, he may not commit suicide, he has no legal right to relief. The only thing he can lawfully do is to die from starvation. The failure of the law to provide relief for the able-bodied poor, therefore, leaves the responsibility upon the Central Government. How has the Government proceeded to discharge itself of that responsibility? It has accepted it, and it has acted upon it, for it has suggested a scheme of emigration and has spent money upon it. I am not going to discuss now the expediency of the policy of emigration. We will assume that it is a good enough policy, and that it is suitable to the district. I am not going to discuss whether the country is getting the best possible return for the £10,000 which is being spent in the matter of the emigration of the crofters. If the scheme of emigration is to be successful, one thing is certain, and that is, that the Crofters must be sent to Canada early in the year, so that they shall not arrive there later than the end of March. What was the result last year of sending them out later than that period? Why, the winter came upon them too soon, and very heavy expense and loss was occasioned. Now there is nobody to interfere with the Government arrangements, yet I venture to think that a considerable portion of the year will have elapsed before the remainder of the families are sent out. But supposing you do send these families out to Canada, how does it benefit the crofters who are left behind? I can quite understand it is an advantage to the emigrants themselves. We know that plenty of hard-working men have emigrated and made their way in life in other countries, and I know it is an advantage to a colony to get the hardy sons of Scotland working upon its soil. But I again ask, What effect does it have upon the people that are left behind? Those are the people we are mostly interested in. Certainly you get a given quantity of land made available for other tenants; but supposing you send out 70 families, the utmost land you get is that fetching a rental of £210 a year; and that is of very little use to the 27,000 inhabitants who are left behind. You have already been 12 months engaged on this work of emigration; it will probably occupy you another six months, and the result is that before you finish the scheme the population will have increased by a larger number than the number you send out, and the country will be no better off than it was before. But you will tell us that you are spending £30,000 in aid of local taxation. Now, what in the world was the reason for giving this £30,000? Nobody but a Conservative Government would ever have done such a thing. You wonder how it is that a Conservative Government makes no progress in Scotland: it is because when a Conservative Government is in power they never fail to adopt some reactionary policy in aid of the landlords. There never was a grosser case than this application of £30,000 of the public money, which was intended for the relief of the fishing industry, but of which fully one-half has gone direct into the pockets of the landlords, who, as you know, pay one-half of the rates. In fact, I think more than one-half has gone into the pockets of the landlords, because on crofts under a certain value the landlord pays the whole of the rates, and on other crofts the Commissioners of Supply have the power of fixing who shall pay the rates, and, as these Commissioners consist of large landed proprietors, they have relieved themselves of the burden and imposed it on the tenants. Remember that the failure of the fishing industry was the cause of the distress. In two years the fishermen lost £80,000 in wages, and what relief did you give them? You took away 70 of the best families, and not a single copper of the £30,000 granted for the relief of the people goes into their pockets, because they are so poor that they do not pay taxes at the present moment, and therefore, the grant in aid of local taxation is of no advantage to them. And where does this £30,000 come from? It does not come out of the Imperial purse. Oh! no. The Chancellor of the Exchequer would never make such a proposal as that, but what he does do is to take it out of certain duties allocated to Scotland. I have pointed out the responsibility of dealing with distress in the United Kingdom; it is a responsibility imposed upon the Imperial Government; but it does seem strange to me that an Unionist Government should propose to treat this matter as one of different nationalities. The thing is simply ridiculous. I could understand it being done by another Government, but I cannot understand an Unionist Government being the very first to propose a national recognition of responsibility. If you are going to give us these national responsibilities in this way, then we shall want national powers as well; and our contention is that if there is occasion for giving extra relief to the poor districts of the Highlands, that relief should come out of the public purse and not out of duties allocated to Scotland. You are proposing remedial measures for Ireland, and we know that the cost of those measures will come out of the Imperial purse. You have a probate duty allocated to Ireland as well as to Scotland, but you do not take a single copper of that money to meet the exceptional distress in Ireland. Then why do you do it in the case of Scotland, if we are to be treated as a United country? I think it is contrary to all principle for the Government to relieve property of its natural burdens. I could quite conceive the relief of burdens which are payable by the tenant out of his industry, but when it comes to the question of burdens on property, you have no right to treat that in an exceptional manner, because people come into property either by succession or purchase. They take it with all its liabilities, as an investment, and the Government has no right to interfere for the relief of burdens on investments. What is the true remedy in this matter? I think we find the true remedy stated in a speech of the late Lord Advocate. He says that the only thing which has a prospect of success is the fishing industry on the West Coast of Scotland, if it can only be permanently established. It is not charity we want; it is not relief of the rates we want. We only want you to make the conditions of life such that these people may earn an honest living by honest industry; and if you do that, then the landlord will benefit, as well as the tenant, because the burden of the rates will be less. It is only by improving the condition of the people that you can justly relieve the landlords. Raise the people from their poverty, and then the landlord's property will increase in value. The measures we suggest are, in the first place, a survey of the banks, with regard to the habits of the fish and the different places in which they are to be found, in order that the fishermen may have some knowledge of the grounds upon which they are fishing. Such a survey would cost £100 or £200, but we cannot get that money out of the Scotch office, which would readily pay to-morrow another £30,000 for the relief of the landlords from taxation. Next, we want harbours; the coast is naturally formed for harbours, and it would require but a very small amount of expenditure to put two or three harbours in very suitable places. Then we ask that there should be steamboat communication with the fishing villages, so as to give them direct communication with the mainland. And, fourthly, it is necessary that there should be a railway from Ullapool to Garve. The line would only have to be about 28 miles long; it could be made for about £100,000, and it would make all the difference in bringing fresh fish to market. After this will come the subsidiary question of railway rates, and we shall only ask, in that respect, that the rates for the carriage of fish shall be the same as those for the carriage of beer. We want no other protection than that. One thing which strikes me very forcibly is the similarity between our proposals and those which the Chief Secretary makes in respect to Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman says, "We are going to have some public works: some drainage schemes," and then he talks of a State-aided railway. For what purpose is such a railway proposed? Not merely to improve the locality through which the railway will pass, but also for the purpose of bringing the fishing villages into speedy communication with the markets. That is exactly what we want, and no one who knows anything about the North of Scotland will deny that that district is sadly in want of development. We simply ask that we should be treated as part of the United Kingdom. We do not want exceptional treatment. We ask that if poverty exists in Scotland it shall be dealt with in the same way that poverty is dealt with in Ireland. I beg to move the Resolution which stands in my name.

Amendment proposed,

After paragraph 11, to insert the words, "Humbly to express to Your Majesty our regret that, whilst reference is made in Your Most Gracious Speech to our early attention being asked to measures for developing the material resources of Ireland, no reference is made to the distress which prevails in many parts of the Highlands and Islands of Scotland, nor to any measures for removing or alleviating said distress, or of developing the material resources of said Highlands and Islands."—(Mr. Caldwell.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH (Inverness-shire): I think the people of the Highlands and Islands are greatly indebted to the hon. Member for the St. Rollox Division (Mr. Caldwell) for having brought this subject before the House. There is no doubt that the state of many parts of the Highlands and Islands is one deserving of the serious consideration of the House. The late Government appointed a Commission to inquire into the grievances of the Highland people, and that Commission reported fully upon various points. With regard to the deductions from rents which the present Crofters Commission fixed, I have nothing to say; but it is well to recollect that when the Crofters Bill was under discussion the Highland Members pressed upon the Government of the day the importance not merely that the Commission should have power to adjust and fix fair rents, but also to give more land to the crofters. Unless something is done in the latter direction, I assure the House there is no chance whatever of the Land question in the Highlands being satisfactorily settled. A petition presented to the proprietrix by the crofters of Lewis the other day shows very clearly what the people think upon the subject. In that petition they begged respectfully to apply for new crofts and pastures, in order to enable them to live and thrive in their native land; and they pointed out that their sheep land was waste before their eyes, and in the possession of an Englishman. The occupation of this land by them would, they said, enable a great number of them to live in peace and plenty. At present it was of no good, except to supply one man without a family. In conclusion, they pointed out that they were the true descendants of the ancient clansmen who had occupied the land of their island for eighteen centuries. The extension of holdings in the Highlands is a question which the Government ought seriously to take into consideration. Again, there is the question of the fisheries upon the North-West and Northern Coasts of Scotland. That question was reported upon very strongly by Lord Napier's Commission, but I regret that very little has been done by Government upon the subject. It will be in the recollection of the House that last year the state of matters in the Lews was so serious that the Government sent an officer of the Board of Supervision to make inquiries and to report. The Commissioner's Report was to the effect that great misery prevailed, and I believe that it was the intention of the Government, if necessary, to take some steps to alleviate it, when most providentially the fishing suddenly improved, and the people were saved from great want and privation. But surely it is opposed to all reason that in these days a large population should be dependent upon an incident of this kind. The Lord Advocate may rely upon it that until the Fishery, Harbour, and Land questions are dealt with in a comprehensive measure the grievances of the Highlands and Islands will be constantly brought before him. My hon. Friend has spoken of the projected railway between Garve and Ullapool. The result of such a line will be that the fish caught will be many hours nearer market, and we all know that the demand for fresh fish in London is almost inexhaustible. This line of railway, therefore, will be of incalculable benefit. Then there is the question of lighthouses. To-night I put a Question to the President of the Board of Trade in reference to the necessity of setting up additional lights on the North-Western coast by night and day. There is considerably more traffic on the North-West Coast than formerly, but when additional lighthouses are asked for, it is said there is no money. I and my hon. Friends ask no more than our share of the attention of the Government. I assure the Government that, though there is a deal of distress and dissatisfaction in the Highlands, there is no place where there is more loyalty to the Crown. Taking all the facts into consideration, I hope the Government will grapple comprehensively with the grievances of the Highland people.

Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh

*DR. M'DONALD (Ross and Cromarty): I am very pleased at the satisfactory speech in which the hon. Gentleman the Member for the St. Rollox Division of Glasgow has raised this subject. He spoke as strongly as any of us on this side of the House could, but I cannot help regarding it as a misfortune that the hon. Gentleman will not help us to place a Government in power who will do some of the things we want for the Highlands. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) has made several pilgrimages in the Highlands. He has told the Highlanders what they want and what they ought to have from the present Government; but he, at the same time, is very careful to tell the present Government that even if they do not do these things he will still stand by them. Any Member of the House who knows the Highlanders knows that they are not going to be caught by such chaff as that, I believe, and the Highlanders believe, in people who ask for good measures, and who will do all in their power to get them. Now, the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Caldwell) referred very properly to the treatment of Scotland in respect to the Probate Duty. The Scottish people are not getting full justice done them. Take the case of the Fishery Grant. The price of an ordinary fishing-boat is from £300 to £400, and yet the Government insist upon getting 25 per cent. of the amount from the people. You might just as well insist upon getting the whole amount. After much trouble we prevailed on the Government to take 10 per cent, and even that we found great difficulty in getting the people to provide, so great was their poverty. In the case of piers and harbours, too, the Government require 25 per cent, and I am sorry they have not seen their way to reduce the sum to 10 per cent. Some of my constituents have asked me what the Government will do by way of assisting them in the making of a pier, and I have been obliged to tell them that, according to the present regulations, they can only get so much from the Government. I know their answer will be, "You might as well ask us to raise as many millions as you do hundreds." Reference has been made to emigration. Unquestion-ably 99 per cent of the people you send away are improved, but it is not the people who have gone away that we have to deal with; it is the people who stay with you. The flower of the people emigrate, and leave at home the poor and weak and the miserable. So much the worse for you when you come to want defenders for the country. One matter of great importance has been alluded to by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Inverness-shire (Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh), and that is the construction of a new railway on the West Coast of Scotland. The fishing grounds about the Island of Lewis are of the very best, and might be largely developed if the communication with the great centres of population were improved. The Chief Secretary for Ireland has expressed the wish of the Government to give facilities for railway and other communication in Ireland. I at once fastened upon that statement, and thought that, if Ireland was to get such advantage, we in the North of Scotland would stand a similar chance. But even in the matter of postal facilities, instead of getting increased facilities, we find those we have already enjoyed being cut off, on the ground, according to the Postmaster General, that the service does not pay. It is these things which lead to a great deal of indignation amongst the people; it is these things that lead to the demand in Scotland for Home Rule.

*COLONEL MALCOLM (Argyllshire): I think that nothing illustrates the difficulty of dealing with this subject more completely than the difference between the views of the Mover and the Seconder of the Amendment. The hon. Member for St. Rollox (Mr. Caldwell) said that the people of the Lews depended on the fishing, and not on the land, whereas the hon. Member for Inverness-shire (Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh) said that the land was the principal source of the people's livelihood. Both hon. Gentlemen were to a certain extent right, but what, however, I want to allude to more particularly is the propositions which were made by the hon. Member for St. Rollox by way of amending the position of these poor people. In the first place, he proposed the establishment of a permanent and successful fishery. I only wish the hon. Gentleman, or anyone else, could devise the means of establishing a permanent and successful fishery; it would save those who have to do with the districts particularly affected a great deal of trouble. I am afraid that, however skilful the Government may be, they will not be able to devise such a scheme. But they may do a good deal towards rendering the fishery more successful, and in that way I cordially agree with the hon. Member that the amount of money spent, particularly, on harbours in suitable positions, would be of the greatest value. I think if it can be proved—and I am certain there are many ports on the West Coast of Scotland where it can be proved—that these harbours would be of the greatest service, and where endeavours ought to be made to construct them they ought to be harbours of refuge, because what we really want is shelter for the vessels and boats—places where they can lie afloat. Consequently the refuge form of breakwater will answer all purposes. It is true that the fishermen have not money to spend upon these harbours beforehand, but they are perfectly willing to pay fair dues for the use of them. I think that if careful inquiries were made by the Government, or by whatever branch of the Government would have to lend the money, it would be found that there was a sufficient guarantee that the money would be repaid in the course of years. As regards the projected railway, I have no doubt that that also would be of great benefit, but I am afraid it would be hardly fair to pick out one particular line when there are other lines at present being promoted by private individuals, and also seeking to reach the West Coast, though not going as far as Ullapool. Again, there is no doubt that the increase of telegraphic communication through the Highlands, and the increase of coast communication by means of regular steamers, are two of the most ready ways of removing a good deal of the difficulty that we labour under in bringing fresh fish to market. In encouraging increased communication of this sort, the Government would confer a very great benefit on the whole system. As regards rates, I am afraid the answer of the Railway Companies would be that if for fish they were to charge the same rate as for beer, then the two commodities must be despatched at an equal rate of speed, and then I fancy that by the time the fish arrived at any large central market it would most likely be seized and condemned as unfit for human food. I do hope this discussion will be of service in calling attention to the facts, and that the Government will consider how best it can invest and get the safest return for its money, in alleviating the distress that undoubtedly exists.

MR. ANDERSON (Elgin and Nairn): I think that in one respect the people of the Highlands and Islands of Scotland are very fortunate. They seem to have attracted the attention and notice of the Liberal Unionist Party, and I think that any section of the human race who have done that are to be congratulated. I imagine that this Motion was thought of and brought into existence on a recent tour in Scotland of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, because I noticed that at the many banquets at which the right hon. Gentleman was entertained promises were made to the Scotch people—bribes of all kinds, sorts, and descriptions were held out to them to secure their good-will. It is rather strange that the chief actor in the Scottish drama of Liberal Unionist progress is not present—I mean the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham; and after the speeches he made only a fortnight ago, I confess I am very much surprised that this distinguished ornament of the Liberal Unionist Party is not with us to support the very excellent objects of the Motion now under discussion. We must endeavour to get on without his presence. I certainly do think that this Motion is one which, coming from whatever quarter it may, ought to receive our cordial support. I feel myself the greatest disappointment that Her Majesty's gracious Speech from the Throne contains no reference to Scotland. We all know the different attempts which have been made to get Her Majesty's Government to deal seriously with Scotch business. We endeavoured in every way to do this last Session. We brought forward Motions without end—on the Estimates and otherwise—for this purpose, and we were always told that this was to be a Scotch Session. Well, the Scotch business spoken of in the Queen's Speech is, it seems, simply to be the well-worn Scotch University

Bill which we have all heard of so often, and this promise of Local Government. We are, certainly, now dealing with a proposal which ought to impress upon Her Majesty's Government the importance of dealing more particularly and more seriously with Scotch business, and of taking it up in a statesmanlike manner, and not leaving it to take its chance, as, according to my experience, the House of Commons always has done. What does the Motion propose? It has reference to a state of affairs as to the Highlands and Islands of Scotland; and here I have some difficulty. In the few observations I have to trouble the House with I shall have to speak of certain districts which do not, I believe, come in what are called "the Highlands and Islands of Scotland." There is great difference of opinion amongst Scotch people as to where the Highlands of Scotland begin and where they end; and I trust, therefore, that you, Mr. Speaker, may not think it necessary to call me to order if I refer to parts of Scotland which, by many people, are not regarded as in the Highlands, so that there may be no doubt upon this question. I propose to move an Amendment to leave out from the Motion before the House the words "Highlands and Islands," so that the Motion will be made to deal generally with Scotland without restraint at all. The hon. Gentleman who introduced this matter pointed out the condition of the Highlands and Islands, and how much is required to be done there. It is in connection with the condition of these parts of Scotland that the fishing industry has been so much spoken of. That industry, I would point out, is not altogether confined to the Highlands and Islands. There are hundreds and thousands of fishermen, I might say, in other counties beyond those usually regarded as in the Highlands and Islands — men whom I imagine require quite as much care and quite as much looking after as the fishermen in any other part of the country. There are, for instance, the fishermen of Aberdeen, of the Moray Firth, and of the South Coast, all of whom, I venture to think, suffer from the want of beneficial legislation. I have drawn the attention of the Government to this matter, but hitherto without success. I do not suppose there is much to be hoped from the present Government, or even from an ordinary Liberal Government—because in this matter I have to complain of the inaction of both Parties. I think they have both shut their eyes to the necessity for legislation in the interest of the fishing industry. But I am of a hopeful disposition, and I trust that by constantly bringing forward these questions something at length may be done. There is a difficulty as to bringing fish to market. I should have expected to have seen in Her Majesty's Speech some such passage as this—"The condition of the fishing industry is most unsatisfactory, because, whereas it is found that the fishermen get a very small price for their fish, it is also found that the consumer pays for it an exorbitant and extravagant price." I venture to think that there is no more important question connected with the fishing industry and the supply of food to this country than this, and I cannot imagine how time could be better occupied by a Special Commission than in considering how the difficulties surrounding this question can be successfully grappled with. If you go to the fishing piers, where the fish are brought for sale, you can often buy a large cod fish for ninepence. [Laughter.] The Lord Advocate laughs at that, but I can assure him that I am not exaggerating in the slightest degree, and that I can prove what I say. Soles and haddocks are sold at proportionate prices. So much for the fishermen. When, however, you go to Edinburgh, or any other large town, the prices you have to pay for fish are grossly exorbitant, compared with the amounts the fishermen receive, and I maintain that this is a most important subject, and that the Government ought to inquire into it, to find out how it all comes to pass. Discussions have occurred as to how it does come to pass. The railway authorities, of whom there are a large number in this House, tell us that it is not their fault. They say that they carry their fish in the most economical manner, and they and other hon. Gentlemen, representing other businesses, say that the fault lies with the Billingsgate ring. Well, be that as it may, I contend that we ought to have some Select Committee or Royal Commission to inquire into the matter, and get at the bottom of it. The Government is in a state of paralysis on the matter. They have done nothing, and, so far as we know, they intend to do nothing. Then there is another question of vast importance—namely, that of harbours for fishermen. Many hon. Members say that they experienced great difficulty in getting money in respect of small matters connected with the fishing industry, and I have experienced that difficulty also. I find not only a difficulty in getting money, but I find that the Government do not grasp the question as they ought, or take an adequate amount of trouble with regard to it. I asked a question the other day, and last Session I interrogated the Government as to what steps they intended to take to constitute local bodies of fishermen with power to deal with local fishery questions. I pressed the matter upon the attention of Ministers when the English Local Government Bill was before the House. I moved an Amendment to that measure, for the purpose of constituting in the maritime counties District Fishery Boards, who would have power to deal with the question of harbours, trawling, bait, harbour dues, and various other things with reference to the fishing industry. I regret to say, however, that through some informality this Amendment was ruled out of order. I was unable to get it under discussion either in the House itself or in Committee, and the right hon. Gentleman who had charge of the Bill said he would resist every attempt to introduce into it any such Amendment. Well, the Government did do something on this important question. They brought in a Bill—and it became law—for the purpose of forming District Fishery Councils in England. But the functions and powers given to these District Fishery Councils were very insufficient, and if these Councils are created it will be found that they will have little or nothing to do, and I wish now to caution the Lord Advocate against making the same mistake with regard to Scotland. I ask the Government this year to introduce, either as part of their Scotch Local Government Scheme, or as a separate measure, something to create a tribunal which will have power to deal with the local fishery interests in the various maritime counties of Scotland. It will be for the Government to consider how the subject can be best dealt with, but the point which is material is that, first of all, when you create the Councils, you should let them be properly constituted and have upon them men elected by people of the district, and not nominated as they are under the Salmon Fisheries Bill of last year. Let the members of the Councils be properly elected, and give them a rating power over a certain area such as will be benefited by the fisheries; give them power to deal with the fishing harbours, and give them power over the trawling question and harbour dues, and give them power to make regulations for the sale of fish, and to deal with various other matters of that kind. Unless there are local fishery districts created by the Scotch Local Government Bill, I warn the Lord Advocate that I shall find it my duty to oppose that measure in every possible way, because I do not believe there can be a proper scheme without such a provision. I think in this I shall have the sympathy and support of many other hon. Members on this side of the House, and I must say I think the Government should be careful what they are about on this matter, as it is very possible that the Liberal Unionist Party may leave them at any moment. I also think that the Government should deal with the Land question of Scotland. Certain charges of a very serious character have been brought against the Government as to their legislation in favour of landlords. I think that it is to be regretted that the legislation of last year gave the Scotch landlords such a large sum of money. Everyone knows that there is a pressing necessity for legislation on this question in Scotland; but what is the legislation which should have been proposed? Why, there are long leases in Scotland which bring about great trouble and disaster to the tenants on many estates, and the matter has been brought to the attention of the Government to no avail. This should be dealt with; but I am gradually coming to look upon every measure introduced by the Government, constituted as it is at present, as absolutely hopeless. It seems altogether a waste of time to attempt to get anything done; and with regard to what the Government do bring forward, I think we ought to speak very strongly. Their chief proposal as to land is to give £10,000 to emigration. Now, the hon. Gentleman who introduced the Amendment has said, and I think very truly—if he did not say it, at any rate I will say it—that the payment of that £10,000 is simply putting so much money into the pocket of Lady Matheson—and here I would tell the Government that we intend, or at least I, certainly, intend, to oppose that grant altogether, for the reason that the Government has selected certain parts of Scotland that they intend to benefit. Why is the estate of Lady Matheson only to be benefited by this grant? If you are to introduce a scheme of State-aided emigration—as to the policy of which I have grave doubts—I cannot understand why one estate should be mainly benefited. I could find, indeed I know at the present time, many persons who would be glad to receive £100 or £150 from the Government on loan to go to Canada and start a small settlement. But the Government say that that is not within the purview of their scheme, and they will not do it. Their attempt is a small patchwork attempt, which will do no good to anyone but the landlord. It is idle to say that it deserves even the name of administrative ability, let alone statesmanship. The plan will do little or no good, and will cause a great deal of jealousy and heart-burning to people who are not assisted, but who are left out in the cold. I cannot help feeling that one ought not to occupy the time of the House at greater length, but I am bound to say that this Motion raises questions which might lead one to speak at much greater length, because it raises points which affect the general legislation of the Government with regard to Scotch affairs. One might be induced to ask what it is the Government have done since they came into office as a Ministry. This Motion is a serious attack made by the Liberal Unionists upon the Government—an attack seriously entered upon and supported by most powerful arguments. The Leaders of the Liberal Unionist Party, I regret to see, are not in their places; but, no doubt, when they come in later on, we shall witness on their part a most determined and overwhelming attack made upon the Government. And now, finally, I have only to move the Amendment to which I have referred—though if it is likely to lead to inconvenience I will not press it. My proposal is to omit from the fourth line of the Amendment the words "and the Highlands and Islands," and to omit from line 6 "the said Highlands and Islands," in order to insert there the word "Scotland."

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, to leave out the words "the Highlands and Islands of."—
(Mr. Anderson.)

MR. ANDERSON, again rising, withdrew his Amendment.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the proposed Amendment," put, and agreed to.

Original Amendment again proposed.

*MR. C. GRAHAM: I would point out to the Lord Advocate that Scotch Members are practically at one with the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Caldwell), and that there exist in many cases, with which he is, I suppose, more familiar than I am myself, distress and want in these distant islands. In Lewis some of the families do not hold any stock whatever. Sometimes their whole capital consists of two hens, or two sheep, or something miserable of that sort. Really, when we hear of the proposals of Her Majesty's Government to take fabulous sums of public money to expend upon national defences, as I suppose we must call them, I cannot help thinking that, with an expression of opinion so united from the Scotch Members, we might at least have expected from Her Majesty's Government, represented in solitary or dual state upon the Treasury Bench, that there was some proposition to be submitted to this House for the relief of these unfortunate people. I will not refer to the recommendations of the Royal Commission. I never could see the use of the Royal Commission. It is an agreeable way of spending time and wasting public money; and when you get it you apparently hold it in the recesses of public offices, and there the matter rests. We have heard some interesting remarks to-night from Members who sit on the Government benches, dealing with this question from a point of view which is absolutely novel to me. If I correctly interpret the remarks of the hon. Member for Argyleshire, a little blooming Arcadia exists in those spots to which he referred; but, after the strong remarks we have heard from those who represent the feelings of thecrofting class of the population, I hope we shall have some expression of sympathy from the Lord Advocate and from Her Majesty's Government.

*MR. ANGUS SUTHERLAND (Sutherland): Mr. Speaker, I observe that the Amendment of the hon. Member proceeds upon the fact that certain concessions have been made to Ireland, and that there is no reason why the same concessions ought not to be extended to the Highlands and Islands of Scotland, seeing that the conditions in each case are similar. But I beg to point out that the voice of the inhabitants of the Highlands has not been any more listened to than the voice of the people of Ireland, and my hon. Friend might have pursued points of similarity further than he did. I have no very great hope that Her Majesty's Government will really undertake anything for the benefit of the people of the Highlands. We have brought the case before them on previous occasions, and they have so persistently refused to do anything, that I am afraid, as formerly, our labour will be in vain. Now, however, that the Party (Unionist) to which the hon. Member belongs brings the subject forward, I trust a better result will follow, for, if not, the people of the Highlands will be apt to say that one Party has as little influence in the House of Commons as another. If political gratitude is not altogether extinct in the bosoms of Her Majesty's Government, they will give consideration to what has been brought before them on this occasion, seeing that that the Amendment is proposed by the hon. Member for St. Rollox, and seconded by the hon. Member for Inverness-shire. The Member for St. Rollox stated that in his opinion the money given recently for the relief of taxation went entirely to the landlords. Of course, we know very well that nearly everything undertaken in the Highlands has been for the benefit of the landlord class. That is what we complain of. Though the landlords are numerically few, everything done for the Highlands goes to their benefit. The people of the Highlands and Islands declare that the Government have persistently kept before them emigration and nothing else, so that the policy which has been pointed out by the hon. Member for St. Rollox is just the complement of the other policy of emigration. A great deal has been said with regard to the construction of harbours, but that is incompatible with the policy of Her Majesty's Government, because, if the people are expatriated, what is the use of constructing harbours? They would be of no good in the world unless the people had access to the only means of livelihood within their reach. The Amendment expresses regret at the absence of any policy for the development of the material resources of the Highlands. I state that the first material resource of the people is the land, and until something is done to bring back the people driven from it, there is no use in constructing harbours. I admit that a policy of building harbours might be wisely undertaken if concurrent with a redistribution of the land. There is no doubt that were such a policy adopted with regard to the land, there would be ample scope and need for erecting harbours and developing the fisheries. It is vain and idle to say that the Highlands are congested. Undoubtedly, they are congested in certain localities; but the question is, Are they congested as a whole? In a country where there are eight square miles for every man, woman, and child, it is absurd to say that it is congested. Something has been said about the loyalty of the people of the Highlands. They have been loyal; but what reward has their loyalty met? It is perfectly well-known to the Lord Advocate and the Government that there is no body of people of the same small numerical strength who have done more to build up the Empire than the people of the Highlands, and their reward has been that they have been driven out before wild beasts and sheep. What we wish to see is a reversal of this policy. It is of no use Her Majesty's Government tinkering the question. The Royal Commission said, that though the question of rent was brought before them it was never brought before them in the same degree as want of land. Notwithstanding that the complaints were not about the rents, yet the rents have been reduced on the average from 30 to 50 per cent. What we want is that Her Majesty's Government should recognize that the Commission they appointed has made the best statement of the H land question that has ever been given, and that is the statement of the Highland question given by the people themselves. The hon. Member for Argyleshire called attention to the want of telegraphic and postal communications. I would beg to point out to him that he himself supports a Government which, instead of increasing, has actually lessened those communications, and they are less in 1889 than they were in 1887. It is a strange commentary upon the speech of the hon. Member, that three weeks ago the post-office and telegraph office were shut up at Melvich, in Sutherlandshire, where a population of 700 people were dependent upon them, and the people now, if they want a postage stamp have to go several miles. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will take that matter into consideration. With regard to the question of harbours and the development of the material resources of the Western Highlands, I wish to point out that it will be useless to attempt to grapple with this question unless the Government recognize the claims of the people. You have given the Court power to deal with rents; why not give them power to deal with the distribution of land? If you do that, you will find less necessity for resorting to a system of grants, by which you will be only adding to the local taxation of the country and applying the money in the form of charity; and I am sure the right hon. Gentleman will not suppose it to be an agreeable thing for any Highlander to appeal to charity in order that he may be maintained in his native land. I trust, therefore, that he will assist in preventing this reproach being cast on our people. I have great pleasure in supporting the Amendment.

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. F. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): The Amendment of the hon. Member for St. Rollox (Mr. Caldwell) does not ~~proceed~~ to be advanced in a friendly spirit to the Government. On the contrary, the hon. Gentleman has stated, with a great deal of detail, various objections which he entertains to their administration in the Highlands; but at the same time he has urged these matters on the attention of the Government with manifest sincerity. I think, however, Her Majesty's Government may congratulate themselves on one feature of the discussion, and that is that we seem now, for the first time for several years, to have entered upon a discussion on the condition of the Western Highlands which fairly realizes and grapples with the main and radical difficulties of the situation. We hear now, also for the first time, less about the disputes between landlords and tenants, and very much more about the development of the natural resources of the country. We have heard, to my satisfaction, and even to my surprise, encouraging words said about schemes of emigration. These are the features of the present debate which distinguish it from some of the gloomy discussions to which I have formerly listened, when the whole attention of Parliament has been endeavoured to be concentrated on that isolation of the Western Highlands from the rest of the world which has made it necessary that the landlord and tenant should fight it out between them for a mere patch of ground unworthy of the attention of either. We have heard much about the possibilities of development in the Western Highlands, in the efforts to bring about which I most completely sympathize; and I cannot but regret that the hon. Member of St. Rollox and even the hon. Member for the North Western Division of Lanarkshire (Mr. Cuninghame Graham), should have adopted a hostile tone towards Her Majesty's Ministers, whom they might at least credit with a due interest in the country to which they belong. We are supposed to grudge half an hour to the consideration of even the most elementary feature in this great national question. Half an hour! Many half-hours and days have been spent in the consideration of what is one of the weak points of the social system in Scotland. It is to the interest of every one who values not only the peace but the credit of his country, that everything should be done that may be consistent with the duty ministers owe to the country generally to procure a satisfactory solution of this problem. I cannot emphasize too strongly the regret with which I have heard the suggestion that hon. Members of one party in this House are susceptible to the imputations that have been thrown out in regard to their action respecting this most delicate and important public question; but when I turn to the facts on which the hon. Member for St. Rollox has commented, I must say I do not think they justify the conclusion he asks this House to affirm. It is not the case that there has been any neglect on the part of the Government during the present year of the interests of this class of the community. On the contrary, exceptional measures have been adopted and are being carried out for the amelioration of the condition of the people in the West Highlands. But it is necessary in the first place to observe in this, as in all other questions of local administration, the principles that have been laid down for the action of the Government in dealing with matters relating to the relief of local distress. It is absolutely impossible that merely because a limited number of Her Majesty's subjects live in an isolated part of the country, and are unable to obtain a full subsistence for the land, the Government should therefore break up all the principles on which public money is administered. In dealing with public money where are we to stop, if we are to carry out this suggestion to the extent proposed? I am not aware of any instance in which the Government has, single-handed, engaged in the enterprize of developing the resources of any part of the country. On the contrary, what the Government requires to justify special intervention is not merely a certain measure of distress, but some indication of honest and zealous effort on the part of the district to improve its own fortunes. It is said that the Government has been remiss in not proposing a scheme for the development of railway communication. Far be it from me to suggest that that is not one of the first things that ought to be done in order to open up the country; but when we come to the action of the State with regard to it, I think this debate furnishes two shrewd illustrations of the impossibility of gratifying all the requests that are put forward by hon. Members. One came from this side of the House and the other from the opposite benches. The hon. Member for St. Rollox has referred to the construction of a railway from Garve to Ullapool as an enterprize that must be fraught with good results. But no sooner had he done so than my hon. and gallant friend, the Member for Argyll (Colonel Malcolm), with a vigilant regard to the interests of his country, explained that there is another line of railway of equal or surpassing merit.

Well, if it is held that the Government should engage in the endeavour to settle what should be done in regard to competing plans as to how best to start in developing the resources of the country, we should at once be landed in a region inaccessible even to the wisdom of Parliament. We are all agreed, and Parliament has resolved, that it is desirable facilities should be afforded to fishermen for obtaining new boats; and with this I most assuredly sympathize—but, at the same time, the idea was hardly mooted when the hon. Member for Elgin said it was a gross injustice that such a favour should be conferred only on the Highlands of Scotland, and expressed the anxiety of those whom he represents by moving an Amendment, for which he had some difficulty in finding a seconder. The hon. Member for St. Rollox must, I think, reconsider some of the propositions he has advanced in his eagerness to secure Imperial funds; but, before passing from this branch of the subject, I desire to emphasize the enormous importance of the matter. It is not on squabbles over narrow crofts of ground that the future of the Highlands rests. It is rather in the development of their aggregate resources. It is a past stage in the controversy, the suggestion that everyone must live on land which forbids enterprize as being impossible. With regard to emigration, that subject has been referred to in a more sanguine spirit than on former occasions. The subject of emigration is one which unquestionably opens a large field for discussion; but in it lies one of the hopes of the Highlands. The amount proposed to be given for this purpose last Session was £10,000; but he greatly errs who supposes that this sum, and the number of people who would thus be dealt with are at all indicative of the views of those who promote the emigration scheme. It is true, as the hon. Member for St. Rollox says, that the number of families dealt with in this way is small. Thirty families last year and 40 next year is only a small number; but the great object before the eyes of statesmen as regards the Western Highlands is to bring them into the main stream of human civilization and enterprize. When those persons emigrate they carry with them their language, their religion, their habits of mind, and that loyalty which hon. Members have rightly commented upon as belonging to the Scotch people. It is not, as was formerly supposed, a step into darkness and away from home—it is simply a step from one part of the country where there is less to another part of the Queen's dominions where there is more hope and larger opportunities. I will go further. Her Majesty's Government are most anxious that a Committee should sit on that subject to consider whether the experiment which has been made—for it was merely an experiment—has been so successful as to encourage the further prosecution and development of a system of emigration; but, owing to the action of Gentlemen on the other side, the reasons for which are not quite palpable, that Committee was never appointed. If it had been appointed we might have been one step nearer what has been tonight conceded to be a desirable object. I pass now from the question of emigration to another measure proposed and carried by Her Majesty's Government on which the hon. Member for St. Rollox has made some very sinister remarks. He has said that the distribution of the Probate Duty has not been conducted with due regard to the requirements of the different parts of the country. Let me remind him of certain facts. In the first place, the yield of the Probate Duty is devoted to those parts of the country whence those duties come. The hon. Gentleman founds upon the fact the complaint that the Government are not relieving what is local distress out of Imperial, but out of national resources. I should have thought the complaint would be the other way, and that it would have been said that we are taking from Imperial resources what ought to come out of local resources. The hon. Member is so extreme that he regrets that, stepping forward as the Government did from the area of the ordinary local revenue to the larger area of the kingdom of Scotland, they did not go further and derive the support from the whole of the taxpayers of the United Kingdom. I should like to know whether he thinks there would be a very hearty response from the people of other parts of the country if it were proposed, for instance, to levy a contribution on the urban districts of England for the relief of persons whose fortunes are so very distinct as those with whom we are now dealing? The hon. Member actually goes the length of saying that it is the bounden duty of the State to find pecuniary relief, or in other words a livelihood for persons who have no occupation.

MR. CALDWELL: I am sure the right hon. Gentleman does not wish to misrepresent me. What I stated was that it is the duty of the State to provide for able-bodied persons willing to work who cannot find employment; that that is done in England by putting it upon the local rates, but that there is no such law in Scotland.

*THE LORD ADVOCATE: I do not think that I at all misunderstood the hon. Gentleman. He has stated his proposition a little more fully, but it does not differ, either from what the hon. Member had already said or from what I represented him as saying. Everyone is to receive relief from the State, who cannot find occupation. Find occupation—where? The hon. Gentleman, if he means anything, means that he is to stay at home and that he is not to look around him in the wider world for occupation. He said it is the bounden duty of every man in the poorest part of the Highlands to stay where he is, and it is the bounden duty of the State to support him in that ignoble resolution. It is no more the duty of the State to support such a man than it is to support any person who, born in a town, chooses to live on a doorstep because his father lived in the house of which that is the doorstep. The State has no right to interfere with the causes which compel the best of Her Majesty's subjects to go through her dominions in search of employment wherever it may be found, and it is the bounden duty of those who are responsible for the administration of affairs to speak plainly on that subject. The hon. Member proceeded a little further, and demurred to the bonus or premium to the Highlands, on the ground that it does not reach the right quarter, which it is desirable to relieve. I should like to say a word on that subject. The hon. Member began by saying that the distress is a fishing distress, owing to the failure of the herring fishing; and if that be so, I am inclined to agree that the best remedy would be to try and develop the herring fishery; but when the hon. Member says that there is an unfairness in the distribution of the bonus in the way of relief to local taxation, I hope I may be permitted to call attention to the facts of the case. In those parts of the Highlands in which there is distress, the condition of the landlord is as deplorable as that of the tenant. Those who pay rates are paying sums which would startle the minds of those who live in better-managed parts of the country. The landlords are the paymasters of those districts, and it is their resources which keep the social machine moving at all. If the attempt which has been made to drive capital out of those districts were to succeed, not only would those districts be insolvent, but very much worse than insolvent, and the social machine would not move at all. It is important to bear in mind that the pecuniary aid which we have an opportunity of giving now, and which we had an opportunity of giving last year, is not given as a favour or benefit to individuals, but in order to make the Local Government authorities keep the machine moving, and to remove the possibility of a deadlock. I will take as an instance the case of education. Is the House aware that in several parishes, sufficiently numerous to form a class, the education machine has completely broken down? Schools are kept going out of the rates, and it is a fact that in the class of parishes to which I refer the Parochial Board do not send the School Board the required amount, with the result that the School Board system has completely broken down, and it is deplorable to know that the rates which the Parochial Board thus failed to send to the School Board are so large an amount that it became a serious question for Her Majesty's Government whether they should not intervene to remove that difficulty and practical deadlock. I call the hon. Member's attention to the relief which has thus been given by Her Majesty's Government to the schools, because the hon. Member is not only a frequent speaker in the Highlands, but a still more frequent speaker on the subject of education. We have, by a scheme which has met with acceptance from the School Boards chiefly interested, been able to tide the School Boards over their difficulties. That scheme combines greater administrative energy with greater economy. I grant that the relief must be temporary, but it has been of immense service to the Highlanders in enabling them to get over the difficulty as to the rates. Every year shows that education is one of the great means of opening up the Highlands and connecting it with the outer world, and I think the hon. Member for Sutherlandshire (Mr. A. Sutherland) will agree with me that we could not do a better service to the distressed counties than by helping them in the matter of education. What has happened is this. That although education has been rendered unpopular by the pressure upon the rates, every year shows that education is the great means of opening up the Highlands and connecting them with the outer world, and upon a limited scale efforts have been made to lighten local taxation and increasing and stimulating those energies of the people in other directions which have hitherto been allowed to be dormant in those parts of the country. It is a most disagreeable task for a Scotchman and a Scotch Minister to pass a rebuke upon any part of his own countrymen, but I consider it my duty to say that the difficulties of that part of the Highlands have not been met with that energy and enterprize that might have been displayed. These are plain words, but it is only right that they should be spoken, and I would rather express them myself than leave them to an English Member to speak. It is necessary that this part of the country of all others should not be encouraged to abandon the duty of self-help and sink into a state of inertness. The hon. Member for St. Rollox has pointed to matters with regard to which he charges the Government with inactivity, but I can assure the hon. Member that Her Majesty's Government have given the most anxious attention to the whole subject of the Highlands. I sympathize with all that the hon. Member has said on the subject of the fisheries, but the hon. Member also complained of the fishing-banks not having been surveyed. Has the hon. Member read the Report which was sent into the Fishery Board, and appended to their Report of 1887? I do not say it is a complete report: it recommends further investigation, but it shows that the subject is being investigated. The hon. Member himself has apparently not devoted any of his superfluous time to the minute study of those subjects which he alleges the Government have overlooked. Yet the Fishery Board is a department wide enough awake to the subject under consideration, and already they have made a Report upon it. The hon. Member also made a fantastic proposal for assimilating the fishery rates to the rates on beer. Certainly the connection is not very apparent. But has the hon. Member studied the schedule of rates under the Railway and Canal Traffic Act of last Session? (Mr. Caldwell shook his head). The hon. Member has not. Then it might be well for him to do so. If he had, and this Schedule was open to objection, why did he not call the attention of the Board of Trade or of this House to the subject? There again I say, if there be remissness anywhere, it is not with the Government. Complaint has been made as to the conditions on which loans for boats are to be made; but the revised rules provide for the advance of nine-tenths of the money required, and they are, therefore, certainly most liberal. With reference to the remarks of the hon. Member for Sutherlandshire, I can only say that there are some things in which no Government could satisfy local demands. In such cases, owing to Imperial duty, it might, on occasion of local crises, appear harsh to refuse, but it is nevertheless impossible to accede. I trust, however, that Her Majesty's Government will always be industrious in ascertaining the real wants and requirements of this district, and in carrying out their duties with regard to it as well as to the rest of the Empire, with a due regard to the advancement of the ultimate interests of the district and the approbation and co-operation of other districts not directly interested.

*DR. CAMERON (Glasgow College): I am forced to admit the eloquence of the speech of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, but he has failed to do anything except to convince me of his power as an advocate of how not to do it. He tells us the Government are doing their best to improve the condition of these unfortunate people, whose miserable condition he has described; but has he ever read the Report of the Crofters' Commission? He has not alluded to one-fourth of the recommendations made by that Commission, and many of them might be carried out without the smallest difficulty. With regard to the improvement of the land tenure, something has, no doubt, been done; but it is a miserably small instalment of what is required. The Crofters Commission was wholly inadequate to cope with the work to be done, and it will be years before the arrears are overtaken. Did the right hon. Gentleman ever hear of deer forests? The Crofters Commission made strong recommendations on that subject, but the Government have done nothing. Then, again, the Crofters Commission recommended the reform of the Game Laws in certain directions, but nothing has been done. The same remark applies to the question of roads. The Commission laid great stress on the importance of improving the communications in the Highlands, and the grievous injustice of compelling the people to go 12 or 14 miles from any highway to pay rates for the maintenance of roads. The Commission pointed out how the Government might remedy this injustice, and yet the Government have done nothing. The same observation applies to the recommendation as to the establishment of training-ships in order to utilize the superabundant population. I am not going to discuss the merits of the emigration scheme. In the island of Lewis it would take a quarter of a million sterling on the Government scale to emigrate the surplus population, and that quarter of a million would buy up the whole island twice over at the present moment. The right hon. Gentleman felt it his duty to reprove the Highlanders for their want of energy and enterprize, but what do we find when they go abroad? We find that Highlanders, after the first generation, take the leading positions in our Colonies and develop the greatest energy of character. This is owing to the fact of their living under a different state of law from that which exists in the Highlands, where the energy is crushed out of them. Why should a man be enterprizing and improve his holding when he knows that by so doing he will have his rent increased? No doubt much of this has been remedied; but the work of the Crofters Commission ought to be facilitated by increasing the number of Commissioners. The Government are not stingy in the expenditure of public money in Scotland. When it is a case of sending a military expedition into Scotland, or of paying heavy fees to lawyers to prosecute crofters, the Government are quite ready to spend any amount. But when it comes to spending public money in such a way as to develop the resources of Scotland, then they become stingy. The right hon. Gentleman did not see why the Highlanders should be exempted from that law of nature which applies to the rest of Her Majesty's subjects and not have to move about in search of employment. I accept his doctrine, but I must point out that the Government owe a duty to the Highlanders in that matter. Again, the Lord Advocate has spoken of the advantages of education, and the money given in aid of local taxation. But how did the debt in respect of education arise? I say that it arose in consequence of the extravagance of the English Education Department which required as a condition of the grants allowed that out-of-the-way districts should erect expensive schools, and consequently the parishes were obliged to incur debts. The Crofter Commission have, moreover, pointed out that the education sanctioned by the Government is mere parrot education, for children are instructed in a language which they do not understand. The Government consequently owe the Highland parishes some reparation, and certainly the children should receive an education, the nature of which would fit them for going abroad. The right hon. Gentleman fails to perceive that the beneficial action of the law of nature should equally apply to bankrupt landlords, and should result in compelling them to sell their estates. The best way to develop the resources of the Highlands would be to place the land in the hands of men who would devote their energies to tilling it and fertilizing it, and making out of the most unpromising and barren soil productive farms. I am the last man in the world who would advocate any deviation from the principles of political economy, but I recommend to the study of the right hon. Gentleman the Report of the Commission which sat to examine the Crofters question. They made a number of recommendations which would commend themselves at once to him as equitable, feasible, and just, and I think if he will take steps to secure that they are carried into effect, will be the first Lord Advocate, at any rate in my time, who has shown any practical desire to develop the material resources of the Highlands. The Lord Advocate referred to exceptional measures which it was proposed to take. Did he intend to infer that the Government had anything further in store for us in the way of Scotch legislation beyond the grant of £30,000, and the Crofter Emigration Scheme? If so, I am sorry that he did not amplify that portion of his statement, and supplement the deficiency in the Address to the Crown. I ask him, when he speaks of the question of the fishing industry, will he deal with the law as to foreshore? The latter will not cost any money. My contention is that the terms on which the foreshore rights have been granted are absurd. He has promised a Bill dealing with fishing rights, but already from every side protests have come that the Bill which has been drafted for the purpose would, if carried, constitute a further robbery of public rights. I shall, on these grounds, support the motion of my hon. Friend.

*MR. A. D. PROVAND (Glasgow, Blackfriars): The right hon. Gentleman, the Lord Advocate, congratulated the House on the fact that this debate had not been taken up, as some previous debates had been on Scotch questions, with narratives of disputes between landlords and tenants; but, unfortunately, we shall never be able to get the landlord out of a Scotch debate. The most acute stage of the landlord and tenant dispute was, of course, set aside by the appointment of the Crofter Commission, which did something, at any rate, to alleviate the burdens of these people. Let me point out that, although the Government is going to spend a great deal of money on Ireland in a manner which will prevent any of the outlay being returned to the taxpayer, they do not propose to spend any money on Scotland, notwithstanding that the greatest necessity can be proved to exist in the Highlands. There were three Bills before the House last year dealing with arterial drainage in Ireland. I am one of the last men who would advocate any measure of State

Socialism, and these proposals can only be described as such. Can any one say, the taxpayer is the least likely to get back the money which it is proposed to spend in Ireland upon arterial drainage? These are measures which will chiefly benefit the landlords, and to some small extent the occupiers, and nobody else; therefore the remarks which the Lord Advocate made against doing anything of the kind in the Highlands should have been prefaced by an explanation as to why it is the Government propose such measures in respect of Ireland. They have not done much to alleviate the condition of the people in the Highlands by this paltry scheme of emigration. It has been pointed out again and again in this House that emigration can be no real remedy, considering that the persons who can emigrate from the North of Scotland under the Government scheme comprise but a microscopic number compared with the annual increase in the population. Here is another anomaly. We are spending the taxpayers' money in sending Highlanders away from the North of Scotland, while we permit emigrants to come into London from all parts of the world, who shortly after they have arrived we are called upon to support out of the rates. Another thing which the Government have done is to return £30,000 out of the Probate Duties in aid of local taxation, but we do not know how that money is to be divided. A return has been promised to us, but we have nothing whatever before us. How much of it will go to the Island of Lewis? Whatever share goes there, will go into the pocket of one man, to whom all the land in the island belongs. We are apt sometimes to take a rather sentimental view of the landlords' position. Well, this particular landlord bought the island as a mercantile speculation, and it has proved an unfortunate speculation for him. I am sorry for him, but that is no reason why he should receive what is, in effect, a grant from the Government to help him out of his difficulty. We have been made familiar with mercantile misfortunes in past years, but we have never come across a similar case in which it has been proposed to hand over the taxpayers' money in aid of an unfortunate speculation. The Government have done something in the way of assisting fishermen with boats, and this, with the emigration scheme and the return of £30,000 from the Probate Duties all that can be said in their favour. The right hon. Gentleman speaks as if everything which ought to be done in the Highlands necessitates putting his hand into the public purse. This is not so. Two matters have been alluded to by more than one speaker, namely, harbours and telegraphic extension. The latter has been of very great value indeed, but other things which would be of even greater value is the survey of some of the fishing banks, and a distribution at fair rents of the surplus lands in the Highlands, which at the present time are occupied by deer forests and sheep runs. The right hon. Gentleman twitted the hon. Member for the St. Rollox Division of Glasgow because he had not referred to the appendix of the Fishery Report of 1887. He said that if we looked at that we should find that a great deal had been done in surveying the banks. Now I have referred to the report and cannot find a single word in it with respect to surveying the banks. The principal fishing bank lies off the Lews, and if it has been surveyed it must have been done within the last few months. Earlier surveys which have been made of that bank prove that it is one of the most remarkable fishing banks in the world, but it has not been surveyed with anything like precision. I think a war vessel was equipped for the purpose two or three years ago, but for some reason it was not sent on the duty. Now I understand it would take from £1,200 to £1,500 to do this work, but that is nothing as compared with the value of the services which would be rendered by an efficient survey. We can surely spare one vessel for this task, which could probably be completed in the course of the coming summer. The other recommendation which the Commissioners made was that the land in the Highlands should be divided. I do not mean that it should be taken from any person who now farms it, but what we ask is that it should be let to the tenants at fair rents, the same as has been done by the Crofters' Committee in the Island of Orkney. Those who cultivate the land should be able to obtain it at fair rents, and on no other terms do I ask that the land shall be dealt with. There is another point to which I wish to draw particular attention. The Scotch Land Commission commenced their work in 1886, they made a Report in 1887, and from that time until now no report has been laid upon the Table. I ask whether this long delay should have been allowed. Why, when the Irish Land Commission have to report monthly, should the Scotch Commission allow a period of two years to pass without presenting a report? The right hon. Gentleman himself promised that the report should be presented before the commencement of the present Session. He was perfectly well aware that a debate of some kind in reference to Scotch matters would be raised upon the Address, and I should like to ask whether that fact affords any explanation of the failure to produce that report.

*THE LORD ADVOCATE: Will the hon. Member allow me to say I do not think I made any specific promise as to the date when the report would be issued. I could not possibly have done so. All I did was to undertake that a report should be presented as soon as the Commissioners were released from the arduous duties in which they were engaged in the Highlands, and I never entered into any pledge as to its being ready before Parliament met.

*MR. PROVAND: Are we to submit to these delays in the future? We had a Report in 1887, it is now 1889. If we get one now, are we to wait until 1891 before we get another?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE: I have no direct control over the Commissioners. They have been working very hard during the winter, and I believe when their Report is presented it will be seen that there can be no cause of complaint against them.

*MR. PROVAND: The right hon. Gentleman will see that we cannot ourselves communicate directly with the Commissioners, and certainly we are entitled to have some reason for the delay in the issue of the Report. I should certainly like to have some pledge as to when we are to get the next Report.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): I was rather disappointed with the speech of the Lord Advocate. He made a very able and interesting speech to an interested and amused House, but I am afraid that the effect of the speech in the Highlands will be anything but interesting and amusing to the unfortunate crofter population. We have got the usual dose of political economy well sugared, and we have had more than that—we have had from the right hon. Gentleman insult added to injury. We have had the Highland people lectured by the right hon. Gentleman, and all I can say is that when he goes down to his constituency, where there are a good many Highland men, he may expect that he will be treated in a very different fashion from the way in which he has been received there in the past, and quite different from his treatment in this House of Commons. What is the condition of affairs? You accuse these poor people of not doing anything to help themselves. You have been permitting the landlord to clear them away from the holdings they occupied to the worst lands on the seashore, and you have huddled them together under conditions which practically make living impossible. You have reduced them to poverty, and now you turn round and tell them that they ought to do a great deal more to help themselves. Help themselves! When they are paying 15s. in the £ for local rates—thanks to your interference—in districts where society has been going back to its primary elements, where the School Board and the Parochial Boards will not carry out the law, and where you are compelled to go for the purpose of getting rid of these local authorities, and of bringing into force the action of central authorities in lieu of them. The Lord Advocate stands in the position of a man who has knocked another man down, and then kicks him for falling. If you will take any township in the Highlands, you will find that nine-tenths of the population will compare favourably in point of civilization and morality with the inhabitants of any of the best agricultural districts in the Kingdom. You have made these people poor and miserable. Are they to remain poor and miserable as long as you like? Instead of reproaching them for their misfortunes, you should reproach those who have caused their misfortunes. I had hoped that this would have been a practical debate, and that we should have heard something as to what the Government intend doing. Now we know that they intend to do nothing. I have to tell the Government that if they intend that law and order shall be maintained in the Highlands, and if they do not wish to send gunboats there, as they have had to do in the past, they must carry out the laws that have been passed in this House in the spirit in which they were passed, and they must not hinder and prevent the beneficial legislation which Parliament has passed from being carried out in the Highlands. I will take one instance, which the Lord Advocate has tried to explain away, and that is the fact that the money which was voted to assist these poor people in getting boats for their fishing industry was long withheld from them. You would not give these poor people land. There are many cottars who have no land at all, and in some places cottars who have no land are more numerous than crofters who have land. Now, to that class you were going to lend money to develop the fishing industry, and to enable them to get boats. I had to call the attention of the House eighteen months after the Act was passed to the fact that not a single penny of that money had been devoted to the purpose for which it was voted. When pressure was brought to bear on the Treasury they agreed to grant nine-tenths. But immediately they did that they again betrayed the Highland people. They virtually said to the people, "We will only lend you this money if you have caulker-built boats; if you have the class of boats you require, we will only give seven-tenths." The people could not find the other three-tenths. These people have not got very fine boats. When they come in they have to run the boats up, and, therefore, they do not want heavy and expensive crafts. The Fishery Board, by manufacturing regulations against the spirit of the intention of the House, (because the intention of the Government last year was to lend nine-tenths of the money), tried to make the fishermen buy a class of boats which did not suit them. But the right hon. and learned Gentleman is entirely mistaken if he thinks that the question in the Highlands is a question either of fishing or of boats or of harbours or piers. It is a land question, and if the Lord Advocate wishes the question to turn more keenly than it has hitherto he has only to carry out his present policy. We have a right to ask the Government of the day to carry out the clauses of the Crofters Act. There is a whole chapter in that Act containing many clauses having one purpose in view. There are four purposes of the Act. The first is to fix fair rents. We never complain very much about rack-renting in the Highlands. There has been rack-renting, but we have always said that this is not altogether a question of rack-renting. The Chief Secretary told us that the landlords of the Highlands never rack-rented. But the revelations of the Crofters Commission will show how much he knew about the Highlands. The majority of the rents in the Highlands have been reduced from £4 to £2. The average rent is 50s. a year, so that the people are paying less than one shilling a week for their holdings. But the reductions are practically of no avail while they have got their exhausted holdings. Round about their holdings there is plenty of land under sheep and deer, and they want that land, and they must have it if they are to live. Now I have no objection to emigration, providing the Government give us migration as well. The First Lord of the Treasury has refused to give us migration. There are congested districts in the Lews where you must have migration and emigration. We are quite willing to develop the waste land of our own country as well as the waste land of the Colonies. One thing necessary is that the clauses in the Crofter Act, under which the Commission has power to increase holdings, should be carried out. These clauses have never yet been carried out as far as I am aware of in the Highlands. Although the Act has been two and a-half years in operation, and the operation of the clauses is limited to five years, we are not aware of a single case of compulsory enlargement of the holdings. We are told that there is one case in Orkney, but we have no proof of it. Thousands of cases have come before the Court, and there is only one alleged case of enlargement. If there is no enlargement of holdings, you will soon find that instead of having anarchy in two or three parishes in the Lews, you will have the whole of the people in the townships in the Highlands paupers, and requiring to be controlled. I can tell the Lord Advocate that upon £5

crofts and upon £8 and £10 crofts there have grown men as able as himself. There are Surgeons General in the Army, men of all professions, men who have made fortunes as bank managers, who have been brought up and educated on £8 and £10 crofts. The bulk of the crofters who have crofts on which they can live and bring up a family are leaseholders, and yet they are deprived of the benefits of the Crofters Act. Take the case of the Olythe estate, in county Caithness. There are 150 crofters there, and the Land Court reduced their rents, on the average, 50 per cent, and wiped off arrears to the average of about 80 per cent. A great many of the rents were reduced as much as 66 per cent; but there are 32 leaseholders there, and the landlord is using the power of the law to evict the men, because they do not and cannot pay impossible rents. The rent of their neighbours has been reduced 50 per cent; but they are denied any reduction, simply because they happen to be leaseholders. Flesh and blood cannot stand it. If you are going to aid the landlords to evict leaseholders who are unable to pay impossible rents, then you will want more soldiers and more gunboats. There are landlords in the Highlands who, seeing that the Crofters Commission were reducing rents, have voluntarily offered reductions. But there are some bad landlords who will not voluntarily reduce the rents. I warn the Government that, if the present condition of things continues, they will require increased forces to keep the people under. It will be hard for some of us, whom you call agitators, to prevent the people from breaking the law. We have every desire to prevent our people from going too far; but we get no assistance from Her Majesty's Government.

MR. FINLAY (Inverness Burghs): I had not intended to take any part in this debate, and I rise now to say only a very few words in regard to some of the points touched upon in the discussion. I feel strongly that the state of things in the Western Highlands and Islands, and particularly in the Lews, is such as to constitute an actual danger. I feel that, wherever that state of things is realized, it will be felt that whatever can properly be done by the Government for the purpose of giving relief and abating a condition which may result in the gravest consequences, ought to be done. Everyone who is interested in the Highlands must gratefully acknowledge the kindly and friendly terms in which the Lord Advocate referred to the state of things in the Western Highlands. I frankly acknowledge that the Government have in this matter, not merely given fair words, but they have devised that scheme in regard to education in the Highlands to which the Lord Advocate referred, and which is calculated to afford substantial relief and to secure increased efficiency. The merits of that scheme must be gratefully acknowledged by everyone who is conversant with the facts, but I feel that something more ought to be done, and done while there is yet time. The hon. Member for Caithness (Dr. Clark) has said that the land question is the question of questions in the Highlands. I agree with my hon. Friend in one sense, but the real land question in the Lews is that the land is not adequate to sustain the people.

DR. CLARK: The people have only one-half of the land now: give them the other half.

MR. FINLAY: I speak subject to correction, but I have always understood that in the Lews, even if every bit of land were parcelled out among the people, it would be absolutely inadequate to support them. If this is so, relief is not to be found in any scheme, however well devised, for migration in the Lews. Relief may be afforded to some extent by migration to other parts of the Highlands, and any well-devised scheme of that kind it would be the pleasure of every friend of the country to support. But let me call the attention of the hon. Member for Caithness to the fact that a very great practical difficulty will arise when the question of stocking the farms is brought into prominence. One must not overlook these difficulties and one must not, above all things, overlook the greatest difficulty of all, which no legislation can touch, viz.—that the land in the Western Highlands is not adequate to support the people. I think that everyone must feel that a well considered scheme of emigration is calculated to afford great relief to that part of the country. Government money may be very well spent upon fisheries. I believe that a rich return would be yielded for any money judiciously spent in the encouraging and developing of the fishing industry. One of the greatest needs of the Highlanders is that they should have ready means for bringing their fish to market. We are told it is not the practice of Government to subsidize lines of steamboats, or to aid by state grants the creation of railways, and the Lord Advocate brought the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Argyleshire (Colonel Malcolm), into sharp collision with the hon. Member for St. Rollox (Mr. Caldwell), by pointing out that one scheme of railway was patronized by one of them, while the other was ardent in support of a different scheme altogether. I confess the difficulty. It may be said that if you should encourage one scheme you will be asked to encourage other schemes, but I humbly submit to the Lord Advocate that it is right that the Government should choose judiciously between the competing schemes. Of course I recognize the maxims of political economy to which we have been referred, but I think that those maxims, though true in themselves, are sometimes misapplied and have not regard to the extreme need of the Highlands. To the fact that there is a source of wealth there which may be developed by Government money judiciously applied, I think that more may be done than the Government have yet done. I don't despair of their doing more, for I think the Lord Advocate's speech was not altogether discouraging. I don't think there is any country in Europe which would hesitate to incur expenditure if it was necessary, as I believe it is in the Highlands, for the purpose of averting what, if we are not wise in time, may ultimately develop into a serious national danger.

*MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, West): In one respect I disagree with the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Inverness (Mr. Findlay), but in the main I agree both with him and the hon. Member for Caithness in impressing on the Government the necessities of the present situation. I must, however, take objection to some remarks of the Lord Advocate. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said so far as the Government' was concerned, the land question might be considered closed. There was one expression which the Lord Advocate used which I hardly think could be fairly described in the words of the hon. Member for Inverness Burghs as kindly. It was the London door-step argument. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that the desire of the resolution of the Crofters of the Lews to stay on their holdings was very much like the resolution of the waifs and strays of the London streets to pass a night on a London door-step.

*THE LORD ADVOCATE: No; I did not say that or anything at all like it. What I said was not intended to convey, and did not convey anything at all invidious. What I said was that it is a mistake to assume that everyone is entitled to expect a livelihood by staying on the spot where he was born. I thought that if you applied that to anyone born in a town, the same reason would involve the son of a householder establishing himself on the doorstep and expecting to find occupation coming to him there. I need hardly say to the hon. Gentleman that, having most valued friends of mine among the Highlanders, I have not the smallest intention to compare them either with waifs or strays, or even to those like myself, who live in towns.

*MR. BUCHANAN: I beg the right hon. and learned Gentleman's pardon, but I am in the recollection of the House. In the statement he made there was nothing about the son of the occupier establishing himself on the doorstep. I am sure that the bulk of those who listened to the Lord Advocate will feel that he drew an analogy between the desire or the resolution of the crofters or the cottars in the Lews to remain in their holdings to the resolution or desire of men to pass nights on London door-steps.

*THE LORD ADVOCATE: No, Sir; I said nothing whatever of the kind.

*MR. BUCHANAN: I am glad that the right hon. and learned Gentleman now disclaims—

*THE LORD ADVOCATE: I never said anything of the kind. I repudiate the interpretation which the hon. Gentleman himself unfairly endeavours to fasten upon me.

*MR. BUCHANAN: Perhaps the hon. and learned Gentleman will listen to the conclusion of my sentence. I was expressing my gratification that he has disclaimed the interpretation which I not alone certainly put on his words. Now let me say that during the last three years the Government have been urged again and again to take further legislative action as regards the land question: to do away with some of the defects which are acknowledged to exist in the Crofters Act, and to make it a more effective method of dealing with the land question in the Highlands. In 1887 and 1888 Amendments were moved to the Address in terms somewhat similar to that we are now discussing. We have had adjournments of the House moved in the two last Sessions upon the same subjects, but nothing has been done by the Government. One Amending Act of the Crofters Act was passed, but it was merely an Administrative Amendment. The Government cannot pretend that they are unaware of the legislative improvements wanted in the Act. For instance, it is very necessary to leaseholders to receive the benefits of the Act. Then there is the question of the £30 limit, but above all there is the grievance resulting from the smallness of the holdings. A large portion of the Crofters Act of 1885 was devoted to the subject of providing extensions of holdings, but that part of the Act has been confessedly a dead letter. All that the Government seem to have done so far towards alleviating the present grave state of things in the Highlands, in so far as it relates to congestion of population, is to devise a scheme of emigration. I agree with what has been said by previous speakers—namely, that if you are to have a satisfactory scheme of emigration in the Highlands, and especially in a district like the Lews, you must accompany it by some well considered scheme of migration. I do not believe that we can hope to have a thoroughly satisfactory adjustment of the state of the Highlands until, by some process or another, land there can be better distributed, especially when it is found that large tracts of country are being put to most unprofitable purposes, such as deer forests. I beg to urge upon the Government as forcibly as I can, the great difficulty they will set up for themselves if they hug the delusion of giving relief and abating a condition which may result in the gravest consequences, ought to be done. Everyone who is interested in the Highlands must gratefully acknowledge the kindly and friendly terms in which the Lord Advocate referred to the state of things in the Western Highlands. I beg to urge upon the Government as forcibly as I can, the great difficulty they will set up for themselves if they hug the delusion to lend nine-tenths of the capital is a most liberal proposition. When I was among the crofters some two years ago I told them I did not think they could hopefully expect from the House of Commons any further grants in that direction. But there are indirect ways, more important than by loans for boats and nets, in which the Government have given some assistance already, and it is strongly urged upon them to give more, and that is in giving assistance for the construction of fishery harbours and means of communication. These stand on a different footing. As regards fishery harbours, the principle has been already conceded, and loans are already made, in connection with the Fishery Board for Scotland, for harbours. But the complaint is that these loans are made, if at all, for large harbours—harbours such as, in a certain sense, are commercial harbours—and where the rates are the security upon which the loans are raised; and that no assistance at all, practically speaking, is given for small works such as throwing out a little pier or breakwater, or something of that kind, for giving security to the small boats of fishermen, and very likely creating an industry where none now exists. Well, I am prepared to admit that though in such cases the security may be very doubtful, yet, having regard to the national interest involved, it would be a good, right, and proper policy for the Government to relax the rules, if necessary to alter the law to enable the Board to relax its rules and to give this small assistance. Very small sums would be required, a few hundreds or a few thousands, on different parts of the coast, to create purely fishing harbours. Well, then comes the much larger question of increasing the facilities for this industry by improving the means of communication; in other words, lending State assistance to the creation of main roads, or in the shape of railways or tramways—probably of light railways. Now, I can quite understand the way in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be inclined to look on a proposition of this kind, or rather, I should say, the way in which he would have been inclined to look on it a year or two years ago, because the principle upon which we have proceeded in the United Kingdom has been that these are questions to be left wholly to private enterprize; and so far as England is concerned, and so far as the greater part of Scotland is concerned, I believe that principle is an absolutely sound one; that more has been done in both countries than has been done even with Government assistance in any other country in the world, or than would have been done in England and Scotland if Government had not interfered. But there are parts of the United Kingdom—Ireland and parts of Scotland—in which from the conditions of the case, from the sparseness and the poverty of the population and the nature of the industry, it is absolutely impossible to have roads or railways at all unless the Government give assistance. I have pointed out before, in every other country in the world Government assistance has been found necessary, and I do not understand why, because the greater part of England and Scotland happens to be very richly and populously occupied, those poorer parts of the United Kingdom should be left without the assistance which they would have had from the Government of any other country under similar circumstances. The Government a year ago accepted the principle in regard to Ireland that some kind of Government assistance may properly be given in these exceptional cases, and I am perfectly certain that when we come to the test no argument which could be used with regard to the west coast of Ireland could not also be used with regard to the west coast of Scotland and the Highlands. If it is right to assist drainage or railway schemes in the West of Ireland, it is also right to assist similar schemes in the West of Scotland, and I confess I should be very glad if the Lord Advocate could see his way to take this into consideration. I admit it requires the greatest care, but at the same time I think the principle might be accepted, and when that is done, it will be only a question of time when it should be put into practical operation. I now come to the most important recommendation of the Commission. They pointed out what everybody admits, that the difficulty in the case of the crofter population consisted in the fact that it was so congested that the land was not able to supply subsistence without extraneous means, fisheries and others, which might possibly be stimulated or promoted by the Government. But, after all, the bulk of the population depends on the land, and the state of things is wholly exactly the same as in the West of Ireland. We might be discussing the position of the tenants of Donegal, the case is exactly the same. You might give them their land for nothing and they could not live upon it because of the quality of the soil and the quantity. Well, what is to be done? There are only two ways by which this difficulty can be met, the one by emigration, and the other by migration, or, in other words, by increasing the quantity of land available. When I was in Scotland, I saw crofters in almost every part of the district; they met me at cross roads, and I sometimes addressed 20 little meetings of 50 or 200 people in the course of a day, and in every case I ascertained the nature of their grievances and of their demands. They were always the same, and were often brought before me, in interesting and pathetic details, the difficulties of living, in view of the congested population; and their claim was that more land should be available for them in their own country. This was the claim universally and unanimously made. Then, naturally, I asked them, "If the land were placed at your disposal, would you be able to pay a fair rent fixed by a competent tribunal?" The answer, "Yes; we are not robbers; we do not want to steal the land." The next question was, "Are you able to stock it?" Then there was silence. It was not contested by the crofters themselves that in the vast majority of cases they would not be able to stock the land. Then I used to ask, "How are you to get over the difficulty?" The answer was, "We hope Parliament will lend money to enable us to stock it." My answer invariably was, "I am here to help you if I can, above all to learn your views, but I am not here to raise your hopes by giving my assent to what I believe an impracticable proposal." I told them on every occasion the House of Commons would be ill-advised to lend money to stock the farms; because that would be a great injustice to taxpayers in other parts of the country engaged in other enterprizes. When I had made clear my reasons why such a demand should be refused, it would sometimes be said, "If the State will not assist us to obtain stock, there are some of us—perhaps three or four, or a half a dozen out of fifty—who have the stock or could get money to buy it from friends if they had the land in their possession. At least they ought to be provided with the means of migration, and to that extent, at all events, congestion would be avoided." So I come, therefore, to what is really the practical point—though as regards the great majority it would be impossible for them to take advantage of the offer of more land—there is a certain proportion, perhaps not a very large one, which could take advantage of it, and I confess my view is in accordance with the recommendations of the Commission and the suggestion of the hon. Member for Inverness—that it would be desirable, under proper conditions, to comply with the demand for more land. Let me point out that the principle has been conceded by Parliament. The Crofters Act has a series of clauses providing that, on application being made, and proof submitted to the Commissioners that the applicant is able to stock the land, he may have more land on certain conditions. It is conceded by Parliament, and by everybody, that more land ought to be provided for them; but the conditions are such that only in a very few instances can a successful application be made. What are the conditions? One is that the land must be contiguous to the existing holdings, and the other, that it must be on the same estate as the present holding of the tenant making the application. But that is most unfair to the landlord, putting aside its practical effect upon the tenant. It so happens that there are in the Highlands and Islands landlords who have never taken any part in the clearances of the crofter population, who have recognised the difficulties of their poor tenants, have allowed them to become involved in considerable obligations, and yet, out of a feeling of sympathy, have allowed the crofters to remain on the land where their families had been for generations. Therefore, it is upon the landlords who had a larger proportion of crofters than others that this burden of providing additional portions of land would fall, whereas the landlord who, on a neighbouring estate, had, by common consent, behaved with great stringency, would escape the burden. This condition is not only a hardship upon the good landlord, but it practically renders the operation of the Act impossible, because there is no suitable land contiguous and on the same estate. Now why should not the operation of the Act be extended? What is there to prevent the Land Commission from being empowered to say to a crofter township, "Here is land sufficient to accommodate 10 out of 20 crofters. We are ready to make it available"? The crowded land would thus be relieved by the transfer of crofters to another estate, and if on an island perhaps to the mainland. It seems to me that the operation of the Act is most disadvantageously limited by this condition, which makes it necessary that the land offered be contiguous to the existing holding. There are other conditions, but I have said enough to show that the principle accepted as desirable has been frustrated in its application by the conditions. I should like to hear from the Government that they are willing to take this into consideration; and, if they find, as they must find—that this is the case, that they will extend their proposal, and, at all events, make their emigration clauses a reality instead of a sham, as they are at present. Having said that, I say further, that I went into this question with a prejudice against emigration, sympathizing strongly with the desire of the people to remain in their own country, amid their old associations; but having studied the question, I have come to the conclusion that real relief is impossible without a large scheme of emigration. At the same time, I say that such schemes would be assisted by one of migration. Those who form the great majority, and who cannot migrate, would emigrate. Still, I admit that the Government would be very wrong to proceed otherwise than tentatively with a scheme of emigration. Previous schemes of emigration have failed, and the word is a reproach in the Highlands. Many landlords in the past emigrated their tenants, and, though in many cases animated with the best feelings, they sent them abroad under such circumstances as to cause many of the emigrants to undergo great sufferings and privations in their new homes. The news of these failures has come back, and ever since emigration has been unfavourably viewed. The Government, therefore, would be wrong to encourage emigration without following the emigrants up, and seeing that experiments of this kind are made under circumstances that render it almost certain that they will be successful. But I think it is a good thing. They have commenced the experiment, they are trying it, and I hope they will carry it a great deal further. It has been said by one hon. Member that he does not see why the taxpayers of the country should be involved in a scheme of this kind. Well, I do not agree with him. I do not believe that a wise scheme of emigration carefully carried out will really involve the taxpayer in any very serious loss. I believe that there will be less loss in connection with a well devised scheme of this sort than in connection with any other scheme in which the aid of the State is at the present time required. But at the same time I will say that this is one of those cases where a deserving part of the population is brought to a condition of misery through no fault of their own, and the rest of the population must come to their aid. I regard this question as very serious. I know the pressure there is to induce the Government to leave things alone, and do nothing until this becomes a burning question; but I have seen enough to convince me that there is a sore which if not cured, will spread. Where there is, as in the Highlands, a basis of wrong, we cannot tell how far it will spread. Let us bear in mind the history of Ireland. Agitation in Ireland has sprung out of a real grievance—a real agrarian grievance. In the Highlands and Islands of Scotland there is a real agrarian grievance—misery almost amounting to starvation on the part of a most deserving population—and unless some remedy is found I will predict serious trouble for the Government and this House.

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I think it cannot be denied that the debate has been most interesting on this important question. It has, perhaps, been prolonged more than we expected, but the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for

West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) has fully justified that prolongation. I admit that this is a very serious question, but I cannot admit that there is a basis of wrong underlying it. The state of things is the result of modern civilization—the result of the progress which has been made during the past few years in bringing the United Kingdom into close communication with the whole world, and the resources of the Highlands being thus brought into competition with those of other parts of the world. Scotland with a less productive soil and a less genial climate has to compete against lands which can be made productive at much less cost of labour and capital. There is a demand that there should be land for the unfortunate cottars and crofters in Scotland. We sympathize with the demand most thoroughly and most heartily. We sympathize with the desire the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham has given expression to—the desire of the cottars to continue to live on the land where their forefathers have lived before them. But the forces of Nature have to be faced, and we must all accommodate ourselves to the conditions of the time. I am quite willing to express my sympathy for the distress and my desire to alleviate that distress, but I think the Government would be to blame if we had referred to such sympathy with the distress without also indicating the methods by which we proposed to alleviate it. Our responsibility would have been great, for it would have raised expectations which it would not have been possible for us in the House of Commons to realise. The Amendment now before the House is practically a Vote of Censure on Her Majesty's Government for not having proposed legislation in the Queen's Speech. It must be borne in mind, however, that the Crofter Commission is absolutely independent of Her Majesty's Government. We have no power nor right, nor is it a part of our duty, to dictate to them how they should discharge the duties imposed upon them by the Act of 1886, and it should be remembered that the Commissioners are not our appointees, but were appointed by the Government that preceded us. If they have failed to make certain recommendations for the benefit of the crofters, it must be either because an application has not been made to them by the crofters for the extension of their holdings, or else because the Commissioners have felt that a more pressing duty for them to discharge was that of revising rents and making arrangements in regard to arrears. But however that may be, we have had no part whatever in the administration of the Crofters Act. That duty has rested upon the Commissioners, who have received all the assistance which the Government could give them in the discharge of their duties. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham has spoken of migration and of emigration. I have often heard migration proposed in this House, though I have never seen in print any proposal which has taken a practical shape with regard to migration within the United Kingdom. For my own part I am in such a complete accord with the principle which is recognized in migration—namely, the recognition of those home-loving sentiments which belong to the people of this country and of Scotland—that, if a practical scheme were put before me which was not demoralizing in itself, I should give it my cordial approval. No scheme has yet been submitted to Parliament, or to persons outside Parliament, that would gain acceptance by a considerable number of persons who really understand the question. If any one were to put before the House and the country a scheme by which migration could be carried out without confiscation, I am convinced that Parliament would consider the plan with every desire to give effect to it, and to do justice to all concerned. There are many exceedingly well-disposed persons in this country as well as in Scotland who would gladly aid in carrying out a plan presented in a practical form. Land, I am sorry to say, can be had in almost any quantity in Scotland as well as in England, and with some of this the experiment could be tried if hon. Gentlemen who believe in the principles they advance would put the proposal into practical shape. I do not suppose that any one desires that crofters should pay less than the real reasonable value of the land; and if that is so, I am sure there are plenty of liberal people in the country who would be ready to assist in making this experiment. Allusions have been made by the hon. Member for Caithness (Dr. Clarke) as to the conditions under which Votes have been supplied by the Government, and as to the extent to which the Treasury has gone. The Government are bound, I think, not to act upon a mere sentimental or generous view of its responsibilities, but they are bound to rely upon those who are responsible for the return of the money advanced. I cannot say whether the distribution of the Vote to which the hon. Member referred was right or wrong, but we must trust to the Fishery Board to administer it fairly and properly, as I believe they have done. I agree that we ought to endeavour to do everything in our power to improve communications and to afford facilities for the fishing industries. But there is one condition which I should wish to make. We ought not to make loans as mere shams. If we make a loan it should be made to some authority which is capable of returning, and certain to return, the money at some time or other. The Government are fully sensible of the circumstances. We know that, although the population is comparatively a small one, it is one which deserves the utmost sympathy and consideration on the part of the Government. Whether we have failed or succeeded in the colonization which we have attempted, and which is going forward again in the spring, must remain to be seen; but I think we should be extremely to blame if we ventured on a large scheme of this kind without trying whether the proposals are likely to be successful or not. I regret that it should become necessary for any of us to leave these shores. There is hardly a Member in this House, hardly a Scotchman in the House, who has not felt it necessary to leave his home, and it is not for us to advise any man to remain for ever on the hearthstone on which he was bred, or to trust for his livelihood solely to the place in which he was born. We have endeavoured to do what we can for these crofters to meet the distress to which they have been subject, but we think it better to proceed with care and consideration in the matter rather than to attempt great and heroic steps which might tend to their misfortune rather than to their advantage.

Question put,

"That the words 'Humbly to express to Your Majesty our regret that, whilst reference is made in Your Most Gracious Speech to our early attention being asked to measures for developing the material resources of Ireland, no reference is made to the distress which prevails in many parts of the Highlands and Islands of Scotland, nor to any measures for removing or alleviating said distress, or of developing the material resources of said Highlands and Islands' be there inserted."

The House divided: — Ayes 96; Noes 160: Majority 64. — (Division List No. 2).

Question again proposed.

Debate arising.

It being after midnight, the Debate stood adjourned.

House adjourned at ten minutes after twelve o'clock.

QUESTIONS.

THE NORTHERN ROMAN WALL.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, South) (for Sir JOHN LUBBOCK, London University): I wish to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether it is true that the North British Railway Company have obtained powers enabling them to destroy some of the small remaining portion of the North Roman Wall or vallum; and whether any steps are being taken to place it under the protection of the Ancient Monuments Act?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET, Dublin University): I am informed that the North British Railway Company have acquired some ground in the neighbourhood of

~~Is DINGEAME TEAM:~~

Q. Now, Sir, the Secretary of State for the Home Department, the Police Commissioner, and especially the Police Commissioner of London, are instructed by their superiors, or allowed by their superiors, to act as gamekeepers on the estate of Sir John sitting Maxwell, baronet, of London, and to apprehend and take the names of persons trespassing in pursuit of game, and to examine witnesses and prepare statements for Sir John's solicitors, for the purpose of prosecuting persons who trespass in pursuit of game on Sir John's estates; and, if so, under what Act of Parliament or other authority the above course is allowed?

MR. ROBERTSON: This matter was referred to me, and, on making inquiries, I am informed by the Chief Constable that the Benfireweire Constabulary are not allowed to act as gamekeepers in any part of the county, nor are they instructed or allowed to prepare statements for solicitors. If the hon. Member, in putting this Question, has any special case in view, I shall be glad, on his furnishing me with particulars, to make further inquiries regarding it.

SAFETY ARRANGEMENTS ON RAILWAYS.

Mr. CHANNING (Northampton, E.) asked the President of the Board of Trade when he proposes to bring in a Bill to deal with the several points of safety arrangements on Railways, and Returns of overtime work, on which he undertook on the 8th of May last to legislate?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, Bristol, W.): In the debate on the date referred to by the hon. Member, I said that I would endeavour at the earliest opportunity I could find to ask Parliament to deal with questions of public safety in the working of Railways. But I was not able then to fix any time for doing so—other subjects must have precedence of this. On some points, especially in the matter of couplings, further information is necessary before I could undertake to lay a Bill on the Table of the House. As regards overtime, the Returns called for are in an advanced state of preparation, and I hope will be shortly presented. Until they have been considered, I do not think it is desirable to decide what is to be done as to future Returns, which, it is to be observed, we can call for without further legislation.

MR. CHANNING: I beg to give notice that I will draw attention to this subject on the Vote for the Board of Trade.

RAILWAY STATISTICS.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.) asked the President of the Board of Trade whether the Board of Trade have as yet made any orders on Railway Companies, under section 32 of "The Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888," requiring them to furnish additional statistics in their Returns to the Board of Trade; and, if so, on what subjects such statistics have been ordered?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS-BEACH, Bristol, W.): The Railway Companies have been very much occupied in regard to the schedules of classification and maximum rates to be prepared under the Act of last Session, and the Board of Trade have not at present called for any additional Returns under that Act. I undertook, however, in reply to a Question from the hon. Member in December last, to deal with Returns as to couplings early this year. The matter has been under my attention, and I shall be glad to confer with the hon. Member as to the most desirable form to be adopted.

FAIR RENTS IN TYRONE.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, South) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland "whether applications to have fair rents fixed in the division of South Tyrone have been listed since 1887 without being heard; and, if he can say when the Commission will sit at Dungannon and Ologher for the purpose of hearing such cases?"

*THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, East): The Land Commissioners inform me that the cases in the Unions of Dungannon and Ologher received up to the 26th and 10th of October, 1887, respectively, have been listed for hearing. A list has just been issued for the Unions of Omagh, Irvinestown, and Enniskillen. The Commissioners are not at present in a position to say what Union will be taken up when that list is finished.

THE ESTATE OF THE LORD LIEUTENANT.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, South) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, with reference to the eviction of the tenant Barr on the estate of the Lord Lieutenant, near Newtownards, whether he is aware that the eviction was carried out under the superintendence of his agent, Mr. Brownlow, J.P., at seven o'clock at night; whether Barr (nursing an infant) and five children were carried out and left in the snow; whether his sick wife was carried out and left lying on some straw in the snow, and all were afterwards placed in the workhouse cart and removed to the workhouse at Newtownards; whether, on the following day, Mr. Brownlow, J.P., procured some dynamite from a road contractor, and having unroofed Barr's house, then destroyed the walls with dynamite; whether this house had been built by the tenant, and without any contribution from the landlord; whether the tenant had offered to the agent £34 on the day on which the agent had agreed to accept £10 in satisfaction of all rent due, and also promised to pay the balance in a few days; whether a few days subsequently Barr offered the full amount agreed upon, but the agent refused to accept same unless Barr would sell the farm and give up his home;

selecting proper swords for British troops; and what is the official title of the officer so responsible, and is he the same official who, in addition to the Adjutant General, signed the Report recently presented to Parliament?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): My military advisers do not accept the Report of the Board of Officers. My answer to the second, third, fourth, and fifth Questions is "Yes." In answer to the sixth Question, the new pattern and the new tests have not yet been decided upon. In answer to the seventh and eighth Questions, the Committee must be regarded as responsible for the pattern and the tests to be applied. But, their recommendation having been approved, the Director of Artillery is responsible that the pattern is adhered to, and that no sword is passed into the service which has failed to pass the tests.

In further answer to Mr. HANBURY,

MR. E. STANHOPE said: The contract price of cavalry swords of the 1885 pattern was with Solingen (which made 20,000 swords) 20s., and with Birmingham (where 7,500 were made) 24s. The price of the swords of cavalry officers varies, I am informed, from £2 12s. 6d. to £7. My answer to the fourth Question is in the affirmative.

THE ALLOTMENTS ACT, 1887.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby) asked the President of the Local Government Board whether, as the period has expired during which sanitary authorities can make application for Provisional Orders to acquire land compulsorily for allotments under "The Allotments Act, 1887," he can state how many of such applications have been made, and the names of the sanitary authorities making them?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I have received two such applications, one from the Wayland Rural Sanitary Authority, and the other from the Shipston-on-Stour Rural Sanitary Authority.

TELEGRAPHIC MONEY ORDERS.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury) asked the Postmaster General if there is likely to be much further delay in introducing into this country the telegraphic money order system which has been adopted on the Continent and in the Australian Colonies?

MR. RAIKES: In reply to the hon. Member, I am glad to be able to state that I hope very shortly to announce to the House the date on and from which telegraphic money orders will be introduced by way of experiment in this country.

POSTAGE TO INDIA OF ENGLISH NEWSPAPERS FROM FRANCE.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury) asked the Postmaster General whether the practice of sending from England newspapers for India and China to be posted in France is legal; and on what figures the calculation that the Revenue does not suffer from the practice is based?

MR. RAIKES: As the Post Office has no monopoly in the conveyance of newspapers, the practice alluded to by the hon. Member is perfectly legal. To show the hon. Member how it is that the British Revenue does not suffer by the practice, I may state that, for a 4-oz. newspaper posted here for India, the postage prepaid by the sender is 1½d., out of which ½d. goes to France and Italy for the special transit across those countries, and ½d. is credited to India towards the cost of the Inland Service there, so that only ½d. remains towards the expenses of collection, sorting, stamping, and conveyance to Dover, not to mention the sea conveyance from Brindisi to Bombay. If the same newspaper were posted in France, it would cost us absolutely nothing, while we should receive from France for the sea conveyance ½d.

THE MILITIA.

VISCOUNT BARING (Bedfordshire, Biggleswade) asked the Secretary of State for War whether it is true that the Militia is at present about 22,000 men under its establishment; and whether any steps are being taken to complete the force to its proper strength?

MR. E. STANHOPE: It is true that by the latest Returns the Militia was more than 20,000 men below its establishment. The reward for a Militia recruit has, therefore, been raised from 1s. 6d. to 2s. 6d., and I am glad to say the results have so far been satisfactory. The effective strength of the Militia was raised by 1,687 men in January, and the increase continued during February.

THE SPECIAL COMMISSION.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether it is a fact that Mr. Robert Anderson, of Scotland Yard, in January last, at his private residence in Linden Gardens, handed to a Times witness calling himself Le Caron (who described himself as a military spy, and whose real name was Beach), a number of confidential documents, forming part of a correspondence which had come into Mr. Anderson's possession in his official capacity; whether it is a fact that Mr. Anderson at the same time, voluntarily and unasked, gave Le Caron a letter of introduction to Houston, who was assisting the Solicitor to the Times in obtaining evidence, and said that Houston was a gentleman upon whom Le Caron could rely implicitly, and that Houston had been selected as representing the interests of the prosecution; whether it is a fact that Mr. Anderson at the time he handed the documents to Le Caron said that he had chosen or culled from the correspondence what he thought Le Caron would need in the case; whether it is a fact that the documents were allowed to remain for a considerable time in the custody of Houston at his rooms in Cork Street; whether he was aware that Le Caron swore before the Special Commission to the truth of the facts named in this Question, and, further, that he had never heard Houston's name until it was mentioned to him by Mr. Anderson, and that, in giving the introduction to Houston, he understood Mr. Anderson to mean that Houston was a gentleman whom the Times could trust; whether he has ascertained from Mr. Anderson if Le Caron's evidence is in these respects true; and, if true, what action he will take in the matter; and whether, if Mr. Anderson stated that the evidence was false, the Government will prosecute Le Caron for perjury?

MR. JOHN ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe), had also given notice—

“To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, whether, as he has admitted that the handing over by Mr. Robert Anderson of

confidential papers in his possession in his official capacity to a man calling himself Le Caron (a witness for the Times newspaper), to be taken away and used by Le Caron and Houston, was done without the knowledge or authority of the Secretary of State and not by order of the Special Commission, he proposes to take any action with respect to this conduct of a person holding such a position as that of Assistant Commissioner of Police.”

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, East): I will answer the Question of the hon. Member for Rugby and that of the hon. Member for the Rushcliffe Division (Mr. John Ellis) on the same subject at the same time. I have already, in an answer to the right hon. Member for Derby, stated that Mr. Anderson will be called as a witness before the Special Commission, and he can then be cross-examined as to his action in regard to Le Caron and as to the character of the documents he handed to Le Caron. I must decline to anticipate Mr. Anderson's evidence by answers in this House, or to express any opinion as to the truth of Le Caron's evidence while the Commission is still sitting. Nor can I, with respect to Mr. Anderson, add anything to what I stated in the House on March 1.

MR. COBB: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman if he has ascertained from Mr. Anderson whether Le Caron's evidence is true or false?

MR. MATTHEWS: That is exactly the Question which I must decline to answer.

MR. JOHN ELLIS: My Question does not relate to anything that Le Caron said. I wish to ask whether the right hon. Gentleman, having admitted in the House that these things were done, does not think it necessary to have a special investigation into the matter?

MR. MATTHEWS: I shall wait the result of the examination of Mr. Anderson before the Special Commission before I take any action.

MR. SEXTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman guarantee that Mr. Anderson will be examined before the Commission?

No answer was given to this Question.

MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether it is true that Mr. Andrews, the Governor of Downpatrick Prison, attempted to influence P. W. Nally to give evidence in support

This arrangement is being actively carried out by the contractors, and the greater portion of the vehicles—if not all—have now been fitted. Previous contracts for the Service did not provide for lighting the vehicles, but in the contracts which I have lately entered into I reserved the power which I have now exercised of calling on the contractors to provide lamps.

DETECTIVES IN THE LOBBY.

MR. W. A. MACDONALD (Queen's Co., Ossory): I wish to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, whether it is true, as stated in the Star newspaper on Saturday, that a large number of detectives were stationed in the Outer Lobby of this House on Friday night; if so, by whose authority they were placed there and with what object?

MR. MATTHEWS: No, Sir. I am informed by the Commissioner of Police that this statement is untrue.

MR. W. A. MACDONALD: Does the right hon. Gentleman assert that there were no detectives in the Lobby on Friday night?

MR. MATTHEWS: I submitted the hon. Member's Question—namely, whether a certain statement was true—to the Commissioner of Police, and the answer is that it is untrue.

WALES AND THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT ACT.

MR. THOMAS ELLIS (Merionethshire): I beg, Sir, to ask the President of the Local Government Board when the Welsh version of the Local Government Act, 1888, will be published; also whether his attention has been directed to the published opinion of the Attorney General that the proceedings of the Welsh County Councils must be carried on and recorded in the English language; whether he is aware that the section of the Statute on which this opinion is based enacts that no person or persons that use the Welsh language shall have or enjoy any manner of office or fees within Wales upon pain of forfeiting the same offices or fees unless he or they exercise the English language; and whether he intends to enforce the provisions of this Statute?

*MR. RITCHIE: The whole of the translation of the Local Government

Act into Welsh has been completed; but there has been some difficulty in the printing. I am unable to say precisely when the translation will be issued, but I will press it on as rapidly as possible. My attention has not been drawn to an opinion of the Attorney General to the effect that the proceedings of the Welsh County Councils must be carried on and recorded in English. But I am aware that there is a section in the 27th Henry VIII., cap. 26, which contains a provision to the effect that no person or persons that use the Welsh language should have or enjoy any manner of office or fees within Wales upon pain of forfeiting the same offices or fees, unless he or they exercised the English language. I am not at present aware of any case in which it would be necessary for me to exercise any power I may possess in this matter. If any case is brought under my notice, I must, of course, consider all the circumstances of it.

MR. THOMAS ELLIS: Will the Attorney General state whether in his opinion offices under the Local Government Act would be forfeited?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: No difficulty has arisen in Wales on similar matters, but at the same time no legal question has been raised.

MR. J. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): In view of the forthcoming Local Government Bill for Scotland, will the right hon. Gentleman arrange that it shall be translated into Gaelic?

The Question was not answered.

MARGARINE.

MR. BOND (Dorset, E.): I have to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether a memorial has been forwarded to him from the Court of Quarter Sessions of Dorsetshire, representing that the Margarine Act is being evaded; and what course Her Majesty's Government intend to take in the matter?

MR. MATTHEWS: I understand that a memorial has been received, but no decision has yet been come to with regard to the matter.

CAPTAIN WISSMANN.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I beg to ask the

Mr. Raikes

Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been called to a telegram, through Reuter's Agency, dated Alexandria, 25th February, which states that "Captain Wissmann has arrived here on his way to Zanzibar. He proceeds to-night to Cairo, where he will probably recruit a force of some hundred blacks;" and whether the consent of the Egyptian Government has been obtained for the enlistment of its subjects?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: Her Majesty's Government are aware of the project of Captain Wissmann, of the German Army. Sir Evelyn Baring has reported his arrival at Cairo, and has stated that his proceedings have not received any official sanction; but that the Egyptian Government do not propose to put any obstacles in the way of his endeavouring to obtain by purely voluntary enlistment a few blacks for service in a police force. He adds that there are a good many blacks at Cairo, emigrants from the Soudan, and others, who are out of work, and who will be benefited if employment can be obtained for them.

CAPE COLONY PRISONS.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether any steps whatever have been taken by the Colonial Authorities since August last to remedy the wretched state shown by the Report on the Penal Establishments in Cape Colony to then exist in the Colonial prisons; whether the evils reported on have been known to the Government for more than two years; whether any representations have been made to the Colonial Authorities by the Secretary of State; and, if he will lay upon the Table the Report on this subject made by the Committee on Convicts and Gaols appointed by the Cape Town Parliament?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. DE WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): I informed the House on the 26th ult. that the Cape Government had taken immediate steps by legislation to remedy the condition of the Colonial Prisons. The Secretary of State is not aware how long the evils reported upon have been known to the Colonial Government; they were not known to Her Majesty's Government until the Report disclosed them. No representations by the Colonial Authorities have been made to the Secretary of State. It is not the duty of the Secretary of State to supervise the internal administration of a colony under responsible government. It would not be right to publish the Report here without a statement of what has been in pursuance of it.

MR. BRADLAUGH: On the Colonial Vote I will call attention to the fact that no steps whatever have been taken to remedy the evils complained of.

THE SALVATION ARMY.

MR. COGHILL (Newcastle-under-Lyme): I wish to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, whether, when during the last five years officers and members of the Salvation Army have been sentenced in England to terms of imprisonment, they have been subjected to the ordinary prison discipline and to the ordinary prison rules; and, whether, during their imprisonment, they have had to clean out their cells and to wear prison dress in common with other prisoners, and to take exercise with other prisoners.

MR. MATTHEWS: The answer to both paragraphs of the hon. Member's Question is in the affirmative.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he does not consider that a disgraceful fact?

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order.

IRELAND—THOMAS TRACY.

MR. M'CARTAN: I wish to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, with reference to the treatment of the bail prisoner Tracy, recently removed from Belfast to Millbank Prison, whether he can now say if the prison authorities supply dinners of joint, dessert, and beer or porter, to bail prisoners in Ireland; and, if not, whether such dinners were supplied at the expense of the proprietor of the Times to Tracy during his imprisonment at Belfast, or by whom these dinners were supplied to him there; whether he will state by whom the Freeman's Journal, containing reports of the proceedings at the Special Commission, was supplied to Tracy daily at Belfast Gaol; and, whether the Prisons Board, while selecting proper swords for British troops; and what is the official title of the officer so responsible, and is he the same official who, in addition to the Adjutant General, signed the Report recently presented to Parliament?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): My military advisers do not accept the Report of the Board of Officers. My answer to the second, third, fourth, and fifth Questions is "Yes." In answer to the sixth Question, the new pattern and the new tests have not yet been decided upon. In answer to the seventh and eighth Questions, the Committee must be regarded as responsible for the pattern and the tests to be applied. But, their recommendation having been approved, the Director of Artillery is responsible that the pattern is adhered to, and that no sword is passed into the service which has failed to pass the tests.

In further answer to Mr. HANBURY,

Mr. E. STANHOPE said: The contract price of cavalry swords of the 1885 pattern was with Solingen (which made 20,000 swords) 20s., and with Birmingham (where 7,500 were made) 24s. The price of the swords of cavalry officers varies, I am informed, from £2 12s. 6d. to £7. My answer to the fourth Question is in the affirmative.

THE ALLOTMENTS ACT, 1887.

Mr. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby) asked the President of the Local Government Board whether, as the period has expired during which sanitary authorities can make application for Provisional Orders to acquire land compulsorily for allotments under "The Allotments Act, 1887," he can state how many of such applications have been made, and the names of the sanitary authorities making them?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I have received two such applications, one from the Wayland Rural Sanitary Authority, and the other from the Shipston-on-Stour Rural Sanitary Authority.

TELEGRAPHIC MONEY ORDERS.

Mr. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury) asked the Postmaster General if there is likely to be much further delay in introducing into this country the telegraphic money order system which has been adopted on the Continent and in the Australian Colonies?

Mr. RAIKES: In reply to the hon. Member, I am glad to be able to state that I hope very shortly to announce to the House the date on and from which telegraphic money orders will be introduced by way of experiment in this country.

POSTAGE TO INDIA OF ENGLISH NEWSPAPERS FROM FRANCE.

Mr. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury) asked the Postmaster General whether the practice of sending from England newspapers for India and China to be posted in France is legal; and on what figures the calculation that the Revenue does not suffer from the practice is based?

Mr. RAIKES: As the Post Office has no monopoly in the conveyance of newspapers, the practice alluded to by the hon. Member is perfectly legal. To show the hon. Member how it is that the British Revenue does not suffer by the practice, I may state that, for a 4-ox. newspaper posted here for India, the postage prepaid by the sender is 1½d., out of which ½d. goes to France and Italy for the special transit across those countries, and ½d. is credited to India towards the cost of the Inland Service there, so that only ½d. remains towards the expense of collection, sorting, stamping, and conveyance to Dover, not to mention the sea conveyance from Brindisi to Bombay. If the same newspaper were posted in France, it would cost us absolutely nothing, while we should receive from France for the sea conveyance ½d.

THE MILITIA.

VISCOUNT BARING (Bedfordshire, Biggleswade) asked the Secretary of State for War whether it is true that the Militia is at present about 22,000 men under its establishment; and whether any steps are being taken to complete the force to its proper strength?

Mr. E. STANHOPE: It is true that by the latest Returns the Militia was more than 20,000 men below its establishment. The reward for a Militia recruit has, therefore, been raised from 1s. 6d. to 2s. 6d., and I am glad to say the results have so far been satisfactory. The effective strength of the Militia was raised by 1,687 men in January, and the increase continued during February.

THE SPECIAL COMMISSION.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether it is a fact that Mr. Robert Anderson, of Scotland Yard, in January last, at his private residence in Linden Gardens, handed to a Times witness calling himself Le Caron (who described himself as a military spy, and whose real name was Beach), a number of confidential documents, forming part of a correspondence which had come into Mr. Anderson's possession in his official capacity; whether it is a fact that Mr. Anderson at the same time, voluntarily and unasked, gave Le Caron a letter of introduction to Houston, who was assisting the Solicitor to the Times in obtaining evidence, and said that Houston was a gentleman upon whom Le Caron could rely implicitly, and that Houston had been selected as representing the interests of the prosecution; whether it is a fact that Mr. Anderson at the time he handed the documents to Le Caron said that he had chosen or culled from the correspondence what he thought Le Caron would need in the case; whether it is a fact that the documents were allowed to remain for a considerable time in the custody of Houston at his rooms in Cork Street; whether he was aware that Le Caron swore before the Special Commission to the truth of the facts named in this Question, and, further, that he had never heard Houston's name until it was mentioned to him by Mr. Anderson, and that, in giving the introduction to Houston, he understood Mr. Anderson to mean that Houston was a gentleman whom the Times could trust; whether he has ascertained from Mr. Anderson if Le Caron's evidence is in these respects true; and, if true, what action he will take in the matter; and whether, if Mr. Anderson stated that the evidence was false, the Government will prosecute Le Caron for perjury?

MR. JOHN ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe), had also given notice—

confidential papers in his possession in his official capacity to a man calling himself Le Caron (a witness for the Times newspaper), to be taken away and used by Le Caron and Houston, was done without the knowledge or authority of the Secretary of State and not by order of the Special Commission, he proposes to take any action with respect to this conduct of a person holding such a position as that of Assistant Commissioner of Police.”

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, East): I will answer the Question of the hon. Member for Rugby and that of the hon. Member for the Rushcliffe Division (Mr. John Ellis) on the same subject at the same time. I have already, in an answer to the right hon. Member for Derby, stated that Mr. Anderson will be called as a witness before the Special Commission, and he can then be cross-examined as to his action in regard to Le Caron and as to the character of the documents he handed to Le Caron. I must decline to anticipate Mr. Anderson's evidence by answers in this House, or to express any opinion as to the truth of Le Caron's evidence while the Commission is still sitting. Nor can I, with respect to Mr. Anderson, add anything to what I stated in the House on March 1.

MR. COBB: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman if he has ascertained from Mr. Anderson whether Le Caron's evidence is true or false?

MR. MATTHEWS: That is exactly the Question which I must decline to answer.

MR. JOHN ELLIS: My Question does not relate to anything that Le Caron said. I wish to ask whether the right hon. Gentleman, having admitted in the House that these things were done, does not think it necessary to have a special investigation into the matter?

MR. MATTHEWS: I shall wait the result of the examination of Mr. Anderson before the Special Commission before I take any action.

MR. SEXTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman guarantee that Mr. Anderson will be examined before the Commission?

No answer was given to this Question.

MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether it is true that Mr. Andrews, the Governor of Downpatrick Prison, attempted to influence P. W. Nally to give evidence in support of the charges and allegations of the Times; whether an agent of the Times visited Nally in Millbank Prison without Nally's invitation and contrary to his wishes; whether the agent of the Times represented himself to the prison authorities as the friend of Nally; and, if not, then on what ground he was admitted; whether the agent of the Times produced a letter, purporting to be written by John W. Nally, the prisoner's brother, recommending the prisoner to accede to the wishes of the agent of the Times; and whether the interview took place in the presence and in the hearing of a warder?

MR. MATTHEWS: Will the right hon. Gentleman be good enough to put the first paragraph of this Question to the representative of the Irish Government, whom it concerns? As to the last paragraph, I have to say that Nally was visited in Millbank by Mr. Thompson as the representative of Mr. Soames, who made the application for leave to visit. The visit was not in consequence of any invitation by Nally, who expressed no wish one way or another. Mr. Thompson did not represent himself as a friend of Nally's. He was admitted as a representative of Mr. Soames. No letter was produced of the kind specified, or of any kind. The interview took place in the view but not in the hearing of the warder.

MR. J. MORLEY: I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the alleged letter of Nally's brother was produced to the prisoner with a view of inducing him to give certain evidence?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have no information on that point.

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I should like to know whether it is the practice, under the rule allowing a prisoner to have visitors at stated times, to send in persons under the name of visitors who are the agents of solicitors without a request from the prisoner?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am informed that it is the practice of the Prison Commissioners to allow solicitors who desire to see prisoners on business to pay a visit independently of the visits paid under the ordinary prison rules.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Does the right hon. Gentleman mean the solicitor to the prisoner or a hostile solicitor?

Mr. J. Morley

MR. MATTHEWS: A solicitor who represents that he desires to see the prisoner on business.

MR. J. MORLEY: Are we to understand that that rule applies where the prisoner himself expresses an objection to receiving visitors, as in this case?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am informed that in this case the prisoner did not express objection to receive the visit.

MR. J. MORLEY: May I ask whether the prisoner did not object to a repetition of the visit?

MR. MATTHEWS: I must ask for notice of that Question. My information is that Nally expressed no wish either one way or the other.

MR. J. MORLEY: I will now put to the Chief Secretary the first paragraph of the Question.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I was on my way to the House when my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary asked me to answer it. I am making inquiry, and I shall be glad to answer when I can.

MR. SEXTON: I desire to ascertain whether Nally had any opportunity of expressing a wish one way or the other? Was he informed of the visit in advance?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have given the House all the information in my possession. If further information is desired, I will make inquiry.

MR. J. F. X. O'BRIEN (Mayo, S.): Since this agent of the Times was permitted to visit Nally, may I ask why a friend of Nally's was refused permission to visit him, on the ground that he (Nally) had forfeited his right to visits on account of misconduct, though Nally assured me that he had never been once reported during the whole time of his incarceration?

MR. MATTHEWS: Perhaps the hon. Member will put that Question on the Paper.

MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, North): Are we to understand that any solicitor who states that he has got business with a prisoner will be admitted at once by the Governor to see him?

MR. MATTHEWS: The ordinary practice of the Prison Commissioners is to admit a solicitor, or his representative, who says he has business with a prisoner, to see him.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I think we should understand this clearly. Is it sufficient for any solicitor to present himself at any prison, and state that he desires to see a prisoner on business, to entitle him to admission?

MR. MATTHEWS: He must have first asked for and obtained the permission of the Prison Commissioners.

PUBLIC MEETINGS ON THE THAMES EMBANKMENT.

SIR CHARLES RUSSELL (Hackney, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether it is true that Mr. H. W. Lees informed Mr. Munro twice by letter of the intention to hold a meeting on Sunday near Cleopatra's Needle on the Embankment, and that Mr. Munro gave no reply, and did not intimate to Mr. Lees his intention to prevent such meeting; whether such meeting was in fact forcibly prevented; and, if so, on what ground and upon whose authority; whether it is true that Mr. Hyndman arranged with a Police Superintendent that the meeting should instead be held near the Achilles Statue in Hyde Park; and, whether such meeting was forcibly suppressed and several assaults committed by the police; and, if so, what is the justification (if any) of such proceedings?

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I wish also to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has now any information to give the House as to the dispersal of the meeting on the Embankment on Sunday?

MR. MATTHEWS: I will answer both Questions at the same time. The answer to the first paragraph is in the affirmative. The letters conveyed a notice that certain persons intended to hold a meeting in a public thoroughfare. The Commissioner did not consider it his duty to enter into any correspondence on the subject. The meeting was not forcibly prevented, as the persons assembled did not persist in holding the meeting after they were warned, but proceeded to Hyde Park. The Commissioner is not aware that any arrangement was entered into between Mr. Hyndman and any police superintendent as to meeting near the Achilles statue. A meeting was held at the statue and was not suppressed by the police. The meeting after a time showed a tendency to become disorderly, some stones were thrown at the police, and there was a danger of the crowd getting on to and injuring the statue, the chain round which was broken. Mr. Burns advised the crowd to meet at the Reformers' Tree, and the advice was followed. The Commissioner denies that assaults were committed by the police, who acted throughout with forbearance.

SIR C. RUSSELL: I wish to ask whether the right hon. Gentleman's attention has been called to the fact that in some of the public papers the numbers of the constables who committed the assaults have been given; and whether he has caused inquiry to be made into those facts?

MR. MATTHEWS: Yes, Sir; I have caused inquiries to be made, and I have given the hon. Gentleman the answer.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: Are the public to understand that they are not to be permitted to meet at Cleopatra's Needle, and whether this neighbourhood is to be looked upon as a prohibited area like Trafalgar Square?

MR. MATTHEWS: The public must understand that meetings in a public thoroughfare which cause an obstruction in that thoroughfare will not be permitted.

MR. GRAHAM: Then I ask whether the right hon. Gentleman was aware of the object of this particular meeting; that it had no political bias whatever, but was called simply to consider the condition of the starving poor in London?

MR. MATTHEWS: The object of the meeting can have no bearing whatever on the question, which is, whether the meeting obstructs the thoroughfare or not.

POST OFFICE VEHICLES.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK (Penryn and Falmouth): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether any steps have been taken to furnish vehicles used for the service of the General Post Office in London with lamps to be lighted when required; and if he will explain why a provision so necessary for the protection of the inhabitants of London has not been hitherto enforced?

MR. RAIKES: In reply to the hon. Member, I beg to say that I have arranged that all the vehicles employed in the Mail Cart Service in London shall carry lamps after dark.

This arrangement is being actively carried out by the contractors, and the greater portion of the vehicles—if not all—have now been fitted. Previous contracts for the Service did not provide for lighting the vehicles, but in the contracts which I have lately entered into I reserved the power which I have now exercised of calling on the contractors to provide lamps.

DETECTIVES IN THE LOBBY.

MR. W. A. MACDONALD (Queen's Co., Ossory): I wish to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, whether it is true, as stated in the Star newspaper on Saturday, that a large number of detectives were stationed in the Outer Lobby of this House on Friday night; if so, by whose authority they were placed there and with what object?

MR. MATTHEWS: No, Sir. I am informed by the Commissioner of Police that this statement is untrue.

MR. W. A. MACDONALD: Does the right hon. Gentleman assert that there were no detectives in the Lobby on Friday night?

MR. MATTHEWS: I submitted the hon. Member's Question—namely, whether a certain statement was true—to the Commissioner of Police, and the answer is that it is untrue.

WALES AND THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT ACT.

MR. THOMAS ELLIS (Merionethshire): I beg, Sir, to ask the President of the Local Government Board when the Welsh version of the Local Government Act, 1888, will be published; also whether his attention has been directed to the published opinion of the Attorney General that the proceedings of the Welsh County Councils must be carried on and recorded in the English language; whether he is aware that the section of the Statute on which this opinion is based enacts that no person or persons that use the Welsh language shall have or enjoy any manner of office or fees within Wales upon pain of forfeiting the same offices or fees unless he or they exercise the English language; and whether he intends to enforce the provisions of this Statute?

*MR. RITCHIE: The whole of the translation of the Local Government

Act into Welsh has been completed; but there has been some difficulty in the printing. I am unable to say precisely when the translation will be issued, but I will press it on as rapidly as possible. My attention has not been drawn to an opinion of the Attorney General to the effect that the proceedings of the Welsh County Councils must be carried on and recorded in English. But I am aware that there is a section in the 27th Henry VIII., cap. 26, which contains a provision to the effect that no person or persons that use the Welsh language should have or enjoy any manner of office or fees within Wales upon pain of forfeiting the same offices or fees, unless he or they exercised the English language. I am not at present aware of any case in which it would be necessary for me to exercise any power I may possess in this matter. If any case is brought under my notice, I must, of course, consider all the circumstances of it.

MR. THOMAS ELLIS: Will the Attorney General state whether in his opinion offices under the Local Government Act would be forfeited?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: No difficulty has arisen in Wales on similar matters, but at the same time no legal question has been raised.

MR. J. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): In view of the forthcoming Local Government Bill for Scotland, will the right hon. Gentleman arrange that it shall be translated into Gaelic?

The Question was not answered.

MARGARINE.

MR. BOND (Dorset, E.): I have to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether a memorial has been forwarded to him from the Court of Quarter Sessions of Dorsetshire, representing that the Margarine Act is being evaded; and what course Her Majesty's Government intend to take in the matter?

MR. MATTHEWS: I understand that a memorial has been received, but no decision has yet been come to with regard to the matter.

CAPTAIN WISSMANN.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I beg to ask the

Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been called to a telegram, through Reuter's Agency, dated Alexandria, 25th February, which states that "Captain Wissmann has arrived here on his way to Zanzibar. He proceeds to-night to Cairo, where he will probably recruit a force of some hundred blacks;" and whether the consent of the Egyptian Government has been obtained for the enlistment of its subjects?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: Her Majesty's Government are aware of the project of Captain Wissmann, of the German Army. Sir Evelyn Baring has reported his arrival at Cairo, and has stated that his proceedings have not received any official sanction; but that the Egyptian Government do not propose to put any obstacles in the way of his endeavouring to obtain by purely voluntary enlistment a few blacks for service in a police force. He adds that there are a good many blacks at Cairo, emigrants from the Soudan, and others, who are out of work, and who will be benefited if employment can be obtained for them.

CAPE COLONY PRISONS.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether any steps whatever have been taken by the Colonial Authorities since August last to remedy the wretched state shown by the Report on the Penal Establishments in Cape Colony to then exist in the Colonial prisons; whether the evils reported on have been known to the Government for more than two years; whether any representations have been made to the Colonial Authorities by the Secretary of State; and, if he will lay upon the Table the Report on this subject made by the Committee on Convicts and Gaols appointed by the Cape Town Parliament?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. DE WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): I informed the House on the 26th ult. that the Cape Government had taken immediate steps by legislation to remedy the condition of the Colonial Prisons. The Secretary of State is not aware how long the evils reported upon have been known to the Colonial Government; they were not known to Her Majesty's Government until the Report disclosed them. No representations by the Colonial Authorities have been made to the Secretary of State. It is not the duty of the Secretary of State to supervise the internal administration of a colony under responsible government. It would not be right to publish the Report here without a statement of what has been in pursuance of it.

MR. BRADLAUGH: On the Colonial Vote I will call attention to the fact that no steps whatever have been taken to remedy the evils complained of.

THE SALVATION ARMY.

MR. COGHILL (Newcastle-under-Lyme): I wish to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, whether, when during the last five years officers and members of the Salvation Army have been sentenced in England to terms of imprisonment, they have been subjected to the ordinary prison discipline and to the ordinary prison rules; and, whether, during their imprisonment, they have had to clean out their cells and to wear prison dress in common with other prisoners, and to take exercise with other prisoners.

MR. MATTHEWS: The answer to both paragraphs of the hon. Member's Question is in the affirmative.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he does not consider that a disgraceful fact?

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order.

IRELAND—THOMAS TRACY.

MR. M'CARTAN: I wish to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, with reference to the treatment of the bail prisoner Tracy, recently removed from Belfast to Millbank Prison, whether he can now say if the prison authorities supply dinners of joint, dessert, and beer or porter, to bail prisoners in Ireland; and, if not, whether such dinners were supplied at the expense of the proprietor of the Times to Tracy during his imprisonment at Belfast, or by whom these dinners were supplied to him there; whether he will state by whom the Freeman's Journal, containing reports of the proceedings at the Special Commission, was supplied to Tracy daily at Belfast Gaol; and, whether the Prisons Board, while tration of any part of the duties intrusted to them; and the Government, while quite willing to consider the question, would be unwilling to multiply Committees and to make a greater demand on the time of Members than appears to be absolutely necessary. But if it should appear that a Special Committee is necessary, the Government will not refuse it.

MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire): Are we to understand that the Government has decided not to refer the subject of the Scottish salmon fisheries to a Select Committee?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The right hon. Gentleman will see that the question of salmon fisheries is a question quite distinct from this question.
